Oral Answers to Questions

ENERGY

Scottish Coalfield (Employment)

1. Mr. Douglas asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a further statement on the employment situation in the Scottish coalfield.

The Secretary of State for Energy (Mr. Peter Walker): The National Coal Board tells me that at 6 July it had 10,216 industrial employees in the Scottish area. This compared with 12,590 at 31 March 1985. The net fall in numbers was therefore 2,374. During that period 2,332 men accepted voluntary redundancy.

NCB (Enterprises) Ltd. is actively seeking to encourage job creation in Scotland.

Mr. Douglas: Does the Secretary of State recognise the considerable grievance about the Scottish economy and job losses? We should all be happy to record an improvement in industrial relations and output, particularly in Fife, but would that not be enhanced if the Secretary of State used positive forces to ensure that the cases of more than 200 men dismissed during the strike are reviewed by the National Coal Board? At the same time, will the right hon. Gentleman use his good offices to ensure that good industrial relations are brought back to the Scottish coalfields?

Mr. Walker: I have already informed the hon. Gentleman that a review of all the dismissals in Scotland has taken place. I understand that the result of that review will be known shortly.

Mr. Skinner: Will the Secretary of State make absolutely clear to the House and to the nation that those employed in certain coalfields who have been treated differently from men working in other coalfields will get a fair crack of the whip, like the many Members of Parliament who have fallen foul of the law over the years but have somehow managed to retain their jobs, like his old pal Jim Slater, who cost the taxpayer £70 million——

Mr. Speaker: Order. That is a bit wide of the question on the Scottish coalfield.

Mr. Skinner: —and is now exploiting people once again?. If he can apply something to Jim Slater, he can——

Mr. Speaker: Order. That is an abuse of Question Time.

Mr. Walker: We notice the hon. Gentleman's pathetic utterances. Whenever he has a bad case, he does that. It would be appreciated if the hon. Gentleman showed a little interest in those who suffered from violence during the pit dispute.

Mr. Eadie: Is the Secretary of State aware that the Opposition welcome his statement that there will have to be some meetings concerning victimised miners in Scotland? It is an abuse of language to say that there has been a review. There has never been a review.

Is the Secretary of State aware that employment in the mining industry in Scotland will continue to contract as long as there is no investment in the area? As the right hon. Gentleman is aware, we have figures from Mr. Wheeler showing that from 1979 to the present time investment in the Scottish coalfield has been reduced. No investment means contraction of the industry.

Mr. Walker: The Government's investment record in the coal industry is much better than that of the previous Labour Government. Therefore, any comparison of investment must show that in coalfields throughout the country there has been a substantial improvement under this Government — an improvement that did not take place under the previous Labour Government. Whether the comparison is on closures, investment or anything else, this Government's record compares very favourably with that of the previous Labour Government.

Electricity Consumption (Remote Meter Reading)

2. Mr. Freeman asked the Secretary of State for Energy when he last met the chairman of the Electricity Council to discuss the results of trials on the introduction of remote meter reading for electricity consumption.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Energy (Mr. Alastair Goodlad): As the trials are still in progress, it has not been possible to discuss the results with the chairman of the Electricity Council.

Mr. Freeman: Does my hon. Friend agree that if the trials are successful, the electronic reading of the consumption of gas, electricity and water will be facilitated? Does my hon. Friend also agree that if that can be done, there will be two advantages: first, that the house owner will be able to see, by visual display in the house, exactly what is being consumed and therefore how much is owed; and, secondly, the important principle in all utility consumption that the consumer is paying for what is consumed and therefore metered?

Mr. Goodlad: As I have said, the trials are still in progress. The indications are that the electricity cable can be successfully used for joint remote reading purposes by all three utilities. Feedback from consumers indicates that they positively welcome the information provided by the display unit.

If the present trials are successful, the next essential step will be to establish the cost-benefits of the large-scale introduction of such a system in order to justify the investment needed.

British Gas

3. Mr. Michael Morris asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he proposes to include in the legislation for the privatisation of the British Gas Corporation provisions covering safety standards for the installation of gas appliances; and if he will make a statement.

The Minister of State, Department of Energy (Mr. Alick Buchanan Smith): Yes, Sir. The installation and use of appliances are already the subject of safety regulations, and my officials are discussing them with the Health and Safety Executive.

Mr. Morris: That is an encouraging answer, but there is concern outside. Is there not an analogy with the privatisation of British Airways, where pilots have maintained safety and will continue to do so? Can the public be totally reassured in the same way that, when gas is privatised, safety will be a major consideration?

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: Yes, indeed. British Gas has a very good safety record. We want to do everything in the legislation to encourage the highest possible standards.

Mr. Portillo: Will my right hon. Friend confirm that there is absolutely no reason to think that the privatisation of British Gas will involve lower safety standards? Does he agree that if allegations are made that privatisation will involve lower safety standards, they can be seen as the usual scare story that always accompanies a privatisation proposal?

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: My hon. Friend is correct. Safety is extremely important, and all those concerned are getting the fullest co-operation in the preparation of the law.

Mr. Rowlands: If British Gas is privatised, thereby creating a huge private monopoly that is not answerable to the Secretary of State or to this House, will the Minister at least give us a complete assurance that any regulatory body which governs that industry, in regard to safety, prices or other energy matters, will be of a maximum, not a minimum, character?

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: We all know the hon. Gentleman's background. He wants maximum Government interference in the affairs of British Gas. Privatisation will involve less interference and greater efficiency. I assure the hon. Gentleman that, under the arrangements to be made in the legislation, safety standards will be fully safeguarded and encouraged.

National Coal Board

4. Mr. Orme asked the Secretary of State for Energy when he last met the chairman of the National Coal Board to discuss future prospects for the industry.

8. Mr. Dormand asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on the current prospects for the coal industry.

Mr. Peter Walker: I regularly discuss future prospects with the chairman, and I am confident that there is a healthy future ahead for the coal industry if it can bring operating costs into line with market opportunities.

Mr. Orme: Is it true that the basis of the new "Plan for Coal" has been agreed without any negotiations with the appropriate trade unions, and that the plan will lead to the closure of at least 50 pits and the loss of 50,000 jobs in the mining industry?

Mr. Walker: No, Sir.

Mr. Dormand: In spite of what the right hon. Gentleman has just said, is he aware that the relationship between the NCB and the miners is as bad today as it was when the strike ended? As we all want a quick return to good industrial relations in the mining industry, will the right hon. Gentleman instruct the NCB chairman to take the pressure off the area directors? Are we to have a continuing dictatorship of the mining industry by MacGregor, or are we to return to local management, which has had such a good record?

Mr. Walker: The hon. Gentleman's analysis is surprising, because the NCB chairman believes that the maximum power should go to the areas. Mr. Scargill's view, that all the power should go to the centre, is in stark contrast to that. There has not been a single word of criticism by the Labour party of the monstrous change of rules that Mr. Scargill is putting forward.

Mr. Andy Stewart: When my right hon. Friend next meets the chairman of the Coal Board, will he discuss the confrontation last Thursday night between the leader of the Nottinghamshire democratic union and Arthur Scargill, which showed the nation why Nottinghamshire is having to fight for trade union democracy?

Mr. Walker: It is surprising that the leader of the Labour party, when calling for the unity of the NUM—a perfectly good measure for which to call—does not recognise that all the disunity has been caused by the president of the NUM.

Mr. Mason: Is the Secretary aware that the major obstacle impeding further progress in the coal mining industry is the sad and sorry state of industrial relations? Will the right hon. Gentleman impress upon the NCB chairman that, once more, local trade union officials should be allowed to work on regular day shifts and that NUM branch secretaries should have two days on the surface to enable them to deal with trade union affairs? Is the right hon. Gentleman further aware that MacGregor and some of his area directors have been harsh and vindictive since the strike ended? Finally, is he aware that, unless this vindictiveness ends soon, there will be no stable industrial peace in the coalfield?

Mr. Walker Most of the vindictiveness since the dispute ended has been shown by the intimidation of miners who worked. It would be nice to hear the Opposition condemn that. The constant utterances that the only way to achieve anything is by industrial action and taking powers from the regions and from the ballot, which are going on in the NUM at present, are constantly losing customers for the coal industry.

Mr. Eggar: Are the Government encouraging the NCB to negotiate and recognise the new union? Are they encouraging the NCB to attach particular importance to productivity bargaining?

Mr. Walker It is for the NCB to decide whether to recognise any union. I am sure that it will take that decision in a responsible way. It is vital to the future of that industry and of any other to improve and encourage productivity.

Mr. Foot: Does the right hon. Gentleman understand that his responsibility is directly in dealing with the chairman of the NCB? Instead of making wild charges against everyone else in the industry, why does he not deal with that problem? Is he trying to tell us that there has been no interference by Mr. MacGregor in the way in which south Wales miners and the south Wales organisation run their affairs?

Mr. Walker: I should make it clear that Mr. MacGregor wishes power to go to the areas and negotiations to be taken on a regional basis. He believes that that is the correct way in which to run the NCB. I wish that the same applied to the NUM.

Mr. Skeet: Bearing in mind the coal industry's future, will my right hon. Friend consider strictly limiting the subsidies payable to coal? Will he consider the fact that imports should be related to the price of coal on the world market?

Mr. Walker: There is no doubt that a mass of good investment could and should take place in the coal industry. That could have good results for the industry and all who work in it. I hope that the unions will concentrate on ensuring that that is done and will encourage it to take place. On imports, this is a matter about which there is no total control at present. There is no doubt that Britain can produce coal to supply our industries and the electricity boards with a sensible basis on which to compete in the world.

Mr. Meadowcroft: The Secretary of State has told the House about Mr. MacGregor's intentions, but is he satisfied that those intentions are working in practice? Is it not the case that in the past closures have been carried out area by area and that one of the genuine problems of the recent strike was that they were carried out nationally? What guarantee do we have that that will not pertain in future?

Mr. Walker: The hon. Gentleman should study the position. The recent strike took place because Mr. MacGregor suggested that proposals should be made and examined regionally. If the hon. Gentleman had studied the details of the strike, he would know that what he said was wrong.

Mr. Benn: Will the Secretary of State cast his mind back to March 1980, when the Cabinet, of which he was a member, gave instructions to Lord Soames that a pardon was to be given to every person in Rhodesia after 15 years of rebellion against the Crown and the most horrendous civil war, and that the best way forward in Zimbabwe was through reconciliation? Will he now look back at that pardon ordinance and ensure that similar act of reconciliation is launched in the British mining industry?

Mr. Walker: I look forward to the right hon. Gentleman seeking reconciliation for the many miners who balloted to work and worked during the strike.

Mr. Sackville: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the industry's prospects would be improved if the Labour party made clear its view on the recent changes to the NUM rule book?

Mr. Walker: In fairness, the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn) has made his view clear. It is only the leader of the Opposition who has not.

Mr. Strang: Why has the board's policy of victimisation been pursued with such vengeance, especially in Scotland? Is the Secretary of State aware that petitions circulating in the collieries show virtually unanimous support for the men's reinstatement, and that for Church leaders and leading lawyers the matter has become a human rights issue? How much longer must we put up with this injustice in Scotland and elsewhere?

Mr. Walker: The Opposition are divided on the matter. Some, including those who are sitting near to the hon. Gentleman now, are in favour of reinstating all miners, no matter how guilty of violence they are, and, indeed, of taking miners out of prison. I am glad that at least the Leader of the Opposition condemned that.

Wind Turbines

5. Mr. Speller asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will take steps to allocate funds for the installation of wind turbines for agriculture.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Energy (Mr. David Hunt): Wind energy is one of the most promising renewable energy sources of electricity generation in the United Kingdom, and my Department's programme, which plans to spend more than £6·5 million this year, is concentrated on large turbines for electricity generation.

Mr. Speller: The provisions of the Energy Act 1976 have allowed people to erect wind turbines to generate power into the grid. Is my hon. Friend aware that one can produce energy for intensive farm use, such as piggeries, at half the grid price, and yet receive a grant for connecting the farm to the grid system? Should we not think about some form of grant to aid the installation of wind turbines? Is my hon. Friend further aware that as wind turbines have become more popular, rating authorities have not infrequently made a rateable charge per annum equivalent to half the revenue obtained, which is negating all the advantages of the Energy Act?

Mr. Hunt: My hon. Friend will know that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment is responsible for rates. I am delighted that my hon. Friend referred to the potential for agricultural applications, because recently my Department funded a study which showed that at present prices and costs nearly 2,000 farms could operate wind turbines economically.

Energy Efficiency Year

6. Mr. Knox asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on the resources he proposes to allocate for the promotion of Energy Efficiency Year 1986.

Mr. Peter Walker: The Energy Efficiency Office will be allocating more than £10 million to a range of promotional and demonstration activities. In addition, much greater resources will be provided by a whole range of interested organisations, industries and commercial concerns, which will all join in our national theme of energy efficiency. I anticipate that the overall allocation of resources to energy efficiency year will be substantial.

Mr. Knox: Are many of the ideas suggested in the energy study competition for schools likely to be implemented during energy efficiency year?

Mr. Walker: There were many good ideas in that competition. I am glad to say that, shortly after Question Time, I shall be giving tea to the winners on the Terrace and hearing their views.

Mr. Simon Hughes: In view of the Secretary of State's declared interest in welcoming Hainault high school, some of whose pupils are listening to our proceedings today, does he accept that the clear conclusion of its report is that people will invest in energy conservation if the capital outlay does not take too many years to recoup? Does he further accept that, at local level, we need a facility to allow that to happen, with local authorities as facilitators, the Department as the instigator and millions of people as the beneficiaries? Finally, does he accept that it is his responsibility to instigate such a programme during the next 12 to 18 months?

Mr. Walker: During the past year enormous progress has been made in obtaining the assistance of voluntary groups, especially low-income groups. We shall do all that we can to spread the success that has been achieved during the past 12 months.

Mr. Hannam: Will my right hon. Friend study the position in countries, such as the United States, Denmark and Australia, where the use of home audits has achieved dramatic improvements in energy conservation during the past few years?

Mr. Walker: The audit system is important, and we hope to make considerable progress in that area during the next 12 months.

Polkemmet Colliery

9. Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Energy what reply he has sent to West Lothian district council, as a result of the evidence sent to him, following West Lothian district council's inquiry into the future of Polkemmet colliery.

Mr. David Hunt: The closure of collieries must be a matter for the NCB in consultation with the mining unions, which can choose to appeal through the colliery review procedure, including appeal to an independent body under the amended procedure.

Mr. Dalyell: Which specific figures in the district council's evidence do the Government dispute?

Mr. Hunt: Thanks to the hon. Gentleman, I have received a copy of a statement by West Lothian district council, which I am considering. I shall respond to it, and to the point that the hon. Gentleman has just made, as soon as possible. However, nothing that he has said can alter the fact that Polkemmet was flooded at the end of August 1984 as a result of the withdrawal of safety cover by the NUM. That disgraceful act of vandalism can never be excused.

Mr. Eadie: The Minister cannot get away with that statement. Polkemmet was flooded because the director of the National Coal Board would not permit middle management to go in and do the job that was being done in every other coalfield. Is the Minister aware that Polkemmet is important to the steel industry, and especially to Ravenscraig? If he accompanied some of his hon. Friends to Ravenscraig, he would discover that it is importing all the coking coal it needs. Does he accept the need for Polkemmet to be reopened and the fact that, technically, it can be done?

Mr. Hunt: The hon. Gentleman has got all those facts wrong.

Energy Saving (Capital Investment)

10. Mr. Beith asked the Secretary of State for Energy what requests for information have been received by the Energy Efficiency Office from local authorities regarding capital investment in energy-saving measures.

Mr. David Hunt: Local authorities have achieved a great deal, but there is considerable scope for further improvement. The Energy Efficiency Office has had some requests for information about the provision of additional funds for energy efficiency.

Mr. Beith: How can local authorities make the energy efficiency improvements which will really help their tenants if they cannot spend capital on doing so? Would not the most practical contribution that the Government could make in this area be a relaxation of the capital restraints on local authorities spending money which they already have in the bank from the sale of council houses, in order to improve the energy efficiency of their properties? Will the Department take the initiative in ensuring that that is done?

Mr. Hunt: Within existing limits, considerable savings can be achieved by local authorities with only modest investment. I hope that, in 1986, which will be energy efficiency year, there will be a substantial increase in this area.

Mr. Forman: Is the Department taking steps to encourage the production of energy from the combustion of domestic and commercial waste? What progress is being made in that direction?

Mr. Hunt: The answer is yes. My hon. Friend is right to highlight the considerable scope for improvement in the burning of domestic and animal waste and in the general area of biomass. That featured largely in our recent statement about the allocation of research and development funds for the coming year.

Mr. Rowlands: Is not the simplest form of energy efficiency for householders, whether tenants or owner-occupiers, the home insulation grant? Is the Minister aware that in 1983-84 there was a 33 per cent. reduction in such grants in Wales alone, which has been mirrored in other areas? Would it not be better to give maximum encouragement to home insulation grants?

Mr. Hunt: As the hon. Gentleman will know, the history in this area is of an underspend. However, according to the latest figures, there is clear evidence of a substantial take-up of those grants. I hope that this area of funding will be fully spent this year.

National Coal Board

11. Mr. Nellist asked the Secretary of State for Energy when he will next meet the chairman of the National Coal Board to discuss future investment in the industry.

Mr. Peter Walker: I meet the chairman of the National Coal Board from time to time, to discuss many issues, including future investment in the coal industry.

Mr. Nellist: Is it not a fact that 11 days ago Mr. Michael Eaton, the National Coal Board spokesman, spoke of 7,000 jobs created by new investment at Selby, at Ashford and at Coventry? When that is set alongside the 70,000 jobs, which is the real target to which MacGregor and the Tory Government wish to cut the industry, does it not show that the last 12 months' struggle of the miners was totally justified, and that any attempt to set up a bosses' union in Nottinghamshire will merely play into the hands of the Secretary of State, MacGregor and the National Coal Board, who wish to run down the coal industry?

Mr. Walker: I am delighted that during the period in office of this Government investment has been at a much higher level than it was under the Labour Government. The National Coal Board wishes to make major investment in the coal industry. I know how delighted the hon. Gentleman's constituents are at the enormous investment that the board has recently announced for his area, as they were delighted when the majority of people in the Coventry pit returned to work.

Mr. Hickmet: Does my right hon. Friend agree that there is a danger that the recent changes in the NUM rule book will persuade existing and potential customers not to use coal as an energy source, whether it be the CEGB, the BSC or industrial users, and that consequently the greatest danger to investment in the National Coal Board is Arthur Scargill's attempt to use the coal mining industry as an instrument of class warfare, a policy which appears to be supported by the leadership of the Labour party?

Mr. Walker: Since the dispute took place, virtually every utterance by Mr. Scargill has been to say how he intends to use industrial action to the maximum in future. The change in the rules, which gives him power to take industrial action at local level without ballots taking place and without necessarily having the agreement of the local people is again an illustration of the type of war that he wishes to conduct, all of which loses orders for the coal industry, all of which stops our programme to get people to convert to coal, and none of which is condemned by the Opposition.

Mr. Hardy: Does the Secretary of State agree that investment decisions and the investment record are matters that should and could be considered by the new colliery review procedures? Will he therefore, when he meets the chairman of the board, tell him that it is about time that acceptable procedures were introduced, remind him that the board was committed to introduce those last autumn and agree, further, that the Government were certainly also committed?

Mr. Walker: As the hon. Gentleman knows better than most, the board has circulated in great detail its proposal, which very much fits in with all the principles agreed last autumn. The sooner they are implemented, the better I shall be pleased.

Mr. Wrigglesworth: In view of the Government's clear commitment to the future of the mining industry, shown throughout the mining strike, does the Secretary of State agree that he should consult the Nottinghamshire miners, if they so wish, about the future of the industry and future investment in the industry? Does he also agree that any party that is seriously intent upon taking power in the country should be able to do that, without fear or favour?

Mr. Walker: I believe that it is true that the Nottinghamshire miners had no desire to split off from the NUM. They did, however, give due warning that, if the incredible changes of rule proposed by Mr. Scargill took place they would almost certainly have to. At no time in that period was there any attempt by the Labour party to condemn those changes of rule.

Mr. Stanbrook: Would it not assist investment in the coal industry if the National Coal Board did not have millions of pounds invested in private firms outside the industry?

Mr. Walker: I think it will be found that those investments are now very small indeed.

Mr. Orme: Will the Secretary of State now address himself to the future of the industry? Is it not a fact that an authoritative report has been published which states that 50,000 jobs and 50 pits could be in jeopardy? Will the Secretary of State answer that point?

Mr. Walker: I have already answered it once. There is no such report that forms the policy of the National Coal Board. Therefore, I have answered it no once, and I answer it no again. If the right hon. Gentleman, in the interests of the industry, would address himself to the damage that is being done by the leadership of the NUM, he might have some respect.

Straw

12. Mr. Yeo asked the Secretary of State for Energy what research is being carried out to develop the use of straw as an energy producing fuel.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: Within my Department's biofuels programme, we are supporting the development of equipment to produce straw briquettes.

Mr. Yeo: The problem of surplus straw is acute in Suffolk. Is my right hon. Friend aware of the Danish experiment in which farmers' co-operatives use straw as fuel for local heating schemes and are able to use the residue for fertiliser?

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: There is considerable potential for the use of straw. It is estimated that the surplus straw currently burnt in fields could have a potential of about 4 million tonnes of coal equivalent a year. There are interesting experiments abroad. My hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State recently visited, and was impressed by, an installation in Denmark, which my hon. Friend mentioned.

Coal Industry Dispute

13. Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Secretary of State for Energy what plans he has to investigate cases of alleged intimidation and victimisation of miners who continued to work during the recent coal mining dispute; and if he will make a statement.

21. Mr. Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Energy what plans he has to investigate cases of alleged intimidation and harassment of miners who continued to work during the recent coal industry dispute; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Walker: I have taken up with the National Coal Board all such cases brought to my attention and can assure the House that each has received urgent and individual attention.

Mr. Bruinvels: I thank my right hon. Friend for that helpful and constructive answer. Has he seen reports in the News of the World and The Sun, which show that an alarming number of families of miners who worked throughout the strike have been severely victimised, threatened and had their houses daubed, and that many miners have been prevented from returning to work? Can my right hon. Friend advise miners who want to go to work, and their families, how they might be protected and will be able to convict those appalling miners — [Interruption.]—who deny peoples' right to go to work?

Mr. Walker: I am surprised at the hilarity on the other side of the House at such appalling circumstances. There is no doubt that there has been a lot of dreadful intimidation. I am glad that the Coal Board has made it clear that anybody who is found guilty of intimidation will be sacked immediately. In some cases that has been done. The board has organised transfers, early retirement and other means of helping those concerned. I hope that both sides of the House will condemn the appalling intimidation that has occurred.

Mr. Greenway: Is my right hon. Friend satisfied that all cases of intimidation are being brought to light? Does he agree that it would be sensible for police in plain clothes or dressed as miners to accompany miners down shafts to get a feel of what is going on? I think that they will find that there is a great deal more intimidation than has been reported.

Mr. Walker: I am afraid that my hon. Friend is correct. One of the problems of intimidation is that the person being intimidated is often scared to report it. The police and everyone else are endeavouring to do their best to end these totally criminal actions.

Mr. Nellist: Is the Secretary of State aware that in Scotland 70 per cent. of those who were dismissed were lay officials or elected members of strike committees? That is a clear example of victimisation of strike organisers. When the right hon. Gentleman says that miners guilty of victimisation should be sacked, how does he answer the case of a miner in Coventry, Clive Ham, who was accused by the Coal Board of victimisation, found not guilty by a court of law but who still remains sacked? Under the right hon. Gentleman's tutelage, the Coal Board has set itself up as judge, jury and executioner.

Mr. Walker: I should like to hear just one utterance from the hon. Gentleman in condemnation of the appalling violence that has taken place. Those of us who watched some of the events at Bilston Glen on television were only happy that those who caused it should be punished appropriately.

Mr. Strang: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that both sides of the House oppose intimidation, no matter where it comes from? Does he agree that if the board and the authorities really want to improve industrial relations in the coalfields, they must first reinstate victimised miners?

Mr. Walker: The majority of victimised miners are those who worked during the strike, and they have been victimised ever since. As for sackings, each case has been examined individually.

Alternative Energy Sources

15. Mr. Colvin asked the Secretary of State for Energy what funding has been made available for research into alternative energy sources since 1979.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: Total research and development expenditure by my Department on renewable energy from 1979-80 to 1984-85 was approximately £76 million. The forecast expenditure for 1985-86 is £14 million.

Mr. Colvin: My right hon. Friend is aware that gas, coal and oil are finite sources of energy. Could not a better case be made for the Government reinvesting some of their receipts from fission fuels into research into alternative forms of energy such as tidal, solar and wind energy? When can we expect a go-ahead for the pilot barrage on the Severn estuary?

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: It is worth while studying these alternative forms of energy as my Department is doing by helping to fund research. However, we have to concentrate on research on those sectors which produce the best prospects, and that is what we are doing. As my hon. Friend knows, a study into the Severn barrage is going on now and it is hoped that the report of that study will be received by the end of the year. This will enable decisions to be taken.

Mrs. Clwyd: Instead of putting money into alternative sources of energy, would it not be a better put money into existing coalfield communities, particularly in my constituency, where we have the highest male unemployment rate in Wales — 28 per cent. at present? On Thursday one of the pits will come up for review and will possibly close, with a loss of 570 jobs, pushing male unemployment up to 33 per cent. Is that not intolerable in the 1980s?

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: I am sorry that the hon. Lady does not support investment into revewable sources of energy, which is widely supported throughout the country. I refute what the hon. Lady has said about investment in the coal industry, on which the Government have the best record of any Government in recent years. What the hon. Lady says is utterly hypocritical.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Written Questions

34. Mr. Chapman asked the Lord Privy Seal if he will bring forward proposals to require that written questions are tabled either by the hon. Member in person or personally written and signed by the hon. Member.

The Lord Privy Seal and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. John Biffen): No, Sir.

Mr. Chapman: The hon. Member for Fife, Central (Mr. Hamilton) asked a question on 29 April and pointed out that the number of written questions had doubled in the past four years and now cost over £1·5 million to deal with. Will my right hon. Friend have second thoughts about this? Does he agree that my proposal is fair, reasonable and effective, particularly if my right hon. Friend is not minded to recommend a limitation on the number of written questions that any hon. Member can table at any one time?

Mr. Biffen: Any decision formally to limit the number of questions that an hon. Member may table should appropriately proceed after the matter has been considered by the Procedure Committee.

Mr. Willie W. Hamilton: Is the Leader of the House aware that there is much evidence that this procedure is being abused by certain hon. Members? Is he aware that the hon. Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Bruinvels) is probably the most expensive Member that there has ever been in the House and that his worthless written questions are costing the taxpayer thousands of pounds a year? Is the right hon. Gentleman prepared to take steps to stop that nonsense from that hon. Member?

Mr. Biffen: That is an invidious accusation. It so happens that I have before me a roll of honour of hon. Members who have tabled the largest number of questions, and I have to say that the top three do not include my hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Bruinvels).

Mr. Peter Bruinvels: I thank my right hon. Friend for defending me. I ask questions on my behalf, I ask them myself, in my own interest and to prevent others from asking questions relating to my constituency. Does my right hon. Friend accept that there are other hon. Members who ask many more questions that I do? Should they not be the hon. Members to whom this question is directed?

Mr. Biffen: Perhaps we should come back from the league table, which I think it indelicate to publish, to the point of the original question. Many hon. Members are uneasy about the practice of hon. Members who sign the question forms and then give them to research assistants to table as they think fit. That is wholly contrary to the spirit of how this place works.

Mr. Shore: It would be quite wrong if any attempt were made to impose a limit on the number of written questions that can be asked by hon. Members. However, it would be interesting to have the reasons of the Leader of the House for rejecting the proposition that written questions should be tabled by the hon. Member in person. What does he have against it?

Mr. Biffen: It is a very interesting proposition that written questions should be not only tabled but written out by the hon. Member concerned. A very real departure of that magnitude should, I think, proceed after the Select Committee on Procedure has had a chance to examine it.

Research Assistants

35. Mr. Soames asked the Lord Privy Seal whether he will take steps to seek to restrict the access of research assistants to the House facilities.

Mr. Biffen: Research assistants are already subject to certain restrictions in their access to House facilities. I would also refer my hon. Friend to the second report of the House of Commons (Services) Committee of this Session, which was debated in the House on 12 July.

Mr. Soames: I hope my right hon. Friend will realise that I was very sad not to be able to be here on Friday. I was attending to my constituents. Does he agree with me that our facilities are being overrun by this monstrous regiment of research assistants? Does he also agree that there is widespread evidence of abuse by some of them? Will he therefore seek radically to recast the rules that guide these procedures?

Mr. Biffen: A number of suggestions were made in the debate. The Sub-Committee, under the chairmanship of the right hon. Member for Lewisham, Deptford (Mr. Silkin) will be considering them, in addition to the original recommendations that were made. I have no doubt that the recommendations that are made during this Question Time will be added to those that were made in the debate on Friday last.

Mr. Beith: If the Leader of the House were to seek to go beyond the sensible recommendations of the Services Sub-Committee, which were debated on Friday, could he not then be accused of seeking to ensure that Ministers are extensively and well advised, but that those who seek to challenge and question Ministers do not have the benefit of such advice?

Mr. Biffen: The usual charge is that Ministers are ill advised.

Mr. Beaumont-Dark: Does my right hon. Friend accept that some Members of this honourable House are willing to give out passes like confetti? Should there not be a limit to the number of so-called research assistants which so-called hon. Members can inflict upon us all? [HON. MEMBERS: "Oh!".]

Mr. Biffen: That is one of the points that was made in the debate on Friday last.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not think the House approves of the phrase "so-called hon. Members". Every Member here is an hon. Member.

Mr. Boyes: Is the Leader of the House aware that I am not surprised that the Parliamentary Private Secretary to the chairman of the Tory party does not need research assistants? On the other hand, those hon. Members who are in the serious business of politics—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. I take the view that the hon. Member is very much in the serious business of politics.

Mr. Boyes: Those hon. Members who are in the serious business of politics and who are trying to solve the complex social problems that have been caused by the reactionary politics of this Government need as many research assistants as possible to help us. If the right hon. Gentleman wants an example, the new board and lodgings regulations are causing massive problems both in my constituency and in the constituencies of other hon. Members.

Mr. Biffen: I think that we are all beginning to get a slight touch of July fever. The Sub-Committee of the Services Committee will be considering this matter. Doubtless it will consider the hon. Gentleman's point, along with others.

Mr. Rowe: Is my right hon. Friend aware that many hon. Members, who find that the increasing number of lobby groups with access to word processors are drowning us with correspondence, are very grateful for our research assistants? I suspect that most of the difficulties that are encountered by research assistants, and come from them, are attributable to the fact that hon. Members do not brief them in the practices of this House as well as they should.

Mr. Biffen: I take note of what I am sure is one of the relevant factors. I undertake to draw the attention of the right hon. Member for Deptford to the points that have been raised this afternoon. They will be important to him when he makes his further studies.

New Telephone Exchange

36. Mr. Peter Bruinvels asked the Lord Privy Seal if he will make a statement on the reasons for the decision to purchase a new telephone exchange system for the Palace of Westminster and the criteria which were used to determine that all hon. and right hon. Members and their secretaries should be provided with new telephones.

Mr. Biffen: I refer my hon. Friend to the first report of the Services Committee in Session 1980-81, in which the reasons for a new exchange being required are set out at length. New telephones are required because, among other things, the existing ones will not work with the new exchange.

Mr. Bruinvels: I read the report before tabling this question. To provide the House with these so-called wonder phones with alarms, digital clocks and calculators, not just for hon. Members, but for secretaries as well, seems to be a gross expense, bearing in mind that it will cost £2,037,000 to provide those facilities. Is my right hon. Friend able to say what will happen to the old phones?

Mr. Biffen: The old phones, which were rented, will be returned to British Telecommunications and subsequent use will be made of them. I appreciate my hon. Friend's anxiety that we should not spend more on this than is strictly necessary, but I question whether a secretary should somehow or other have a lesser telephone facility than an hon. Member.

Mr. Dubs: Is the Leader of the House aware that many of us are thankful that we are at long last to have a decent telephone system to replace the decrepit one from which we now suffer, one that has constant malfunctions and gets wrong numbers? It is a welcome step that this House is at last being dragged into the 20th century in at least one area of modern technology.

Mr. Biffen: I am sure that that was intended to be helpful. We are to have a new telephone system because the demand is such that a new exchange must be obtained. It is not true to say that the present telephone facilities are archaic and impede us in doing our job properly.

CIVIL SERVICE

Trade Unions

39. Mr. Parry asked the Minister for the Civil Service when he nexts expects to meet the Civil Service trade unions; and what matters he expects to discuss.

The Minister of State, Treasury (Mr. Barney Hayhoe): I will be meeting representatives of some of the Civil Service unions on Wednesday 17 July to discuss, at their request, the pay of senior civil servants.

Mr. Parry: When the Minister meets the unions, will he discuss trade union membership? Will he state whether it is true that the draft new Civil Service handbook no longer encourages civil servants to join the trade union of their choice? If that is so, is it not inferference with the Civil Service trade unions?

Mr. Hayhoe: On Wednesday we will be discussing the pay of senior civil servants. If the unions want to discuss other matters, I am sure that suitable opportunities can be arranged. I understand that the handbook is in draft and is being discussed with the trade unions.

Mr. Forman: When my right hon. Friend meets the Civil Service trade unions, will he make it clear to them that, while it is necessary to keep firm control of public sector pay, including Civil Service pay, all members of the Government recognise the quality and dedication of the work done by the Civil Service?

Mr. Hayhoe: I am happy to endorse what my hon. Friend has said.

Mr. Wrigglesworth: Will the Minister refute the suggestion made in an article in The Times recently by Mr. David West, that the reduction in the numbers of civil servants has come about as a result of reductions in work? Will he also comment on the suggestions by Mr. West that the Government's systems management in the Civil Service is woefully inadequate?

Mr. Hayhoe: The article in The Times by Mr. West was misleading and inaccurate in a number of ways. His direct experience is many years out of date. Staff inspectiion, which was his particular interest, has an important role to play, but the significant reduction in the number of civil servants from 732,000 in May 1979 to under 600,000 today has been achieved in many other ways. I am happy to pay tribute to the Civil Service, which has contributed considerably to an increase in efficiency.

Dr. McDonald: When the Minister meets the Civil Service unions, will he also discuss with them the fact that, despite their continued efforts, the loss of 1,000 Customs and Excise officers since 1979 has contributed to the 750 per cent. increase in heroin smuggling? Will he agree with them that the cut in Customs staff has been extremely irresponsible? Will he admit that the 50 per cent. increase in staff for special investigation will be of limited use because they will be redeployed from Customs staff elsewhere?

Mr. Hayhoe: That is not a matter that is likely to be discussed on Wednesday when I meet the Civil Service unions. As I said, we shall be discussing the pay of senior civil servants. Perhaps the hon. Lady did not hear my original answer. The hon. Lady is incorrect in suggesting that the reduction in the number of uniformed staff has led to an increase in the amount of heroin coming into this country. She should be aware of the significant increase under this Government of the number of Customs and Excise specialist investigation staff. She should also pay tribute to the significant successes that have been achieved as a result of that.

Private-Public Sector Contacts

40. Mr. Dalyell asked the Minister for the Civil Service what is the policy of Her Majesty's Government towards encouraging contacts between senior civil servants and leading City business men.

Mr. Hayhoe: Such contacts form a natural part of the work of many senior civil servants. The interchange of staff between the Civil Service and the private sector has been encouraged over the years by successive Governments as a means of improving mutual understanding between the Government and industry.

Mr. Dalyell: What response have Ministers made to the serious statements contained in an article in the Daily Star on 13 June concerning the case of Hilda Murrell and highlighting an alleged relationship between the distinguished Cabinet Secretary, Sir Robert Armstrong, and Sir Dallas Bernard, a director of Zeus Securities?

For what particular purposes does the taxpayer finance the activities of Zeus Securities? For what purposes does the taxpayer finance the activities of Mr. Gary Murray? I know that a writ has been issued by Sir James Starritt in relation to the article, but ought there not to be a Government statement on these alarming statements?

Mr. Hayhoe: That supplementary question goes way outside the original question. However, thinking that the hon. Gentleman might seek practically to abuse the procedures of the House in that way, I have had inquiries made. While Sir Robert Armstrong has a long-standing personal friendship, though by no means a close one, with Sir Dallas Bernard, he has at no time had any official dealings either with Sir Dallas Bernard as a director of Zeus Security Consultants, or in any other capacity, or with Zeus Security Consultants and he did not know until he read the article in the Daily Star on 13 June that Sir Dallas was a director of that company. I think it wrong that the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) should peddle and give credence to tittle tattle of this kind by his supplementary questions in the House.

Sir Dudley Smith: On a far more important question, is my right hon. Friend aware that the relationship between senior civil servants and the whole industrial spectrum is far better than it was, for example, two decades ago, but that it is still capable of improvement and that we have many lessons to learn from a number of other countries, not least Japan?

Mr. Hayhoe: I agree with my hon. Friend. Encouraging contacts between the Civil Service and industry and commerce is of value to both the public and private sectors.

Mr. Dalyell: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. In view of the unsatisfactory nature of that reply, I wish to give notice that I shall seek to raise the matter on the Adjournment.

Merit Pay

41. Mr. Eggar asked the Minister for the Civil Service if he will make a statement on the progress in introducing merit pay into the Civil Service.

Mr. Hayhoe: The experimental programme of performance bonuses, which I announced in December last, is now being implemented in Government Departments. The first payments of bonuses will be made during the 1985-86 financial year.

Mr. Eggar: Is not it a pity that the new programme is restricted to the open structure? Should we not be working more rapidly towards being able to make merit payments throughout the Civil Service?

Mr. Hayhoe: This is an experimental programme, and I am sure my hon. Friend will think it right that it should be assessed, monitored and evaluated carefully before any extension can be decided on. But I ought to make it clear that I and my officials are prepared to discuss extensions if they are proposed by the unions.

Mr. Merlyn Rees: If merit pay were introduced for Ministers, would not most of them starve?

Mr. Hayhoe: The right hon. Gentleman must have been reflecting on his own ministerial experience.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: How does the Minister justify the widening pay differential between civil servants and people employed in the private sector?

Mr. Hayhoe: The pay settlement made with the Civil Service this year, which gives an average of 4·9 per cent. to the whole of the Civil Service, is, in the circumstances of the time, fair and reasonable.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Terrace (Teas)

37. Mr. Greenway asked the Lord Privy Seal how many teas were served on the Terrace of the House of Commons in the summers of 1955, 1965, 1975 and 1984, respectively; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Biffen: The number of teas served on the Terrace during summer 1984 was 4,894. Information for the earlier years mentioned in my hon. Friend's question is no longer available.

Mr. Greenway: Is my right hon. Friend aware that the number of people wishing to have strawberries and cream on the Terrace of the House of Commons far exceeds the supply of teas available? That being so, will he seek to extend the season during which these teas are available in suitable facilities, perhaps starting at Easter rather than at Whitsun? [HON. MEMBERS: "No strawberries."] If strawberries are not ready by then, could not we have cherries—Waterloos or Wellingtons perhaps.

Mr. Biffen: I am not aware of this imbalance, but I shall draw it to the attention of the person who matters, my hon. Friend the Member for Cheltenham (Mr. Irving).

Famine Relief

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow) (by private notice) asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if the Government will urgently make available additional lorries to famine relief organisations in Ethiopia and Sudan.

3.34 pm

The Minister for Overseas Development (Mr. Timothy Raison): I have decided to provide £1·6 million to Save the Children Fund for the purchase of 40 heavy trucks for Sudan. A further £400,000 will cover local bodywork for the 60 Leyland trucks already presented to SCF, continuing costs of their logistics team, and 10 Landrovers.

I announced on 10 June that we were providing £750,000 for trailers and truck hire costs in Ethiopia. I shall be reviewing the transport position when I arrive in Ethiopia tomorrow.

Mr. Dalyell: I welcome the right hon. Gentleman's visit to Ethiopia and the provision of more transport, which we were told over the weekend was still necessary. But what should I say to constituents of mine who see £40 million-worth of mostly suitable trucks sitting in the car park of British Leyland at Bathgate and hear at the same time on the radio that after all the exchanges in the House there is still a shortage of trucks both for the Sudan and for Ethiopia?

Mr. Raison: I suggest that the hon. Gentleman tells his constituents that, for the 40 heavy trucks, the provision of which I have just announced, we shall be going to British Leyland first to see whether it can provide them.

Dr. David Owen (Plymouth, Devonport): Will the right hon. Gentleman make it clear whether this is additional to the aid budget or simply, as has happened before, a transfer from one part of the aid budget to another part? Will the right hon. Gentleman look into the possibility of seconding British Railways personnel to Sudan, where the railway network is in a critical state and needs skilled people—as do the ports?

Mr. Raison: The money comes out of the sum that I have set aside for dealing with this very serious problem in Africa, and that is as it should be. We have already provided expert personnel to help solve this very difficult problem with the railway line in the Sudan. We shall continue to do everything possible to make sure that the railway line operates as effectively and as rapidly as possible.

Mr. Teddy Taylor (Southend, East): Although the extra transport is welcomed, is it not deplorable that, as revealed by my right hon. Friend in answer to me on Friday, only 43 per cent. of the food aid promised by the EEC at Dublin last December has been delivered? Is my right hon. Friend willing to discuss with his colleagues how the pledge made to drought-stricken Africa might now be kept?

Mr. Raison: It is not deplorable. There is at present enough food in the ports of the Sudan and Ethiopia and there is no point in piling more food into those ports until it is possible to distribute it. The European Community pledges will be of the greatest value in the months to come. Let us remember that this is not a short-term problem but one that will last for many months yet. Thank goodness the European Community is doing so much to help.

Mr. Tom Clarke (Monklands, West): In view of the Minister's reference to the Save the Children Fund, has he had time to consider last Thursday's request by that organisation that the Government should rescind their decision to withdraw the Hercules aircraft from Ethiopia and Sudan? Has he responded to that request, and will he announce his answer in Ethiopia tomorrow?

Mr. Raison: As I said, when I go to Ethiopia tomorrow I shall be reviewing the transport situation there. The great need now is for road transport. The RAF is doing a splendid job, but when the rainy season is over it may not be necessary for it to continue that job.

Mr. Robin Maxwell-Hyslop (Tiverton): Will my right hon. Friend be having any contact in Ethiopia with the military authorities, who seem to throw all the people out of the camps, though their Government deny that they have instructed the army to do that? Will he see that the useful aid that is given is not frustrated by being directed to camps that are then emptied by the army?

Mr. Raison: I do not expect to have discussions with the military authorities, but I certainly shall be having discussions with Ethiopian Ministers. The whole question of the effective use of the aid that is being provided will, of course, feature prominently in those discussions.

Mr. Tom Cox (Tooting): The Minister has rightly referred to Sudan and Ethiopia. May we have an assurance that the problems faced by Somalia will not be forgotten? Somalia also has a famine, it has also had many refugees coming across its borders and it also needs help.

Mr. Raison: I recognise that Somalia has difficult problems. The European Community will be able to help Somalia, and we shall certainly bear its needs in mind.

Mr. Bowen Wells (Hertford and Stortford): My right hon. Friend has provided considerable aid by way of transport—lorries and aircraft—in helping to deal with the terrible drought, and he is to be congratulated on that. Does he agree, however, that the current need is not for more trucks—in view of the rainy season in the Sudan, when trucks cannot get through the desert, which is flooded—but for research into, and support for, arid agriculture, so as to find a way in which the people can plant crops and reap them year after year, to avoid this problem in future? Will he therefore review the statement, published today, that he made in reply to the Select Committee on Foreign Affairs, in which he said that he did not believe that additional money should be made available? As the right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen) said, my right hon. Friend has transferred money. In so doing, has he not deprived his Department of the ability to enter into long-term and vital commitments?

Mr. Raison: The short-term and long-term needs are of the greatest importance. We have found the money for the short-term needs out of the contingency fund, from the shortfall and by reallocating the food aid programme, and that has been a wise and successful policy. For the long-term, we provide substantial resources for development, including the development of agriculture, and we are spending well over £200 million a year on development in sub-Saharan Africa.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I remind the House that I granted the private notice question on the question of additional lorries for famine relief.

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): Will the Minister respond to the remarkable generosity of people to the Live Aid concerts at the weekend by agreeing to match pound for pound the amount contributed by the British public following the Wembley concert?

Mr. Raison: I entirely share the view that the Live Aid concert was a magnificient occasion, and everybody who helped to put it together deserves the greatest possible congratulations. In the last financial year we provided £95 million of famine-related aid. This year we are targeting to provide another large amount. That, together with the long-term development aid that we are providing, adds up a very significant sum indeed, and certainly not one about which I need be apologetic.

Mr. Robert Key (Salisbury): Does my right hon. Friend accept that the point he made about the need for lorries and the fact that in the long-term we shall have to replace them demonstrates the need for a continuing and expanding programme? Is he aware that there would be support in all parts of the House and throughout the country for an increase in the budget spent on the Overseas Development Administration of the Foreign Office?

Mr. Raison: I believe that there is great concern throughout the country about the events in Africa, and that is as it should be. We are, of course, bound by our public expenditure policy. However, I can tell the House that within my budget I shall do everything possible to ensure that we apply our resources where they will be of most effect—and Africa, of course, takes very high priority in that.

Mr. Michael Meadowcroft (Leeds, West): Is there not a very significant contrast between the voluntary money raised by the amazing Live Aid concerts at the weekend and the attitude of the Government? As there is quite clearly tremendous resonance among the public for support for aid to Ethiopia and the Sudan, why do not the Government look at ways and means of forgoing the money that will go to them from the concerts, which would pay for lorries for Ethiopia and the Sudan?

Mr. Raison: I believe that a sympathetic view is being taken about the tax aspect. Surely the point is that it is uniquely a chance for people to show directly that they wish to contribute. It is entirely admirable that there should be so much voluntary contribution in addition to the large amounts provided by the same people through their taxes. I think that we have nothing of which to be ashamed.

Mr. Colin Moynihan (Lewisham, East): The whole Chamber echoes the outstanding admiration for and support of all participants in the Live Aid concerts. Will my right hon. Friend ensure that spares for trucks are sent not only in the impending rainy season but going right into next season, which is essential?

Mr. Raison: I think that my hon. Friend is right. Throughout, I have taken the view that the provision of spares for transport is one of the most valuable things that we can do. I certainly do not intend to turn my back on that policy.

Mr. Dave Nellist (Coventry, South-East): While the Minister basks in the reflected glory of the weekend's events at Wembley and Philadelphia, may I ask whether he considers it hypocritical of his Government to run down the bus and truck industry of this country, losing 40,000 car and other related jobs in the city of Coventry during the past 10 years, while at the same time building up EEC food stocks in that city to the tune of £3 million, and to the tune of many hundreds of millions of pounds throughout the country as a whole? Instead of platitudes from the Box, why do we not have a plan for building trucks to take the surplus food from Britain and Europe to where it is needed in Africa?

Mr. Raison: The very substantial contribution of food by the European Community comes, of course, from exactly those surpluses. Without them, it would be very much harder to find the food.

Mr. Tony Baldry (Banbury): My right hon. Friend will be aware that, a short time ago, the Ethiopian Government promised that they would release a large number of military trucks for use in transporting grain. Recent reports suggest that they have not been wholly forthcoming in meeting that commitment. When my right hon. Friend is in Addis Ababa, will he make it clear to the Ethiopian authorities that the international community expects the Ethiopian Government to co-operate wholeheartedly with Kurt Jansson and the United Nations authorities if they are to continue to receive the same levels of support from the international community that they have received hitherto.

Mr. Raison: I fully understand my hon. Friend's point. It is one of the most important topics that I shall be discussing in Addis Ababa this week.

Mr. Donald Anderson (Swansea, East): Does not the Minister agree that the transport crisis was both predictable and predicted some nine months ago? Have not we and the EEC failed in this crucial last stage of delivery from the ports to the people who actually need help?

Will the Minister now consider air-freighting spares for the lorries? Is he convinced that there are adequate teams of mechanics who will be available on the spot to deal with the lorries? Will he reconsider the withdrawal of the Hercules, a point already put to him? Will he give the present position of the trains for which our British manufacturers tendered in January and to which the slow EEC bureaucracy agreed only in June?

Is not part of the tragedy, as has been mentioned, the contrast between the fantastic response of our people and that of the Government, who have not matched that response, who have given not a penny extra in aid in spite of the crisis, and who in real terms in this year, compared with last year, are giving £30 million to £40 million less in Government aid, which almost wipes out the amount of private money given?

Mr. Raison: The hon. Gentleman's remarks are predictable and misleading. We have made the provision of spares a priority throughout. Nobody could have worked harder in trying to help with the transport problems, particularly on the railways, where we have made an exceptional effort. Our RAF Hercules team is unique. It has carried out operational sorties every day since November.

Of course transport difficulties are great, but we must remember that we are not the Government of Ethiopia or Sudan. Those Governments take the ultimate decisions. We are doing all that we can to help them, but we cannot take over the running of their railway systems.

Mr. John Wilkinson (Ruislip-Northwood): I welcome my right hon. Friend's statement that more transport will be made available to Ethiopia and Sudan, but has internal security in Tigré and Eritrea improved, since the Ethiopian Government's genocidal policy is, to a large extent, the root cause of the misery?

Mr. Raison: As the House knows, the civil war which has been raging in Ethiopia—in Tigré and Eritrea—is one problem which has made it so difficult to get aid to those people who most desperately need it. I shall be talking about that problem during my visit.

Trustee Savings Banks (Ownership)

3.46 pm

Mr. Gordon Wilson (Dundee, East): I wish to raise with you, Mr. Speaker, a point of order of which I have given you cursory preliminary notice about the Trustee Savings Banks Bill, which is due to be debated this evening. The three branches to my argument will be related to conspiracy to deceive the House, hybridity and whether the sub judice rule applies.

When the Bill was introduced, the Government White Paper stated in paragraph 4.1 that there was doubt about the ownership of the trustee savings banks. The Bill was promoted, not directly by the Government, but at the request of the trustee savings banks through their central board. It was said that the legislation was required for two reasons—to settle doubt and to create a new framework for the operation of the banks.

The Economic Secretary to the Treasury told the House earlier this year:

"The TSBs are not owned by their employees or depositors."

Later the Economic Secretary said:

"There is not just uncertain ownership; there is a lack of ownership of the TSBs".—[Official Report, 14 January 1985; Vol. 71, c. 35, 70.]

On the basis of the White Paper and statements by the Minister, we assumed that investigations would be made. This morning a copy of a memorial to counsel and the opinion of counsel dated April 1979 came into my hands. It was by John Murray, QC, to the trustee savings banks' central board about the status of the ownership of TSB (Scotland). I understand that the TSB central board asked for similar opinion of counsel about the status of ownership of the banks in England, Wales and the Channel Islands. I cannot say what the outcome of that will be.

The opinion was specifically requested by the TSB central board and the legislation promoted by the Government is based upon it. Counsel was asked to state:

"Who owns a Trustee Savings Bank and in particular:—What is the nature of the relationship between a Trustee Savings Bank and its various categories of customers?."

I shall leave with you, Mr. Speaker, a copy of that statement, but since all my points are based upon the ownership issue I shall quote one more passage. When relating to legal cases, counsel said:

"In accordance with the general rules for Scots law of unincorporated associations therefore the assets were to be treated as the property of the members."

On the following page, counsel went on——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is really making a speech of the kind that he might make in a debate. Will he put his point of order to me?

Mr. Wilson rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman kindly gave me notice that he intended to raise the matter. I have looked into it carefully and I can give him the answer.

Mr. Wilson: Considering that I intend to allege a conspiracy to deceive the House, I think it worth while to give the background to what has happened. I shall encapsulate it briefly and move on to my three points.

On page 8 of his opinion, counsel said:

"I may be thought to have passed too easily over the question 'who are the members'. I do not think that in Scots law this matter admits of much doubt. The members, in my opinion, are these persons who agree to associate for the relevant purposes, and this they do by depositing a sum with the bank under the relevant conditions".

[Mr. Wilson]

Further down the page, counsel says:

"In my opinion the members for the time being, subject to the qualifications I have mentioned earlier, own a TSB."

There is one major trustee savings bank affected, and that is the one covered by the legislation.

At the very end of his opinion, on page 12, counsel says:

"But I cannot accept as correct the view that a depositor in dissolution is merely entitled to the return of his deposit and interest at some stipulated rate. The measure of his entitlement is related to produce, not interest, and the TSB is debarred from deriving any benefit from the deposits or produce."

Counsel then adds that the provisions of the relevant Act strongly support that view.

Finally, counsel says:

"It would suggest that the only funds held by a TSB not falling to be handed over to the depositors on dissolution will be the 'produce' of sums deposited on a non-interest bearing basis. For the avoidance of doubt I should state that I see no reason why produce should not include 'capital' as well as 'income' produce."

"Produce" is a technical term in Scotland for the reserves of the Trustee Savings Bank.

Either the Trustee Savings Bank's senior trustees have sat on a legal opinion and failed to inform the Government, or the Government were informed of the legal opinion obtained in Scotland and chose to ignore the significance of it and thus mislead the House.

The former Economic Secretary to the Treasury from April 1981 to 1983 is now a director of the TSB central board.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is alleging certain things that the Government may or may not have done. What is the point of order for me?

Mr. Wilson: The point of order—I have already elaborated on the background—is on a matter that is dealt with in "Erskine May" on page 148 of the 1983 edition, where it says that it is an offence to mislead the House.

We have statements on record by a Minister purporting to say that there are no owners of a bank, whereas he is promoting a Bill which seeks to give away the assets of that bank to third parties without consultation with the owners. We have been given certain information, and it is either correct or incorrect. Therefore, it is a very serious matter, particularly if we recognise that the owners of the Trustee Savings Bank——

Mr. Speaker: Order. These are all matters that are concerned with the debate on the Trustee Savings Banks Bill and with the Government. They are not matters for me. The hon. Gentleman must now put his point of order to me so that I can deal with it.

Mr. Wilson: I was doing that, Sir. I was saying that here we are dealing with a bank which is owned by working people, and the resources of which are likely to be disposed of to speculators.

The whole affair of the TSB is either a contempt of the House or a breach of privilege involving the conspiracy to which I referred. It may go further than that, beyond this House.

My second point of order relates to hybridity.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is going well beyond a point of order. If he considers that it is a matter of privilege and writes to me in the usual way, I shall look into it with the greatest care, as I have already fully looked into the matters concerning the Bill to which he has drawn my attention. I think that I should perhaps now rule upon it.

I have considered the point——

Mr. Wilson rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman got into touch with me to put his point of order and I have looked into it very carefully. He is making the speech that he would make in the debate if he were called. I hope that he may be called.

Mr. Wilson rose——

Mr. Speaker: Will the hon. Member put his point very succinctly, please?

Mr. Wilson: My second point of order relates to hybridity, which flows from the whole question of ownership. Until now there has been no problem in relation to this aspect in this public Bill, as the assets of all the trustee savings banks were not appropriated to some other ownership. We now find that, in Scotland at least, ownership could be with the depositors. I shall quote from "Erskine May" to assist you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Perhaps I can help the hon. Member. This is the first time he has drawn my attention to the point that the Bill might be hybrid. It is normal practice for hon. Members to give Mr. Speaker notice of possible hybridity so that he can look into that aspect. I undertake to look into this matter and to rule upon it when the House considers the Bill. I cannot deal with this aspect now.

Mr. Wilson: I shall be very grateful to you, for that ruling, Mr. Speaker. I received this opinion this morning from counsel in Edinburgh and I have only just arrived in the House. I sent a letter to you specifically to give you notice. I am grateful for your statement on that point.

May I mention one last matter? There is a question of the Bill being sub judice because of an action in court. We have information about ownership which completely changes the whole picture of legislation. I am raising this point of order because we may be in danger of perpetrating a scandal on the reputation of the House by seeking at this stage to deal with legislation that is sub judice and may be subject to subsequent inquiry.

Mr. Speaker: I have looked carefully into the matter to which the hon. Member drew my attention. I remind the House of the terms of the sub judice resolution of 23 July 1963 which is prefaced by the words

"subject . . . to the right of the House to legislate on any matter."—[Official Report, 23 July 1963; Vol. 681, c. 1417.]

There cannot be any question of debate on the Lords' amendments to the Trustee Savings Banks Bill being affected by the sub judice rule.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): The hon. Member for Dundee, East (Mr. Wilson) referred to hybridity. You were a Member, Mr. Speaker, when a previous occupant of the Chair had to face a similar situation with respect to the Aircraft and Shipbuilding Industries Bill. He had to make a study of that matter and the debate on that legislation changed dramatically because of his ruling.

The first matter raised by the hon. Member for Dundee, East concerned Lord Bruce-Gardyne and one or two others having their fingers in the pie and obviously making a killing. The second point on the ownership argument is one of which you should take account, as your predecessor did. In view of the previous decision on the Aircraft and Shipbuilding Industries Bill, it would be advantageous for those of us who were not made aware of this problem until the past few minutes if the debate on the Trustee Savings Banks Bill were suspended and dealt with at a later stage. You would be able to make a ruling, Mr. Speaker, and we could delve more deeply into what could be a question of fraud and conspiracy by Government Members either in this place or in the other.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Member is always a great supporter of the Chair, and I am most grateful to him for his advice. I have already said that I shall look into the matter. I shall certainly do so before we consider the Bill.

American Bar Association (Visit)

3.59 pm

Mrs. Ann Clwyd (Cynon Valley): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. My point of order is brief. I am sure that you are aware that the facilities of the House have been severely interfered with today because of the presence of hundreds of visiting Americans. The Welsh room has been turned into a first-aid room, without prior consultation with Welsh Members. The parking facilities for disabled Members have been converted into a portaloo for the visiting Americans. In future, Mr. Speaker, will you give us notice of such changes? Are we being well paid for the loss of facilities?

Mr. Speaker: I shall draw the matter to the attention of the Services Committee. I was not aware of the point that the hon. Lady raises. I am aware that the American Bar Association is holding its meeting here, because I was present this morning in Westminster Hall.

STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

Mr. Speaker: By leave of the House, I shall put together the Questions on the motions relating to draft statutory instruments.

Ordered,

That the draft Electricity (Borrowing Powers) (Scotland) Order 1985 be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.

That the Customs Duties (ECSC) (Amendment No. 10) Order 1985 (S.I., 1985, No. 1027) be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.

That the draft Town and Country Planning (Fees for Applications and Deemed Applications) (Amendment) Regulations 1985, be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.—[Mr. Lennox-Boyd.]

Opposition Day

[18TH ALLOTTED DAY] [SECOND PART]

National Health Service (Pay)

3.59 pm

Mr. Charles Kennedy (Ross, Cromarty and Skye): From one argumentative Scot to another I beg to move,

That this House believes that district health authorities and Scottish health boards should not be expected to find the extra resources in the current financial year that are now necessary to implement the Government's decisions arising out of the recommendations of the pay review bodies; and further believes that if no extra money is provided from the Contingency Reserve there will be a damaging in and unacceptable reduction in real terms in standards of health care.

Mr. Speaker: I have selected the amendment in the name of the Prime Minister.

Mr. Kennedy: In moving the motion, our task and objective is to highlight the disgraceful state of affairs into which the Government are plunging the National Health Service and important branches of it by rather inadequate and third-rate stealth, and to offer a constructive solution to the present financial paralysis facing many health authorities and the nation.

My hon. Friend the Member for Woolwich (Mr. Cartwright), in a question to the Prime Minister, asked whether "any pay settlement for the nurses which is above 3 per cent. must be paid for by savings inside the National Health Service? . . . Is that not an appallingly unfair way to treat a dedicated profession?"—[Official Report, 4 June 1985; Vol. 80,c. 153.]

If the Minister for Health speaks this afternoon, he may have to behave more in his capacity as a Queen's Counsel than a Privy Councillor. The more one studies the Government's financing of the NHS, the more one realises that the description applied to the former Chancellor of the Exchequer in the previous Tory Government could well be applied to the Minister for Health, who displays all the attributes of a barrister trying his best to defend his client without realising that his client has seen the light and changed his plea to guilty.

The unfairness which my hon. Friend tried to highlight was that the lack of extra cash to fund the rewards would lead to job reductions. The complete lack of extra cash in the aftermath of the pay review body recommendations will, as an inevitable and direct consequence of ministerial decisions, lead to a lowering of health provision and a decline in the quality of patient care. That is why the alliance describes the Government's NHS policy as cuts by stealth at the expense of patients. Today we seek to highlight the plight of the NHS, and to persuade the Government to make extra cash available from the contingency reserve.

It is worth putting into context the role and position of nurses within both the NHS and the community as a whole. Who better to quote than the Minister? In a debate on the NHS, referring to the nursing profession's pay increase, the Minister said:

"The Government have made it available to them, because we recognise their abstention from industrial action and the fact that the country, the Government, and the patients in particular, owe them a great obligation. It is irrefutable that it is good news for nurses to have major pay increases, in the second instalment, particularly for the staff nurses and ward sisters. It is irrefutable that it is a major advance for the nursing profession to have a lasting system."—[Official Report, 2 July 1985; Vol. 82, c. 216.]

Those are noble and honourable sentiments, which will command support from both sides of the House. It is sad that, characteristically, the Minister is not living up to his rhetoric at the Dispatch Box in his funding of the NHS.

The Minister and the Secretary of State for Social Services have confirmed that the cost of the pay review body awards would be about £240 million in England in 1985-86. The Under-Secretary of State for Scotland, the hon. Member for Argyll and Bute (Mr. MacKay) who is responsible for health in Scotland, is present, and I shall deal with the Scottish position later. DHSS Ministers make great play of the fact that this year they are cash allocating an additional £500 million, which is equivalent to 5·5 per cent., to branches of the NHS. They refer in particular to the hospital and community health services, and rightly so. However, we must consider what the figure means when it is analysed carefully and beyond the rhetoric of Ministers.

The January 1985 public expenditure White Paper notes that the hospital and community health services will account for more than 70 per cent. of the NHS budget. In 1985-86, current expenditure will increase by 5·8 per cent. over last year's total. The inflation rate, which the Government estimate at 3·5 per cent. and which will produce a notional real terms increase of 2·3 per cent., reflects the Government's general illustrative assumption of a 3 per cent. pay rise in the public sector and a 5 per cent. general price rise in the NHS sector. Those figures are taken directly from the Government's White Paper.

However, there is an important qualification and, for the purposes of the debate, a fundamental point to be made. The assumptions about wage and price increases are fundamental to the forecasts, because the 2·2 per cent. real growth figure has disappeared as a result of the 6 June doctors and nurses pay review body reports. The additional pay costs in 1985-86 for cash-limited NHS services will be 5·4 per cent. for doctors and 5·6 per cent. for nurses. The inflation rate or relative price effect estimate has been pushed up to nearly 6 per cent.—I shall return to that figure and quote the Minister shortly —according to the Social Services Select Committee's sixth report, which was published on 22 June. That would mean a real terms decrease of about 0·3 per cent., which is 0·2 per cent. higher than what the DHSS now concedes was one tenth of a 1 per cent. decrease in 1984-85.

Those detailed figures are based on a careful and serious analysis of the projections and on hard accurate statistics, which the Government have made available in their forecasting and White Paper. The figures are extremely damaging because they point the way to further reductions in patient care and health service facilities to fund the costs of legitimate and well-deserved pay increases for the professions allied to medicine — nursing, health visiting and midwifery.

Mr. Richard Hickmet (Glanford and Scunthorpe) rose——

Mr. Richard Tracey (Surbiton) rose——

Mr. Kennedy: I shall take my pick, but it is something of a Hobson's choice.

Mr. Hickmet: That is not a nice way to describe my hon. Friend and me.

The hon. Gentleman talks about further cuts. Why does he expect further cuts when, since May 1979, the NHS budget has increased by 20 per cent., there are 55,000 more nurses, 6,000 more doctors and dentists, more outpatients and inpatients have been treated, and there are more day patients and home visits? Why does he speak of further cuts when that is manifestly not the case? Does the hon. Gentleman concede that the Government's record on the NHS is the finest since the war?

Mr. Kennedy: I have been a Member of the House for only two years, but I must tell the hon. Gentleman, who entered at the same time as me, that the gullibility of Tory Back-Bench Members never ceases to amaze me. Let us consider the real world and leave the Thatcherite monetarist universe which the hon. Gentleman seems to occupy. Let us consider what those in the front line of the service say about the figures. The hon. Gentleman did not listen—[Interruption.] The public school boys on the Treasury Bench should keep quiet, because we are quoting their figures.

The hon. Member for Glanford and Scunthorpe (Mr. Hickmet) did not listen to what I said. When he talks about last year's figures, he should remember what I said about a 0·1 per cent. cut in real terms, which, on current predictions, will be trebled this year. That will be extremely damaging.

I hope that the hon. Gentleman will agree that the National Association of Health Authorities is aware of the difficulties and realities of providing health care. The Minister for Health visited Cardiff last month, and much good that did the Tory party when the voters were asked for their opinion—[HON. MEMBERS: "Cheap."] It was not cheap. I was an expensive mistake for the Tory party to send the Minister to address the annual conference of the National Association of Health Authorities. To be fair to the Minister, we should argue on his terms this afternoon and use his words as the parameters within which the debate should be conducted. When the general manager of West Lancashire health authority asked him what the funding consequences would be for next year's allocation, the Minister said:

"I do not accept that the award poses any threat to standards of care."

Within the NHS, the Minister's is a lone voice compared with what is being said in the authorities of England and Wales and in the Scottish boards. He continued:

"I just hope we are not looking too far ahead"—

it is good to know that the Health Service is being governed by ad hoc expediency—

"with the implications of this"—

[Interruption.] Those are the Minister's words. Hon. Members should heckle him, not me. The Minister continued:

"After all, we have until next February to fund the full award and I hope we will not hear about cutbacks, which I frankly regard as the routine small talk of NHS politics and not necessary in a well-managed and well-run health service."

That demonstration of arrogance and insensitivity to those who must make the painful choices that will be made necessary by having to fund the nurses' pay award is extremely disturbing.

We should examine what some of those who live in the real world said in response to the Minister's comment. The national association passed a motion calling on the Government fully to meet the costs of the award. The member of Salford health authority who moved the motion said that her authority had already used its efficiency savings—no doubt the Minister will try to tell us about those — and faced a burden of £1 million for wage claims during next year. The person who seconded the motion, who came from North Tees authority, said that patient care would suffer if authorities had to find the cash for awards. Simply to balance the budget, his authority would have to make a 2 per cent. cut, and he referred to this as "crisis management" leading to inefficiency. I ask the House to compare that statement with the Minister's statement that the routine small talk of NHS politics is "not necessary in a well-managed and well-run health service."

We now know who realises the damage that will be caused by the Government's decision in relation to the nurses' pay award.

However, the matter goes deeper and further than that. During a debate on nurses' pay on 25 March this year, the Minister talked about the expected outcome of the pay review structure. Hon. Members should not let him off of that hook this afternoon. He said:

"The result is that all we are doing is facing everybody—Government, health authorities, staff and review body—with the reality that there is a relationship between pay and service provision."—[Official Report, 25 March 1985; Vol. 76, c. 195.]

I am glad that we have established that reality, because the thrust of the argument by alliance Members today will be that, given that the Minister has signalled clearly that we cannot divorce the two elements of Health Service management and delivery of patient care, it is wrong for the Government to argue that, even if they do not provide additional funds to meet the pay increases, there will be no detrimental impact on patient care.

Mr. Tracey rose——

Mr. Kennedy: We have had Tweedledum, so we had better have Tweedledee.

Mr. Tracey: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will give serious instead of frivolous consideration to my point. He talked about service provision. Has he heard about cost effectiveness in service provision? Will he say anything about putting ancillary services out to tender? Has he said a word to the officers of his local health authority about putting services out to tender? He must realise that many costs can be saved in that way.

Mr. Kennedy: Like the hon. Member for Glanford and Scunthorpe, the hon. Gentleman did not listen to what I said at the outset. I quoted from a representative of one authority at the NAHA conference, which the Minister addressed, who recognised immediately that the efficiency savings that the authority had achieved, and which I hope the Minister will confirm have been achieved in many cases, have already been swallowed up as a result of the Government's decision. I was extremely interested to note that the Institute of Health Services Management said that it makes nonsense of Health Service management to try to encourage efficiency savings and then to tell managers that those savings cannot be ploughed back into providing better patient care.

The Minister for Health (Mr. Kenneth Clarke): The hon. Gentleman has been remarkably dismissive, as he is entitled to be, of what I said. He used my words when describing an increase which, this year, will be more than 5 per cent. on part of the pay bill of all health authorities when it comes to meeting the review body awards. Given that authorities have had a cash increase this year of 5·5 per cent. and that they are making cost improvements on top of that, has the hon. Gentleman bothered to check the assertions of one stray delegate from Teesside, or is that his only evidence for sweeping aside the carefully considered financing of the nurses' pay award?

Mr. Kennedy: The Minister is being extremely helpful, because he is falling back—I shall quote his words from the debate of 2 July—on the argument that he used against the hon. Member for Aberdeen, North (Mr. Hughes), who gave an example from his constituency. The Minister said:

"I prefer that intervention"—from a supporter of his——"to anecdotes about a man in Aberdeen."

When it comes to savings, the Minister should take seriously the views of any Aberdonian. He continued:

"It is obvious, apart from anecdotal evidence"—

this from a Minister who talks about me being dismissive—

"that the Opposition have produced from a few places, that pay for nurses and improving the services can go hand in hand if one continues to improve the way that the service is delivered, as the Government have."—[Official Report, 2 July 1985; Vol. 82, c. 215-16.]

It is interesting that the Minister is sticking to that trenchant defence today.

Let me give a little more anecdotal evidence, and consider the difficulties of Bloomsbury health authority. I know that the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) is extremely worried about this matter. The authority faces a shortfall this year of about £1·4 million, and the figure could rise to double that.

In Northampton, the district health authority chairman has already said that he is envisaging a £500,000 cut in terms not only of expanding—we are talking not just about pushing the frontiers further—but of maintaining the service of health care.

In Canterbury, the health authority has lobbied furiously, and the nurses in particularly have met their constituency representative to express their grave concern and the fact that they feel that they are being held open to moral blackmail. That is their phrase.

With regard to the Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security, the hon. Member for Oxford, West and Abingdon (Mr. Patten), his district health authority has expressed its grave concern, as no doubt he is aware, about the effects in the area.

As one piles up case after case, it is not enough to be dismissive. The Minister has been dismissive about the anecdotal evidence, but this is the real front line health care, and these are the people who are having to make the unpalatable choices.

Mr. Frank Field (Birkenhead): On the question of anecdotal evidence, would it not be an innovation in such a debate to hear from Conservative Members anecdotal evidence that the standard of health care in their communities is increasing? Is not one of the problems that, despite the figures which the Government publish, when we go to our constituencies, constituents report cuts rather than increases in services?

Mr. Kennedy: I think that the hon. Gentleman hits the nail on the head. He is correct in pointing out that that kind of constituency surgery experience is by no means confined to Opposition Members; it is also apparent on the Conservative Benches.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The hon. Gentleman keeps referring to me. He began his search for further evidence by citing the example of Bloomsbury district health authority. He knows perfectly well that what is happening in Bloomsbury has nothing whatever to do with the nurses' pay settlement. It has a great deal to do with the implementation of the redistribution of resources between Bloomsbury and other parts of that district and of the country. As the RAWP policy now being implemented by Bloomsbury was introduced by his right hon. Friend the Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen) and has been supported by his party throughout, would he please withdraw Bloomsbury and its £1·5 million as an example of anything to do with the debate?

Mr. Kennedy: I do not know how recently the Minister for Health spoke to Bloomsbury, but we spoke to Bloomsbury last week. He is quite right to say that my right hon. Friend the Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen) introduced the RAWP formula and policy. He is also right to say, as I pointed out in the debate on the National Health Service cuts less than two weeks ago, that we continue to support the thrust of that policy. But he is quite wrong to try to attribute all the difficulties and ills affecting Bloomsbury to the pure product of the RAWP formula. He knows as well as I do that much of the difficulty which Bloomsbury is facing in terms of the £1·5 million, and indeed almost twice that amount, which it is having to find from the figures which it has presented, comes largely from the lack of additional revenue resources which are being made available to implement the pay review body recommendations. It is typical of the Minister to try to deflect the argument on to other ground and to argue some other formula, which is not the core of the debate, to provide the shield for his own inadequate resource support for the National Health Service.

Mr. Laurie Pavitt (Brent, South): Does the hon. Gentleman recall that Golden Square hospital, to which every deaf person in the country has been grateful, and which is attached to the Royal National throat, nose and ear hospital, is a victim also? It is a constituency case in which we know that everything is good, yet the hospital is closed.

Mr. Kennedy: It is interesting to hear in the House and in the National Health Service generally the contrast between the ivory tower which the Minister seems to occupy in regard to NHS funding and the reality in the streets and communities where patients are worried and nurses are disillusioned and depressed about being given a phased pay increase. It is being made clear locally that this can be borne only on the backs of cuts in provisions elsewhere.

Mr. Hickmet rose——

Mr. Kennedy: I shall not give way. I have given way quite a few times. I look forward to the hon. Gentleman's contribution.

I turn briefly — the House will appreciate that it is only fair that I should — to north of the border, Scotland. Thinking about the other land, Wales, I am delighted to note that the cuts in the Health Service and the failure of communication and of content of policy exemplified and personified by the Minister were an important item on the agenda in the Brecon and Radnor by-election. I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Brecon and Radnor (Mr. Livesey) will catch your eye later, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and put the case for the people of Brecon and Radnor who forcefully identified the paucity of the Government's policy.

The Minister will have heard my views on several other occasions, so I shall not dwell on the difficulties which the Highland health board is encountering. In some respects it is akin to the problems which Livingston is encountering with the new West Lothian district general hospital. It is like something out of "Yes, Minister". It has been told that it can open up new and important technological facilities, which we all welcome, but is being given not a penny extra to run them. Highland health board, for example, has two new hospitals, one in Inverness, which will be opened in August, and one in Wick, which we very much welcome. However, in response, Highland health board had to issue a consultative document which envisaged the effect of the closure of two hospitals in my constituency and in the island of Skye—the reduction of maternity facilities to two beds on Broadford at the south end of the island. Those are the kind of hard-line cuts which are having to be envisaged to meet the revenue implications which arise from lack of Government support. The situation will worsen as a result of the pay award.

It is interesting that the position is no better in Ayrshire or in the health board in Argyll.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. John MacKay): Does the hon. Gentleman not realise that the SHARE formula, which is the equivalent of RAWP in Scotland, was designed by the last Labour Government, supported by most of his hon. Friends, in such a way that central Government did not keep back money in order to help with new hospital opening? It was agreed then that all the money should be disbursed and that health boards should plan for the future opening of hospitals. That is what Highland health board has done with Raigmore which is being opened, has patients in it and is in no way like the hospital in "Yes, Minister".

Mr. Kennedy: It is amazing to hear the Minister sound like an Opposition Front Bench spokesman. He blames the previous Government when his own party was elected to government in 1979. If he thinks that the policy is damaging and if he finds the reductions in patient care offensive, why does he not change the policy? He is the Minister with responsibility and authority to implement such changes. We know why only too well. As he proved in such matters as the limited list, he is willing to lie down at the feet of the Treasury rather than fight his corner for Scottish health provision.

We argue today that cash must and should be found. We specifically earmark the contingency reserve as one possible area where cash can be made available. It has been deliberately set high this year and increased by £2 billion which, on the other side of the swings and roundabouts, will mean a further deflationary measure elsewhere in the economy. The contingency reserve has been increased by £2 billion. That is probably due to the Chancellor learning from his experience of a £3 billion to £4 billion overshoot last year. The public sector borrowing requirement currently is set at about £7 billion — approximately one third higher than last year. It would appear that the Chancellor is going to allow for a further £3 billion to £4 billion overshoot this year. We do not know exactly how the Government view public expenditure and whether they are proud or ashamed of it.

The truth about NHS expenditure is that a lot of the overshoot—the item which we are debating today being a notable exception — often comes about by default rather than by design. It comes about through demographic pressures and the pace and pressure imposed by medical technology. It comes about through increasing equipment costs in a financial year. That is why at the time of the Budget, alliance Members argued that PSBR should be increased, and we were quite unashamed about that. The proposed increase to £9 billion was relatively modest by international standards. We said that it would be expansionary, that it would require more borrowing and that we should have to find money to increase real expenditure on the Health Service by 1·5 per cent. per year. Such an increase only begins to make some inroads not so much in keeping pace with expenditure but pushing forward the frontiers of health care. That must be a better resource to fund welcome awards for nurses, widwives, health visitors and other allied professions. We should not forget that there will be more cost increases, which will increase the pressure. Anything less than that approach amounts to a serious cut by stealth.

It will be interesting to see how the Centre Forward Conservatives decide to vote at 7 pm. If they support the Government amendment, which is thoroughly fraudulent and bears no resemblance to the funding problem, they will be supporting later this year, and even more savagely next year, further demoralising, debilitating cuts which alliance Members firmly oppose, based on our carefully costed economic programmes which were published at the time of the Budget. We will try to reverse that trend after the next general election when we assume government.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security (Mr. John Patten): I beg to move, to leave out from "House" to the end of the Question and to add instead thereof:

'congratulates the Government on implementing the recommendation of the Health Service Pay Review Bodies and awarding a fair pay increase to all the staff concerned, with particularly high awards for staff nurses and ward sisters; notes that nurses' pay has risen by 23 per cent. in real terms between April 1979 and March 1985 and will rise significantly this year as a result of the Review Body award; welcomes the 5·5 per cent. increase in health authority and health board funding which, together with the extra resources gained from cost improvement programmes, will enable service developments to take place in addition to the funding of the pay award; and notes with approval the continuing increases in the number of patients treated by the Health Service.'

If I was attempting the briefest possible opening speech, it would go like this. Thanks to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services and my right hon. and learned Friend the Minister for Health, we now have a record number of nurses paid record salaries helping a record number of patients in a National Health Service which is funded at a record high. However, after what the hon. Member for Ross, Cromarty and Skye (Mr. Kennedy) said, it looks as though a bit more is needed.

The motion shows a surprising lack of realism. Rather surprisingly, alliance Members seem today to want to indulge in the luxury of ignoring the substantial improvements that have been made in the Health Service during the past few years. The hon. Member for Ross, Cromarty and Skye is generally a reasonable sort of bloke. We listen to him with care and interest and sometimes with respect for him as a bit of a prodigy—a Boris Becker of the Highlands and Islands, even down to the correct patination.

On 2 July, the hon. Gentleman made some criticisms of Government policy and mentioned the funding of the nurses' pay award. Unlike the Labour Front Bench that day, the hon. Gentleman was realistic about some of our achievements and, unlike today, he was prepared to give credit where credit was due. He talked of our "sensible ideas" and recognised "that cuts in the number of beds do not always mean that there are cuts in health care."—[Official Report, 2 July 1985; Vol. 82, c. 229.]

I welcomed that speech and was looking forward to today's. Alas, today, leading for the Social Democratic party, he seems, in view of his talk of cuts by stealth, accusations about public schoolboys on the Front Bench and savage personal attacks on my right hon. and learned Friend the Minister for Health who, as we all know, is not a robust spirit, to have caught more than a touch of Meacheritis during the weekend. I hope that he will recover soon and return back to his old, balanced, self.

We went over much of the ground that the hon. Gentleman covered today in response to a similarly ill-conceived motion moved by the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher), who we are pleased to see on the Opposition Front Bench. The scene set by my right hon. and learned Friend in that debate hardly lends itself to the prospect of overblown damaging long-term reductions such as the hon. Member for Ross, Cromarty and Skye would have us believe. I shall not repeat what my right hon. and learned Friend said in that debate as we have only until 7 pm and many of my hon. Friends hope to speak.

Nobody would dispute the importance of paying dedicated staff a fair wage for their vital work. I believe that we are achieving the right balance in the NHS. Our concern for the Health Service is amply demonstrated by what we have done for nurses since 1979. There are four main points, all of which, uncharacteristically, the hon. Member for Ross, Cromarty and Skye skated over. First, between April 1979 and February 1986, nurses' basic pay rates will have risen by an average of 111 per cent.— more than 30 per cent. ahead of the forecast rise in prices during the same period.

Mr. Robert Hughes (Aberdeen, North): Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Patten: Secondly, we have reduced nurses' working weeks from 40 to 37·5 hours in 1980-81——

Mr. Jerry Hayes (Harlow): With no loss of pay.

Mr. Patten: —at a cost of £116 million. As my hon. Friend the Member for Harlow (Mr. Hayes) says, there have been substantial increases in pay, not losses.

Mr. Robert Hughes: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): Order. The hon. Gentleman knows that it is for the Minister to decide whether to give way.

Mr. Robert Hughes: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. It is difficult for the Minister to decide to give way when he turns his back on the House and is not aware that an hon. Member is trying to intervene.

Mr. Patten: I apologise unreservedly if I have offended the hon. Gentleman, but I shall not give way to him.

Thirdly, we are now employing more nurses than ever before. The House has heard some criticisms of our conduct of the NHS, but I can announce that the manpower figures for March 1985, which we have just received, reveal that the NHS in England has 401,200 nurses—the most in its history.

Mr. Frank Field: Full or part-time?

Mr. Patten: An extra 42,500 whole-time equivalents have been employed in England since we came to office. The equivalent figure for Scotland is 6,358. Even if we take account of the reduction in the nurses' working week, 18,900 more nurses are on the wards in England. Within those increases, the proportion of fully trained nurses is also rising. More and better care is being given on the wards.

Mr. Hickmet: My hon. Friend will recall the challenge made by the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field), stating that the Government cite the blanket figures of 42,000 in England and 6,000 in Scotland. Is my hon. Friend aware of the position in Scunthorpe general hospital, where the number of staff has increased by 55 in the past year, seven of whom are paramedical staff and five of whom are doctors, where there is a new £30 million building programme and where a new psychiatric wing opened last year?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I remind the House that this is a short debate and interventions, particularly from those wishing to catch my eye later, will prevent hon. Members who wish to make contributions from doing so.

Mr. Patten: I am aware of the improvements to which my hon. Friend the Member for Glanford and Scunthorpe (Mr. Hickmet) referred. I was in the Humberside area two Fridays ago and I heard about how pleased people are with the developments in hospitals such as that in my hon. Friend's constituency and in the nearby hospital in Grimsby.

Fourth and last in the list of improvements for nurses, is the establishment of the new review body to make recommendations about appropriate pay levels. This is a most important step foward. There can be no question but that this represents a major advance for the nursing profession. Nurses have never had their pay determined through a standing system of this type and the two major inquiries that produced for a while substantial pay increases for nurses—Halsbury in 1974 and Clegg at a later stage—were one-off exercises. Consequently, pay levels, for example those established by Halsbury, were quickly eroded as a result of the high inflation under the last Labour Government. By 1979, the pay awards had been written off by inflation. Is the Labour party proud of that? It cannot be. I do not believe that the Labour party did anything other than let nurses and the nursing profession down badly.

Mr. Teddy Taylor (Southend, East): While the Government have every reason to congratulate themselves on this magnificent achievement, does my hon. Friend accept that, under Governments of both parties, there is a special problem of underfunded districts and overfunded regions? Will he be prepared to look into this problem urgently, particularly as Southend is one such area?

Mr. Patten: My hon. Friend knows that I am concerned about the problems of funding in the Health Service in Southend. He has already been to visit me and talk about these matters. He knows that discussions are going on between his health district, the North-East Thames regional health authority and my Department. We are continuing to look at the problem of the Southend health district and I take this opportunity to congratulate its excellent chairman and all those who work in it on what they are doing.

I am sure that the setting up of the pay body has been welcomed, not only by nurses but by everybody in this country who feels an enormous debt of gratitude for the magnificent work that nurses do. Against this background, which was ignored by the hon. Member for Ross, Cromarty and Skye, I move on to the arguments about the 1985-86 pay awards and their funding. I thought that the SDP was keen on fair and even-handed treatment, but the hon. Member looked at the one without having set the scene of the other.

We would have preferred to be able to implement the latest set of review body recommendations all at once instead of in two stages. However, we had to strike a careful balance between the speed of implementation of the awards and the capacity of the NHS to absorb these major pay increases without damaging patient services. Our evidence to the review bodies for both nurses and doctors clearly spelled out that no additional funding would be forthcoming on top of the large increase in cash that had already been made available in the general allocations. It is no good pretending that pay can somehow be divorced from the realities of spending generally in the NHS. We have faced up to this, as any Government must, and have made our position abundantly clear. Pay accounts for between 73 and 75 per cent. of the NHS annual revenue budget.

Nor should it be overlooked that the full rates recommended by the review body for nurses and midwives, like those for doctors, will be in payment well before the end of the financial year. I take just two examples. First, this means that ward sisters and staff nurses, the main clinical grades, will be on pay rates between 9 and 14·3 per cent. higher than they were in 1984. In layman's terms, forgetting percentages, this means that from next February we estimate that the average earnings of a staff nurse will have risen by £11·50 per week and by £21·40 per week for a ward sister. These are very considerable increases.

Secondly, the position of student nurses has improved. They get an increase of £3 to £5 a week. Before Opposition Members start talking about the erosion of pay awards by increases in lodging charges for those in residential accommodation, in which a number, but far from the majority, of student nurses are housed, I point out that residential accommodation charges have gone up by 44p.

Mr. George Park (Coventry, North-East): Will the Minister say something about the effect of this award on nurses' night duty payments?

Mr. Patten: The hon. Gentleman has in front of him, or he would have if he went to the Library or looked at Hansard, the pay agreement arranged between the nurses, the Royal College of Nursing and the Government. The nurses have settled on the figure announced for this year, which includes all their duties. If the hon. Gentleman is telling me that he is unable to recognise genuine improvements in the position of a staff nurse getting £11·50 a week more or a ward sister getting £21·40 a week more, he is blind to the facts. I am afraid that we have to use facts in place of absurd arguments.

I am sure that right hon. and hon. Members on both sides of the House will be pleased to learn that the new pay rates for both nurses and the allied professions have now gone out to health authorities and should be reflected in the August pay packets.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North) rose——

Mr. Patten: I have given way a great deal already and I trust that the House will forgive me for not giving way any more in the interests of other hon. Gentlemen on both sides of the House who wish to make speeches. If there is one hon. Gentleman who would have to wait a very long time before I gave way to him, it would have to be the hon. Gentleman for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn), with his interest in the IRA. Anyone who, like me, has served in the Northern Ireland Office would, like me, treat the hon. Gentleman's attitude with contempt.

Mr. Frank Dobson (Holborn and St. Pancras): The hon. Gentleman is windy.

Mr. Patten: "Windy" describes all too well the hon. Member for wherever it is that the tube stations are located —Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson).

The hon. Member for Ross, Cromarty and Skye made great play of the impact that funding these awards will have on health authorities.

We need to pause and get the funding of the pay awards into perspective. For example, health authorities in England will receive some £9·5 billion in revenue funding from the Government this year. This includes a cash increase of over £500 million for 1985-86. Scottish health boards received £1·35 billion, a cash increase of some £70 million. Health authorities have also told us that they plan to realise about £150 million extra this year through their growing programme of cost improvements—something largely ignored by the hon. Member for Ross, Cromarty and Skye. In Scotland, health boards are doing the same, including the health board that is chaired by the hon. Gentleman's former headmaster.

Mr. Kennedy rose——

Mr. Patten: I did not intervene in the hon. Gentleman's speech but I shall give way once more, in recognition of the hon. Gentleman's important Front Bench position.

Mr. Kennedy: Will the Minister confirm or deny my argument, based on the Government's White Paper and applying the Government's Treasury GDP deflator technique, that last year there was a 0·1 per cent. reduction in output, and this year this has been increased threefold to 0·3 per cent.?

Mr. Patten: One has to look at figures that demonstrate the economic cost of the services being provided.

In the face of the formidable additional sums which have gone into the National Health Service, linked to the equally formidable sums of cost improvement, both south and north of the Border, it is completely misleading to suggest that the pay rises of nurses and doctors can only be met at the expense of patient services. It is obvious that decisions like this, taken during the course of the year, sometimes require the revision of short-term plans, but flexibility like this always has and always will be a characteristic of NHS planning. The vast majority of authorities recognise this and will cope more than adequately with the pay bill costs that they face this year.

I was surprised that the hon. Member for Ross, Cromarty and Skye indulged in speculation about the prospects for 1986-87 and future expenditure years. It does the NHS no good if, far from talking about the current or the past position, people indulge in highly speculative and morale-damaging allegations about the future, and I do not propose to join the hon. Gentleman. The effect of the staged awards on next year's pay costs will be taken into account in the public expenditure review. I hope that those who are making alarmist statements about problems that they imagine will arise next year will take note.

I reject the hon. Gentleman's strictures. My right hon. and learned Friend the Minister for Health and I stand by the Government's record. I am convinced that the Government's treatment of this year's award represents a highly satisfactory outcome, which is fair to nurses, taxpayers, the NHS and NHS patients. I believe that, together, the review body that we set up in 1983, our increased spending on the NHS and its better management is enabling us to begin to solve sensibly the difficult and complex problem of settling the pay of nurses. This is essential to the united aim of the Government and the NHS to improve the service that we provide for patients. Nurses and doctors have a critical role to play in achieving that aim.

I am slightly confused about the health policy of the Social Democratic party and about how it hopes to help more patients. Is the SDP's health policy the same as the Liberal party's health policy? If not, how does it differ from the Liberal party's policy? We may be told by the hon. Member for Leeds, West (Mr. Meadowcroft) when he winds up the debate. I understand that a little later tonight those hon. Members who want to do so can hear him play the clarinet in the Liberal jazz band. It will be interesting to see whether he and his SDP friends play the same tune about health care.

Every time we look at the policies of the Social Democratic party and the Liberal party we see very wide gaps between them. Is the gap on health as wide between the Liberal party and the Social Democratic party as it is between the unilaterialism of the Liberal party defence policy and the nuclear deterrence defence policy of the SDP?

Dr. Brian Mawhinney (Peterborough): Does my hon. Friend agree that it will be interesting to see whether the spokesman for the Liberal party mentions patients in his speech, and in particular whether he is able to bring himself to appreciate the substantial increase in the number of outpatients, inpatients and day case patients who are now being treated by the NHS? It will be interesting to see whether he welcomes that increase or whether he denies its existence, which was the theme of the spokesman for the Social Democratic party.

Mr. Patten: My hon. Friend is characteristically right, so I am pleased that I acceded to the temptation to give way to him. Either the hon. Member for Leeds, West must agree that more patients are being treated nationally and locally, or he must disagree with his hon. Friend the Member for Ross, Cromarty and Skye. He cannot have it both ways. The Liberal and Social Democratic parties cannot try to have it both ways in public relations but then go in two separate directions over policy, one party being in favour of unilateral disarmament, the other party being in favour of nuclear deterrence. Shall we find that the same differences exist over NHS policy as exist over economic policies, with one party liking free market economics and the other party wanting to manage everything in sight? The Liberal party opposes the use of nuclear power for providing energy, while the SDP supports it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: That is the third occasion upon which the Under-Secretary of State has mentioned nuclear policy. It is far removed from the amendment that he is supposed to be moving.

Mr. Patten: I apologise profoundly, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for having gone down that road. I thought it was important that the general public should know about the substantial policy differences between the Social Democratic party and the Liberal party and that it should be exposed in a way that the press is all too disinclined to expose. We shall have to wait and see how big is the gap between them on health matters. However, the hon. Menber for Ross, Cromarty and Skye has made no case this afternoon which allows us to understand any more clearly his party's health policy. He made no case at all for his motion and I must invite my right hon. and hon. Friends to reject it in the Lobby.

Mr. Michael Meacher (Oldham, West): The Opposition support the motion. It is broadly in line with our own response to the Government's handling of the pay review body's awards that were announced on 6 June. I agree with many of the points made by the hon. Member for Ross, Cromarty and Skye (Mr. Kennedy). It is even more significant that in the reply of the Parliamentary Under-Secretary—or PUSS as I believe he is known in the trade—he played the usual gramophone record about the Government's performance but in a characteristically ungenerous speech flailed about at everything in sight and said embarrassingly little about the subject under debate, and very little indeed about the funding of the pay award for nurses.

There are three aspects to the awards about which we made strong objections at the time and about which we still object. First, there is a marked difference in the time scale for implementing the awards, which severely discriminates against nurses. The award for the armed forces was met in full and was backdated to 1 April. The award to the doctors was met in full and paid from 1 June. The award to nurses, midwives, health visitors and professions allied to medicine is, however, to be held back for 10 months.

On the nurses' pay review body the Minister, with a wonderful elasticity of language, said:

> "We are accepting the review body's recommended levels and we will bring them into payment in full as soon as we can."

When translated, I think that he meant: "The Government have rejected the review body's proposals for nurses and midwives and will pay the recommended increase only for the final two months." For almost the entire year, nurses will receive, at most, 5 per cent. This will leave them below the rate of inflation and will do nothing to eliminate low pay among unqualified nurses who are living on the poverty line.

The Opposition's second objection is that, compared with last year, the funding arrangements represent, by any standard, a major tightening of the screw on the National Health Service. In the year before last, the Government covered 100 per cent. of the pay award to nurses out of central funds. They were quite right to do so, and we would do the same. Last year, the Government covered £180 million only out of the £216 million award to nurses and related groups, which is 83 per cent. This year they are covering only 33 per cent. That is a measure of the sharpening pressure on NHS budgets during the last two years.

Our third objection is that the whole exercise has involved the declaration of a pay norm that the Government know to be completely unrealistic as a way of camouflaging the imposition of further cuts. To that extent I agree with the hon. Member for Ross, Cromarty and Skye, who referred to making cuts by stealth.

The Minister has denied that he set a 3 per cent. pay ceiling at any time. But it is clear from reading the document that both the permanent secretary, Sir Kenneth Stowe, and the chairman of the NHS management supervisory board, Mr. Victor Paige, told the Select Committee on Social Services that the pay assumption was 3 per cent. If the Minister doubts that, I suggest he reads the record. The Government know perfectly well that a 3 per cent. limit can never be met while inflation is running at 7 per cent. and pay settlements generally at something between 7 per cent. and 8 per cent. It was simply a device to offload most of the onus for meeting the pay claim on to the health authorities, and the Government knew it must lead either to cuts in nurses' jobs or to cuts in services to patients. Either way, that is moral blackmail.

The Minister chose to disregard these criticisms in the bland statement he issued at the National Association of Health Authorities conference in Cardiff last month. That cannot have been one of his most enjoyable visits. At that conference he said he was > "'singularly unimpressed' by any English health authority which said the nurses' settlement would have any impact on its budgeting plans."

He went so far as to say:

> "I must greet with disbelief any authority saying it cannot afford the full cost of the nurses' pay award."

I have news for the Minister. The disbelief is all on the side of the health authorities, who view such a dismissive statement from the Minister as either supremely arrogant or astonishingly naive. A great many health authorities believe that the nurses' pay award cannot be met without substantial cuts. It is not difficult to see why.

Sir Nicholas Bonsor (Upminster): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Meacher: No, not until I finish this section. I will say why we believe that that crucial point is the case. In a year when the total cash increase for hospital and community health services in England was £521 million —that is the Government figure—this pay award alone will cost health authorities £240 million. Even those health authorities which receive additional cash to help them cope with demographic pressures will find that this money is needed to fund pay awards, and savings obtained from cost improvement programmes will have to be diverted from new developments, for which they are intended, to compensate for this.

That is because this year's pay award to nurses and doctors can be accommodated—this is the crucial point Ministers have to answer — within health authority budgets only if prices rise by only 5 per cent. — as everyone knows, they are currently running at 7 per cent. —and only if pay to other Health Service groups does not exceed 3 per cent. Ministers and possibly other hon. Members know that a pay increase to other Health Service workers of 4·7 per cent. has been rejected. The Government's only refuge is to talk, as the Minister has done many times and as his hon. Friend did today, about efficiency savings. But in this world, one does not get owt for nowt, as they say in Lancashire.

So-called efficiency savings, which is a euphemism if ever there was one, are bought at a price, and are often achieved only at the expense of reduced maintenance and repair work or through land sales or the postponement of new projects. That is not a saving at all. It is simply an uneconomic deferment of today's problems until tomorrow when they will be solved often at higher cost. The cost of the Government's foolish policy, not the savings, was pinpointed recently by the Audit Commission. Its report drew attention to the fact that completing the backlog of repairs to hospitals would cost £1,700 million. That is some efficiency saving, if it is at the price of postponing those repairs even further.

Mr. John Patten: Will the hon. Gentlman give way?

Mr. Meacher: The hon. Gentleman was exceedingly rude about many Opposition Members and I feel tempted not to give way. However, as I am a little more generous than the hon. Gentleman, I will give way.

Mr. Patten: I am very grateful to the hon. Member. Does he not recognise that one of the reasons that the backlog, both in the capital programme and in building maintenance in the National Health Service, grew so much in the late 1970s was the savage 30 per cent. cuts in the NHS capital account that the last Labour Government set in train?

Mr. Meacher: The hon. Gentleman's attempt to defend the Government would be much more plausible if the Government's current spending on investment in the Health Service was up to the level achieved by the last Labour Government. When the Government can achieve that performance, they might have some case.

The Government's excuse about efficiency savings needs to be met once and for all. It resolves itself into two options: either maintenance or repair work or new projects needed now are postponed, in which case the eventual cost to the NHS will be substantially higher and efficiency savings can be seen as merely storing up bigger trouble for tomorrow; or this needed work is carried out now, as it should be, in which case there will have to be other cuts in the Health Service to meet these pay awards. Either way, it must surely be clear to everyone in the House that a sizeable funding gap cannot be filled by glibly trotting out phrases like "efficiency savings".

Exactly the same conclusion was reached by the Select Committee on Social Services in its sixth report, published on 12 June. In a carefully argued passage in paragraph 13 the Committee says:

"the additional pay costs in 1985-86 for cash-limited NHS services would be 5·4 per cent for doctors and 5·6 per cent. for nurses. The Department is unable to give a sensible estimate at this stage for an HCHS pay and prices factor, because of the outstanding pay settlement for other NHS staff."

I understand that. The report continues:

"It is highly unlikely that inflation in the HCHS will be under 5 per cent. If it were to be 6 per cent, that would leave an input volume figure of −0·2 per cent, similar to 1984-85."

Leaving aside the jargon, that means a cut, and on the most careful analysis, the Select Committee on Social Services, on which Conservative Members have a majority, arrived at the conclusion that, based on the likely level of this year's inflation, there will be cuts in services. That is the report to the House of the Select Committee on Social Services and its analysis of the evidence. The report makes it clear that, far from there being any growth in the NHS services this year, following these pay awards there will almost certainly be cuts.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I always regret, almost as soon as I get up, arguing against the hon. Gentleman's tortuous use of figures. He will admit that the passage he has read is about measuring spending in the Health Service in relation to pay and price movements. It says that "if" the pay and prices factor inside the NHS were to reach 6 per cent. then there would be a reduction.

Mr. Dobson: That is what my hon. Friend is saying.

Mr. Clarke: The hon. Gentleman is either not listening or not understanding. We are talking about 1985-86. The nurses' award is 5·6 per cent., but we do not have a settlement for the other staff. An amazing settlement for the other staff would be required to take it up to 6 per cent. on that basis alone. The hon. Gentleman is being alarmist by taking an inflated view of the likely level of inflation for the whole year, which he thinks is going to come to 7 per cent. That is the highest estimate that I have ever heard. That has been driven up anyway by mortgage interest, which is not, to my knowledge, paid by health authorities. Even the month-to-month figures have been driven up by factors which health authorities do not meet. The hon. Gentleman has also overlooked the effect of the reduction of national insurance contributions in this year's Budget. Those are paid by health authorities on the great bulk of their staff.

For all those reasons, will the hon. Gentleman admit that once again he is going through the evidence of a Select Committee desperately trying to put together unlikely figures to turn £500 million of increased cash limits into an alleged and fictitious cut?

Mr. Meacher: The Minister is getting very worried at my simply repeating what the Social Services Committee said. If he disagrees with the Committee, perhaps he will give us his estimate of the likely pay and prices factor for this year. If he disagrees with 5 or 6 per cent., I will give way so that he can give us his estimate of what he thinks it will be.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The hon. Gentleman forgets that a moment ago he said that it was fair for us to say that we could not give an estimate because we had not yet settled. Therefore, will the hon. Gentleman stop basing fatuous cases on hypothetical assumptions?

Mr. Meacher: The other way of putting it is that the Minister cannot deny that there may be a pay and prices factor this year which will lead to cuts in the NHS.

What worries health authorities most is the fact that the situation could become much more serious next year. They are having to meet two thirds of the 9 per cent. nurses' pay award from February next year, and if a similarly large proportion of next year's pay award were left unfunded by the Government—given the trend of the past two years, that is extremely likely—health authorities could find themselves forced to make far bigger cuts than anything yet contemplated.

I shall give the Minister several examples, which he will be pleased to hear are not anecdotes. I have been in touch with several health authorities about how they propose to fund next year's pay award. In West Lambeth — [HON. MEMBERS: "Ah!"] West Lambeth is a significant health authority. The Minister wishes to sack the members because of their unwillingness to carry through cuts which will amount to £80 million by 1993. The West Lambeth treasurer tells me that, as a result of the authority having to fund most of the pay award, there will be a shortfall of £450,000 this year and of £1 million next year.

The health authority already has to cut £1 million from next year's budget—the Minister wishes it to do that—in addition to suffering a cut of a further £1 million in RAWP money, making a loss of £3 million by 1986-87. The authority told me:

"Inevitably, there will be cuts in services to patients" either in acute beds or in putting a stop to community development.

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Meacher: No.

Salford said that the fact that it is being required to fund most of the nurses' pay award will produce a shortfall in finance for health services of £360,000 this year and £1 million next year. It does not have a development fund and gets money from the region only for specific programmes.

The Salford authority says that it has cut everything possible over the past few years, and all that is left to be cut are services to patients.

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: Rubbish.

Mr. Meacher: The hon. Gentleman knows nothing about Salford. His intervention demonstrates either arrogance or absurd pretentiousness.

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Meacher: No.

As a result of having to fund most of the pay award, the Brighton health authority will have to make cuts of £500,000 this year and £1·3 million to £1·5 million next year. I have with me Brighton's document "Impact of Pay Review Body Awards and Increased Rate of Price Inflation on the Finances of the Authority", which makes it clear that the authority is planning cuts from among 60 items. They include taking all or most services from Hove and Lewes hospitals, not replacing consultants when they retire, employing trainee nurses rather than trained staff in GP surgeries, abolishing the ambulance bus service for the sick and frail, reducing nursing cover on night duties, reducing cleaning standards in staff accommodation, charging low-paid NHS staff more for meals, cutting staffing levels on long-stay wards, reducing training spending, reducing fire precaution levels, reducing the quality of services in the control sterile supplies department and reducing family planning and dentistry services. [Interruption.] Here is the report: if the Minister does not believe me, he can read it for himself.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Having listened to that list, all I can say is that they must be paying their nurses a fortune in Brighton.

Does the hon. Gentleman accept that the two authorities that he has quoted—West Lambeth and Salford—are both overspending authorities and that the changes that they are having to make are to get back within planned budgets? The previous Labour Government insisted on that policy. Whatever arguments we may have about the overspending that has happened in Salford and is planned in Lambeth, all Governments have insisted that health authorities live within cash limits, and neither case has much to do with the nurses' pay claim.

How can all those cuts be necessary in Brighton when the pay award to nurses is costing only 5·6 per cent. this year? Does not the hon. Gentleman accept that all this is based on a hypothetical assumption about next year's PESC settlement and next year's cash limits? None of the health authorities, any more than the Government and the Opposition, can have firm figures. We have not even started speaking to the Chief Secretary yet. I do not know the figures, never mind Brighton knowing them.

Mr. Meacher: The Minister must get out of the doublespeak in which he indulges so readily when he talks about overspending. Underfunding is causing all the difficulties. It is not a case of authorities overspending and having to be brought back within budgets. The Minister is imposing intolerable strains on health authorities that are trying to provide a decent standard of service for patients.

My final quotation comes from the Lewisham and North Southwark health authority. In a letter to the Secretary of State dated 26 June, the authority said:

"This Health Authority . . . views with disdain this Government's repeated abdication from its responsibilities to fund fully pay awards to which it is a willing party. In not funding fully such pay awards, this Government is displaying a cavalier and uncaring attitude towards our staff and those people with whose health-care we are entrusted. Should this Government claim that those monies voted by Parliament are sufficient to cover any underfunding of pay awards, then we can only conclude that this Government has no understanding, by design or otherwise, of the parlous and precarious state of NHS provision in this inner London Health District attributable directly to this Government's attitude to Public Spending."

That comes from a Tory-dominated health authority.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Meacher: No. I know that the health authority is in the hon. Gentleman's constituency, but I must get on.

Like so many health authorities, Lewisham and North Southwark has a majority of known Tory supporters. Its letter shows how exasperated health authorities, even Tory authorities, are becoming at the Government's high-handedness in forcing major cuts, especially next year, which cannot be absorbed, whatever productivity improvements are made and however much the Minister juggles the figures, without significant cuts in patient care.

If the Minister cannot or will not see that fact, it is high time that he took the telescope from his blind eye and started looking directly at the facts and at what health authorities are telling him.

The heart of the debate is the central question of NHS funding. I cannot repeat too often or too strongly that there is no way that an adequate health service can be provided on a budget that is unchanged as a proportion of GDP or, even worse, on a budget that represents a declining share of GDP over the next few years, as the Government's public expenditure White Paper suggests is proposed.

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Meacher: No.

Under this Government, Britain is the lowest spender on health services in the western world. We spend only 5·7 per cent. of our GNP on health, compared with 8 per cent. in France and Germany, 9·5 per cent. in the United States and 10 per cent. in Sweden. Those are enormous differences between countries. We are not just marginally lower than our competitors; we are substantially lower.

The Government seek to force health authorities to fund most of the pay award to doctors and nurses and to force them, without extra Government funds, to cope with major new and pressing requirements, which are not the Government's fault, but have arisen in recent times—such as community care provision, countering AIDS, cervical screening, containing the spread of hard drugs and countering further outbreaks of Legionnaire's disease. That is impossible within an NHS budget that is declining as a share of overall national resources.

That is why the Government stand condemned and why no amount of special pleading about cost improvement programmes or so-called efficiency savings can insulate the Government from the stark reality that they are trying to force on to health authorities the onus which falls squarely on the Government for failing to fund the National Health Service properly.

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: Will the hon. Gentleman now give way?

Mr. Meacher: No.

Sir Nicholas Bonsor rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Member for Upminster (Sir N. Bonsor) must resume his seat.

Mr. Meacher: It is not that health authorities are guilty of overspending. It is that the Government are guilty of underfunding. Until the Government reconsider that position and the increasingly intolerable consequences on the ground in terms of patient care, the Opposition will be supporting the motion.

5.21 pm

Mr. Richard Livsey (Brecon and Radnor): I hope that the House will excuse my by-election voice, which is compounded by a heavy cold.

First, I pay tribute to the late hon. Member for Brecon and Radnor, Mr. Tom Hooson. He was an excellent constituency Member and has been taken from us at an early age. He was dedicated to the people of Brecon and Radnor and served them well. I am sure that the House will wish to join me in remembering his good work and in extending great sympathy to his family. [HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."]

The people of Brecon and Radnor have entrusted to me the great privilege of representing them here in Parliament. This I shall do to the best of my ability. You, Mr. Deputy Speaker, will know that I was brought up amongst them and therefore feel well qualified to communicate with them and they with me, so that our voice can be heard here at Westminster.

Without doubt, Brecon and Radnor is the finest constituency in Britain. Its beauty is unsurpassed in all of Wales, and the great quality of its people was recognised by the huge numbers of people of all political persuasions who visited us during the recent by-election. In fact I see many familiar faces on the Government Benches, and I am told that no fewer than 150 members of the official Opposition visited us. I also saw them in the highways and byways of my great constituency, some in Brecon, some in Llandrindod Wells, others in Knighton and Ystradgynlais, and some, too, were even lost.

Brecon and Radnor is a series of communities, many of which are very small. The result is that the people are great individualists and rightly expect a lot from their Member of Parliament—hence my voice at the moment —and from their Government.

The people of Rhayader will not tolerate being ignored or their efficient Vickers factory being under threat as a result of the privatisation of British Shipbuilders. Builth Wells was up in arms about the Audit Commission's thoughts on denying it a new school. Brecon would not suffer the closure of St. David's hospital, nor would Crickhowell tolerate the closure of Cwrt y Gollen camp. Ystradgynlais and its people have seen levels of unemployment in excess of 18 per cent. for far too long.

The by-election was fought and won largely on the issue of cuts in public expenditure. These are policies being implemented by the Government and they have been found wanting by the people of Brecon and Radnor. Opposition to these cuts was focused on education and other local government expenditure, farming and especially the National Health Service.

I was brought up in Talgarth, a town which is almost entirely dependent on National Health Service employment. The NHS employs 2,100 people in the constituency. There were many problems identified during the by-election campaign, but the future for the NHS in Brecon and Radnor is grim.

Government cash limits throughout Powys area health authority allow a 3 per cent. increase in 1985-86, yet the nurses are to receive a 9 per cent. award, well deserved but not exceptional taking into account that it covers a two-year period.

According to the chief executive of Powys area health authority, the net effect is a deficit of 5·4 per cent. on the area health authority budget for 1985-86 not catered for by the 3 per cent. increase in cash limits. The knock-on effect for the authority is to have to find £700,000 in the current year to finance pay awards from within its own resources — this in a budget of £21·496 million. The latest presumption is that a further £1·3 million will have to be found in 1986-87.

I draw attention to the fact that 78 per cent. of the area health authority's expenditure in Powys goes on salaries. If this is related to the 1986-87 figures it will, taking account of Powys area health authority's average employer's cost of £8,000 per employee, result in a possible loss of 126 jobs within the authority.

[Mr. Richard Livsey]

If losses in Government revenue from redundancy payments, national insurance and tax losses, and VAT are taken into account, the so-called saving of £1·3 million will cost the Government £1·89 million in lost revenue and at the same time inflict great hardship on the people of Brecon and Radnor.

These figures imply that a £1 restriction in cash limits has a consequent loss of revenue of £1·45 in the first year —in other words, a net loss of 45p. This is surely the economics of despair.

These matters also cast suspicion on the Government's claim nationally of a 20 per cent. real growth in National Health Service funding since 1979. There was a 30 per cent. increase in nursing staff salaries in May 1979, and there has been a reduction of two and a half hours per week worked by nurses since 1980. If this is coupled with a 2·5 million increase in out-patients since 1980, a 650,000 increase in in-patients and 300,000 more day patients in the same period, Health Service output has increased significantly.

These factors must surely be taken into account in future policy decisions about the National Health Service. The service requires adequate funding and a built-in allowance for an increasing aging population. This is a particular problem in my constituency and featured very strongly in the by-election campaign.

Brecon and Radnor is a fine constituency traversed by the valleys of the rivers Usk and Wye. It is farmed supremely well, whether in the uplands of Radnorshire or in the Brecon Beacons, and in the great traditions of its livestock farming. The rewards of honest endeavour at present are declining farm incomes. These good people of Brecon and Radnor, whether in the hamlets, villages or towns such as those of Sennybridge, Llanwrtyd, Presteigne and even "independent" Hay-on-Wye, all need a better future.

Our small businesses and communities must be allowed to thrive. Nor should we forget the immense job that needs doing for the area of Ystradgynlais and its fine people. The Government must provide us with the means to get aid from the European social fund. The need is quite clear. All that is required is the will power to provide it.

I dedicated myself to Wales, my constituency and its people—to work constructively for them all. Will the Government of the day take their cue from the verdict of the people of Brecon and Radnor and work for them, too?

5.29 pm

Mr. David Heathcoat-Amory (Wells): It is my pleasure to be called immediately after the new and hon. Member for Brecon and Radnor (Mr. Livsey) and to welcome him to the House.

I speak for all right hon. and hon. Members when I say that the House will appreciate his generous tribute to his predecessor, who was a brave and much-respected Member and who sat on the Government Benches. He practised what many Liberals preach by way of community politics, and I hope that the hon. Gentleman will serve his constituency as well as his predecessor did.

The hon. Gentleman has started well. His speech was responsible and constructive. I hope that his tenure of Brecon and Radnor will be glorious, even though it will necessarily be brief.

A general feature of health services everywhere is that there is no natural level of expenditure and no level of expenditure that satisfies the requirements put on it. Expenditure can increase practically without limit. That is partly because demand is increasing. For example, we have an aging population, and the number of old and very old people will increase dramatically by the end of the century.

I pay tribute to the private sector for looking after large numbers of elderly people in nursing and residential homes. About 30,000 people are looked after in nursing homes. That is often done more economically than would be possible in the public sector or in geriatric hospitals. I urge Labour Members to think long and hard before they dismiss the private sector in that respect. Where would those people go if the Labour party carried out its threat and shut down or restricted the entire private sector?

Demand for health care is increasing for other reasons. We are now better at diagnosing diseases and there is an almost inexhaustible supply of new technology in the health sphere. The effect of the new technology is perverse. In industry, the introduction of new technology usually leads to savings in manpower—at any rate in the short term—to a reduction in unit costs and to lower revenue expenditure. A new piece of equipment in a hospital can have the opposite effect. It tends to increase demand. Expenditure rises and often new staff are required to service and look after it.

The advance of medical science is almost without limit. That is welcome because it means that previously incurable illnesses can be treated. It also means, however, that treatments costing a few hundred pounds last year can be replaced by new treatments costing a few thousand pounds this year. It will always be difficult to accommodate such increases in expenditure in a budget which, in overall terms, can increase by only a few percentage points annually.

If medical need is to be the sole criteria, there will be no limit to the scale of expenditure, because, if any human being anywhere is receiving a more advanced type of treatment, it will be open to people to demand that treatment, and patients and doctors will say that they need it, that the NHS should supply it and that the Government should pay for it.

There is no escaping the fact that there is no level of expenditure or increase which will ever meet medical demand in its entirely. That is why, in the real world, choices must be made and priorities set. There will always be allegations that some treatment is being denied one or other group of patients. That fact must be faced by any party in office, and that is why I have been disappointed by the speeches made so far by Opposition Members. They have not addressed themselves to the central facts of expenditure in relation to health care.

Labour Members should think carefully about their policy of ending private medicine. I have spoken of that in relation to the care of the elderly. How could the NHS cope with the additional patients if the private sector were shut down? How could it manage without that revenue and still have resources over to increase expenditure in the ways in which Opposition spokesmen promise?

Dame Jill Knight (Birmingham, Edgbaston): I urge my hon. Friend to pay tribute also to the way in which the private sector makes available pieces of equipment which the NHS would find it difficult to buy.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for making that important point. It is a partnership between the private and public sectors. That, under the present Administration, is enabling many patients to receive advanced medical care which would otherwise not be available to them.

Nor should Opposition Members be so dismissive of the internal economies and efficiency savings that have been achieved and the scope for funding at least part of the nurses' and doctors' wage award out of further economies. The hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) seemed almost to say that economies were impossible. I put that down to his lack of business or any other practical experience. He can take it from me that it is possible in any undertaking to increase output while holding costs.

Mr. Michael Meadowcroft (Leeds, West): Will the hon. Gentleman accept that the amount of expenditure that is not represented by staff costs in the NHS amounts to about 25 per cent.? Thus, the savings that can be made in percentage terms bear more heavily on that component than on staff costs. If, however, savings are made at the expense of staff, what happens to those who are made unemployed? Presumably the net cost would not be great enough to warrant the redundancies that might be thought worth while if the policies that he is advocating were taken to their logical conclusion because the low-paid, being almost invariably those who are made redundant, cost almost as much to keep unemployed.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: I shall come to the question of the balance of staff and other costs later in my speech. The answer to the rest of that intervention is that the hon. Gentleman's argument is a case for making no economic change at any time. If his argument is generalised, everyone must stay in his or her existing job from now until the end of time.

I hope that Opposition Members are not so naive in relation to efficiency savings to imagine that only recorded and published savings give the full picture. It is of benefit to have in-house services and the knowledge that performance can be assessed against some external yardstick. Those concerned then know that their ultimate job security depends on their performance and the performance of the units in which they work. That feeling is familiar to anyone working in industry, but it has not been sufficiently prominent up to now in the NHS.

Naturally, people prefer a quiet life. Few organisations ever reform themselves. That is why the Government must keep the pressure on. It is no criticism of existing NHS managements to say that there must be areas of waste, overlap and duplication still to be found and corrected. With almost 1 million people employed in the NHS, it is fantastic to allege that no further economies can be made. Of course they can, and it is no disrespect to the administrators at present in the health service to say that. Above all, let us end the obsession with how much money we are putting into the NHS and concentrate instead on how that money can be turned into patient care for the maximum number of people.

Mr. John Patten: I am interested in my hon. Friend's remarks about the level of NHS expenditure. Does he agree that we should not compare carelessly or easily the amount of the gross domestic product spent in this country on health care with that of other countries? We should relate that expenditure to the quality of health care that is given. Does he agree, for example, that it is extraordinary for the NHS to be spending at the present level of GDP and to be achieving lower perinatal mortality and higher life expectancy rates than are being achieved in the United States?

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: It is an achievement of the Government that they have not only provided more resources for the Health Service, but have made them go further.

I was disappointed with the speech of the hon. Member for Ross, Cromarty and Skye (Mr. Kennedy), which was all about cash and resources. He said almost nothing about patients and patient care and the performance of the NHS.

I do not wish to get into the statistical quagmire with the hon. Member for Oldham, West. He was obviously confused by the figures and failed to present a convincing case using them. The overall expenditure increase of 17 per cent. in real terms during the past six years gives the lie to the allegation that the Government are relentlessly cutting or dismantling the NHS. My hon. Friend the Minister gave a detailed breakdown of the figures, and they will no doubt be referred to again.

The hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field), who is not currently in the Chamber but who intervened earlier, said that figures were one aspect, but that there was no anecdotal evidence from Conservative Members that health care was increasing and improving on the ground. I can help the hon. Gentleman with that. The people at the western end of my constituency will soon have the benefit of a new, large, modern hospital at Weston-Super-Mare. During the past six years capital expenditure has increased substantially more than it did during the previous six years. The treatment of the mentally ill and mentally handicapped in Somerset is undergoing a process of structural change and reform. That will not save money, but it will improve care. The change will involve the closure of a number of large hospitals, including the Mendip hospital in Wells, and the transfer of patients to smaller satellite units, community residential units and day care units.

That change is controversial in many respects and some people think that the trend towards community care for the mentally ill has gone too far—and I am inclined to agree with them. The new structure will not save money; indeed, the budgeted costs will be somewhat higher than at present. The emphasis is on improvements in care. The increased costs—which will be modest, but nevertheless will occur — have been agreed with this so-called uncaring Government.

Mr. Kennedy: I suspect that the hon. Gentleman did not deliberately misrepresent what I said. He is describing what is happening in his local area, and I am listening to him with care. Can he tell us how much direct benefit will accrue to his area as a result of the health authorities having to meet the cost of the nurses' pay award?

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: My regional and district health authorities are perfectly confident that they can proceed with budgeted plans on capital and revenue expenditure and meet the nurses' pay award.

Reference has been made to inflation in the NHS being faster than the general index of prices. It has been alleged that, therefore, spending increases have not really taken place. The reason for a faster rate of inflation in the NHS is precisely because wage costs and wage awards have risen faster than the retail prices index. Nurses' pay rates have risen by 23 per cent. during the past six years, but, even after taking account of that price deflator, it is still true to say that there has been a substantial volume increase in NHS expenditure during the past six years. Nothing that Opposition Members may say, either inside or outside the House, can alter that fact.

Opposition Members appear to be saying—and it is reflected in the motion before us—that we should have two NHS budgets: one for pay and one for general expenditure, and both of them elastic. I do not think that that is a sensible way to run the NHS. No commercial organisation can regard its wages bill as separate, to be topped up by an outside body from time to time. Indeed, it would be quite wrong and damaging for future negotiations if the Government stepped in in that way this year. If that happened, the review body and the Health Service negotiators would know that they were not working within a strict financial framework, but that their recommendations, negotiations and settlements could always be funded by some additional levy on the taxpayer. That is an old, familiar story of nationalised industry. We have been trying to move away from that way of settling our affairs. Let us not re-import it into this year's—or any year's—negotiations.

If anything, I believe that this year's award highlights the problem of having an independent review body. I appreciate that it is convenient for Ministers to have such a body, and I pay tribute to its work in juggling some of the gradings within the NHS. But, by and large, it is better if those who pay the piper also negotiate with the piper.

It would have been better if the alliance had faced that issue rather than, as usual, following the path of least resistance and calling for more public expenditure. The alliance has a long way to go, based on today's debate, before it can pose as a credible party of government.

Mr. Willie W. Hamilton (Fife, Central): The hon. Member for Wells (Mr. Heathcoat-Amory) said that the debate was about priorities, and to that extent I agree with him. Every Government must decide how much they allocate to health, defence, education and so on. Everyone who listens to or reads the debate must know that the NHS is in a shambles. It is being ruined day by day. That is why we are supporting the motion tonight.

I congratulate the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnor (Mr. Livsey) on his speech, especially for its brevity, clarity and the unequivocal statement that he won his seat because of the Government's neglect of the NHS in that area. Other hon. Members throughout the country know that to be true.

The Government themselves, when they prepared their paper for the National Economic Development Office, provided figures showing that £1,700 million would be required to renovate and maintain our existing hospitals. The Government even said that that figure might be wrong because it included estimates for repairs to hospitals that should be demolished. That is the state of our National Health Service today.

The Government's amendment congratulates them on "implementing the recommendations of the Health Service Pay Review Bodies".

Quite frankly, that is a lie. If I am called to order, I shall say that it is a deliberate distortion of the truth. They are not implementing the proposals of the review body, which said that the award should be paid in full and backdated to April. The Government are making an award of 5·6 per cent. now, but the nurses will have to wait until next February for the rest. In other words, it is jam tomorrow. Meanwhile, some of the nurses have to make do with less than 5 per cent. while prices are increasing by 7 per cent.

The Government are saying to the nurses, "You are wonderful people and because you are so dedicated we shall cut your standard of living." That is what the figures mean. A 5 per cent. increase in salary and a 7 per cent. increase in prices results in a 2 per cent. reduction in a nurse's standard of living. However the figures are dressed up, they mean a cut in the standard of living for tens of thousands of nurses.

Pupil nurses and first and second-year student nurses will have an increase of 4·7 per cent. or 4·8 per cent. up to next February. Hon. Members may argue that student nurses are training for qualifications, but we are talking about cheap, exploited labour. Even with the increase, those kids will receive only £80 a week gross.

The Nursing Mirror carried an article the other day about student nurses. It warned:

"Staff shortages are putting patients' lives in danger by leaving student nurses alone in charge of wards."

That is being said not by the Labour party but by the Royal College of Nursing. The article continues:

"A survey of 1,000 nurses showed that 31 per cent. of student nurses were often left in charge of wards, usually at night. Another 61 per cent. had occasionally been left alone. Staff shortages are blamed. Nearly 90 per cent. of qualified nurses in the survey said that they had warned hospital authorities that staff levels were dangerously low. Young students were being left to cope with acutely ill and dying patients.

That is said by the Royal College of Nursing Students Association head, Miss Sandra Mills. That is what is happening in the real Health Service.

The Minister behaved like a juvenile delinquent when he adopted his sneering manner today. He treated everyone who dared to criticise as either ignorant or malicious. We know from our surgeries throughout the country that we are talking about the real Health Service.

In their amendment the Government preen themselves on the "particularly high awards for staff nurses and ward sisters".

Of course the £6,000 starting point for newly qualified staff nurses is good, but only because the salary has been so inadequate. The staff nurse is the key nurse in any hospital. The maximum pay for a staff nurse in 1982-83 was £7,008. In 1983-84 it was £7,569. I obtained the figures in answer to a written question on 10 July last year.

The hon. Member for Wells (Mr. Heathcoat-Amory) talked about priorities and how we pay different rates for different services. In 1982-83 an untrained, unqualified police constable was paid a maximum of £9,798. By 1 September 1984 his maximum pay had risen to £11,193 — about £3,600 more than the maximum for a fully qualified and fully trained staff nurse in our hospitals. Does anybody in the country or in the Government dare to say that a fully qualified staff nurse is not worth as much as a police constable?

Government Members say that throwing money at the problem is no good, but that is exactly what they have done with the police. There is no talk of cash limits for them.

Mr. Kenneth Hind (Lancashire, West): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hamilton: No. The hon. Gentleman has only just arrived. I want to make my case and then sit down.

I say good luck to the police. In 1980 the police had an increase of 21·3 per cent. In 1981 they received another 13·2 per cent., in 1982 a further 10·3 per cent., in 1983 another 8·4 per cent. and in 1984-85 a further 5·1 per cent. Let us compare those figures with the figures that apply to nurses, who this year receive a miserable 5 per cent. it is not worth tuppence. The Government are throwing money like confetti at the police and armed forces when the nurses have to wait.

Mr. Hind: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hamilton: No.

Mr. Hind rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Member is not giving way.

Mr. Hamilton: The hon. Member for Lanarkshire, West (Mr. Hind) has only just come into the Chamber. He wants to intervene only to prove to his constituents that he has taken part in the debate.

The Minister did not mention waiting lists. Since the Government came to office there has been an increase of 15 per cent. in the number of people on waiting lists.—[Interruption] I see that the Minister is impatient to intervene. He has given me figures about waiting lists for Scotland. In March 1980, a total of 69,904 people were on the waiting lists in Scotland. In March 1984, 85,364 people were on the waiting lists. The provisional figure for March 1984 was 83,061—an increase of over 18 per cent. That is the measure of how the Health Service is failing the people.

Mr. John McKay: The reason for the increase is the dispute in the National Health Service which the hon. Gentleman supported day after day, despite the damage that it was doing.

Mr. Hamilton: I thought that the Minister would say that. The figures up to that date were not down. I challenge the Minister to say whether he is claiming that over the next two years the waiting lists in Scotland and in the United Kingdom as a whole will be reduced. If he is not prepared to say that, it is a measure of how the Government are failing the people of Scotland and the United Kingdom.

Mr. Hind : Give way.

Mr. Hamilton: No. The hon. Gentleman must contain himself. The Government talk about priorities——

Mr. Hind: Give way.

Mr. Hamilton: No.

The Government talk about shortage of money. If there is a shortage of resources in the Health Service they should explain why they are spending £2,000 million over the next three years on 1,200 folk in the Falkland Islands. They can find money for that. Members of the Labour party should go on repeating that because it is indefensible and a waste of public money. That £2,000 million would be far better spent on the Health Service, for the good of the 56 million people in Britain, rather than being poured down the drain for 1,200 people 8,000 miles away.

5.59 pm

Mr. Jerry Hayes (Harlow): There is always a whiff of unreality and almost a whiff of hypocrisy when the House discusses an Opposition motion on the Health Service. There could be nothing more unreal and hypocritical than the speech that we have just heard from the hon. Member for Fife, Central (Mr. Hamilton). The hon. Gentleman comes to this House with his heart on his sleeve, telling us what this wicked Thatcher junta is doing to the Health Service and forgetting what his own Government did.

We had the privilege of listening to the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) giving his swansong as the Opposition spokesman on the Health Service. The right name for him would be "Mr. 30 per cent.", because he was a Minister at a time when the Labour Party cut capital expenditure on hospital building by about 30 per cent.

Under the Conservative Government, 35 hospital schemes in excess of £5 million each were completed between 1980 and 1984. In addition, 11,000 new beds have been provided, together with 169 new operating theatres, 105 X-ray rooms, 25 accident and emergency departments, and 22 out-patient departments.

Admittedly, the hon. Member's speech was not quite so over the top as his previous speech, and I am delighted to see that he is sweetening his words. That is understandable. With the gaffes that he is making, he can only sweeten his words, because he never knows how often he will have to eat them.

Mr. Hind: Will my hon. Friend bear in mind that the hon. Member for Fife, Central (Mr. Hamilton) ignored the fact that when the Conservative Government took office in May 1979, the NHS waiting list was 749,000? It is interesting to note that the hon. Gentleman is leaving the Chamber. Before the dispute that he supported, the waiting list had been reduced to 619,000. Even after that dispute, the waiting list is still much lower than it was when the Labour Members Government left office in 1979.

Mr. Hayes: My hon. Friend is 100 per cent. correct.

If Labour really cared about patients, the hon. Member for Oldham, West would be the first to get up and say that he wholeheartedly condemned the decision made the NUPE annual conference to abandon the TUC code of conduct about giving industrial cover for emergency services. It is important to note that Labour Members will not condemn action that they know will jeopardise the old, casualty wards, and young people.

Although there is a whiff of hypocrisy and unreality about the debate, and although I am the first to congratulate the Minister for Health and his able deputy on their success in increasing finance for the Health Service, I must draw attention to two problems that affect my district health authority.

I find it a peculiar paradox that the British Medical Association tells us that there are 700 junior doctors unemployed, and that 20 per cent. of junior doctors have experienced six months' unemployment over a two-year period, when in my authority in the past month a casualty ward has been closed in three hospitals, not through lack of resources or lack of finance. [Interruption.] Opposition Members may laugh and joke but I have spoken to the administrators of those hospitals, and they have assured me in writing and orally that it is not due to lack of finance. The difficulty that the NHS faces is a shortage of casualty locums. Surely it is not beyond the wit——

Mr. Kirkwood: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hayes: I will give way in a moment if the hon. Gentleman will be patient and let me finish the point I am making.

It is a paradox that casualty wards are being closed not through lack of finance or resources or because of the alleged cuts that Opposition Members talk about but because people on programmed leave cannot find the locums to replace them. I ask my right hon. and learned Friend to look at that paradox. Surely it is not beyond the wit of the DHSS to put right those imbalances.

Mr. Kirkwood: I shall not debate with the hon. Gentleman the point that he is making. Having introduced the debate, I simply want to ask him whether he believes that health authorities should be given additional support by the Government to meet the pay increases of nurses, midwives and other sectors of the Health Service which have been recommended by the pay review bodies.

Mr. Hayes: As the hon. Gentleman knows, this is a wide-ranging debate. I notice that the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody) has joined us. Sadly, I note that she is not wearing a fur coat.

I assure the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood) that I am particularly worried that there will be difficulties in financing and funding the pay awards, which are especially generous. My right hon. and learned Friend and his able deputy, the Under-Secretary of State, have said that the Health Service should be cost-effective. That statement is greeted by the Opposition with howls of derision, but why should the Health Service be cost-effective? Why should not doctors understand the true cost of the treatment that is given to patients? Why should not the Health Service be run on a more commercial footing, so that the benefits may go directly into patient care?

We have had the Rayner reports and the efficiency reviews, and my own health authority has been particularly good in cutting back and allocating directly to patient care the resources that have been saved. In the next few years my health authority will be gaining about £20 million extra resources for the centralisation of acute casualties. There will be benefits all over my constituency and in neighbouring constituencies as a result. However, there are problems to which I must draw the Minister's attention.

The Government rightly say, "Make your health authority cost-effective. Run it like a commercial enterprise." Last year we had 4·2 per cent. allocated to us for pay awards. Rightly and properly, we shall have to find, on average, 8·6 per cent. for the nurses and about 12·1 per cent. for the additional workers. We have not settled on the figure for the ancillary workers, and we still have to find 6·3 per cent. for the doctors and nurses. On a half-yearly basis there will be a shortfall of £450,000. In a full financial year there will be a shortfall of £1 million.

The shortfall will cause us several problems which, sad to say, will be reflected in patient care. It would be wrong and irresponsible to deny it. I am grateful for the considerable efforts made by my right hon. and learned Friend and his deputy in giving an extra £500 million—an additional 5·5 per cent.—to health authorities this year.

My health authority is not a RAWP gainer but a RAWP loser. It does not gain from the efficiencies. I know from where this funding will come. It might mean the closure of an acute ward in Princess Alexandra hospital in Harlow, costing £200,000, an acute ward at St. Margaret's hospital, costing £200,000, a children's ward at Herts and Essex hospital, costing £105,000, the accident and emergency department at Herts and Essex hospital at Bishop's Stortford, costing £105,000 and the associated casualty ward at the same hospital, costing £200,000, a reduction in community nursing at Waltham Abbey, costing £100,000 and the closure of the minor injuries ward at Saffron Walden hospital costing £30,000.

Mr. Robert Hughes: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hayes: I shall not give way, out of deference to all those hon. Members who want to speak.

I support the Government's policy and the amount of money that they have put into the Health Service—20 per cent. in real terms since 1978. Since then there have been 12 per cent. more in-patients, 45 per cent. more day care attendances, 52 per cent. more patients accepted for kidney failure treatment and 112 per cent. more heart bypass operations. It would be foolish and churlish to ignore that.

I ask my right hon. and learned Friend the Minister to consider generously in the next financial settlement the plight of authorities, such as mine of West Essex, which have shown that they are prepared to make themselves cost-effective and put themselves on a commercial footing and which are not RAWP gainers but RAWP losers.

Mr. Laurie Pavitt (Brent, South): I wish to pick up some of the points of the hon. Member for Harlow (Mr. Hayes) in my own time and in my own way. The nurses have been conned and the con trick has been compounded by hypocrisy. The Government have made great play of the fact that they are accepting the pay award. I pay great tribute to the review body, which has done a first-class job, but the Government have not accepted its recommendations. As my hon. Friend the Member for Fife, Central (Mr. Hamilton) said, once again for the nurses it is jam tomorrow, never today.

Nurses suffer from the effects of two public attitudes —the Florence Nightingale attitude, whereby nurses are expected to live on pay that is not incomparable with the pay during the Crimean war, and from the attitude of "the nurses are so good; it will be all right tomorrow". In this case, "tomorrow" does not come until next February.

I am sorry that the Under-Secretary of State did not have a good day today. He was forced to flail around a number of other subjects. The hon. Gentleman is not usually short of matters to bring up. Nurses' pay in 1985-86—I do not need to labour the figures—means that they have been short-changed. The 10-month delay is exceptional—doctors faced a two-month delay. Why have one rule for doctors and another for nurses?

The next pay award for the nurses will be made on 1 April 1986, and the review body will have to report back after that date. If the Government persist in their policy of phasing, in three years the nurses will have lost at least one year's worth of pay increases.

The Under-Secretary of State referred to the board and lodging charges for the people who will get the least out of this pay packet. Whereas nurses will not receive their pay increases until the end of August, board and lodging and other service charges for nurses who work in hospitals have increased. For four months these nurses paid extra money out of a pay packet which has not yet shown their pay increases.

The Government made great play of the fact that the nurses could have a review body on condition that they did not strike. For that reason the nurses were to have what the doctors have had since the 1960 Pilkington award. The Government know that the nurses never strike. Nurses have been disadvantaged compared with doctors. The doctors went on strike twice in 1974—first the junior doctors went on strike and then the consultants worked to rule. At that time my colleague Barbara Castle was Secretary of State. Because of the doctors' struggle in 1975 and 1976, the waiting lists increased tremendously and it took six or seven years to start to reduce the numbers. Yet there is no thought of stressing a condition of no industrial action in relation to the doctors.

When discussing the way in which nurses' pay has been funded we always come back to what has happened before. The Prime Minister makes this point regularly. Conservative Members say that between 1974 and 1979 there was a tremendous cut in capital expenditure. I can claim some credit for that. When Barbara Castle was made Secretary of State I was privileged to attend the planning conference at Sunningdale with the chief medical officers and the various boffins who surrounded the Secretary of State. About 75 per cent. of the huge resources of the NHS go towards pay. After the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath) had had his four years in office, the Labour Government were faced with a choice. Once again, the Labour party came into office after a balance of payments deficit when the country was bankrupt. The choice was whether to give the money to people or to give it to buildings. Should the money be given to nurses or towards more equipment? I believe that the Labour Government were right to cut capital expenditure. The nurses' only good pay award was the 1974 Halsbury award. They could not have been given that award had the Labour Government not been prepared to cut capital expenditure so that nurses could have a fair deal.

The North-West Thames regional health authority is the authority for my area. I received an emergency notice stating that this year the authority has to find another £2 million. This is disastrous for economic planning, because budget estimates are made at the beginning of the year. What happens if, half-way through the year, the authority is told that it has £2 million less? It is nonsense for the Under-Secretary of State to say that these measures will not interfere with patient care. They can do nothing else but interfere. The Government cannot suddenly say in the middle of the year that the authority has to take £2 million out of the amount budgeted for, and claim that this will not interfere with patient care.

For three years every regional health authority was given a certain increase in its budget—about 0·5 per cent. for the North-West Thames regional health authority—through the RAWP formula. The North-West Thames regional health authority has had a tough time. During the past three years a percentage of the increase has been for efficiency savings. It is money that is not given but has to be found within the budget. For three years there have been cuts in each of the regions, under the various budget headings, to make efficiency savings.

The wretched computer is a further con for the nurses because it cannot make payments before the end of August. Therefore, although the announcement was made in June, nurses do not see the money until four months after it is due. I know of no other employees who receive such treatment, yet we pay lip service to nurses and say how marvellous they are.

The Minister keeps saying that the Department does not yet know what it will receive from the Exchequer next year, and that it is still making estimates. The North-West Thames regional health authority now has a chairman, Mr. Doughty, and a general manager, Mr. Kenny, who has the same job that he held previously, but has been given more money and a fresh title. They say that next year £6 million more will be needed for nurses' pay on this award alone. Taken over the whole country, next year there will be another increase in nurses' pay. Therefore, unless the Government do a U-turn in their public expenditure policies, the money will not be available.

The second cheat relates to the £240 million which should have been paid on 1 April but which will start to be paid at only 5 per cent. at the end of August. Therefore, the Government will borrow money from the nurses for four months. Every year out of the kindness of its heart the Department of Social Security gives pensioners a £10 bonus. Considering the present rates of interest, if the Government have any sense of justice, they could give nurses in their Christmas pay packets the amount of accrued interest which the nurses will have lost during four months.

We bandy figures about, and I know no better jugglers of figures than the Minister for Health and the Secretary of State for Social Services. One minute money is there, the next it is not. I do not accept that the productivity argument for industry and commerce applies to the NHS.

Mr. John Patten: In my introductory remarks I said that, net of the reduction in the nurses' working week, 18,900 more nurses were on the wards than in 1979. Does that or does that not represent an improvement in health care in England?

Mr. Pavitt: That does not. The reduction in the working week from 40 to 37·5 hours accounts for a great deal of that. The latest figure I have from the Department of Employment shows that 9,500 nurses are on the dole. As I said earlier, the Minister chooses the figures to make selected points.

If the Department of Employment could announce to the House that 650,000 more people were in full-time employment and that 2·5 million more people were in part-time employment, that would be a success. However, when one learns that 650,000 more people are chronically ill and need hospitalisation, and that 2·5 million more people are so ill that they must be referred by their general practitioner to an out-patients department, that is a failure. It is a reflection of sick people in a sick society. There cannot be 4 million people unemployed without all the stress and problems that the NHS must counteract accumulating.

[Mr. Pavitt]

The Government have deceived the nurses by the funding of the pay award. I hope that the nurses will remember that when the Minister, or, if all the prophets are right and he climbs up the ladder before we return from the summer recess, his successor next deals with the subject. I hope that in the Queen's Speech he will guarantee that next year the nurses will not have a con trick played on them, as they had this year.

Mr. Richard Tracey (Surbiton): I welcome and congratulate the new hon. Member for Brecon and Radnor (Mr. Livsey). I am sorry to see that, having burst into the debate, he rushed out quickly; I hope that he does not find the House so fearsome that he has returned to the Brecon Beacons so soon. Today he has witnessed mark 2 of a Lib-Lab pact, with an appendix written by the Social Democratic party. When the debate is reported the public will know that the hon. Member for Ross, Cromarty and Skye (Mr. Kennedy) did an Armageddon job on the state of affairs in the National Health Service, and that the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) who is almost Armageddon itself, completely agreed with the speeches from the SDP Bench. We saw a similar great unity at the end of the 1970s, which led us into the disastrous position that then produced a large Conservative majority to run the country and the NHS properly.

I welcome what my right hon. and learned Friend the Minister for Health said in his interventions, and what my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security said about the Government's record on the NHS. The hon. member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field), who also burst into the debate and rushed off, asked whether we had received compliments from our constituents. My constituents who have been treated at Kingston hospital —the main hospital in the Kingston and Esher district health authority — are full of compliments for the doctors' and nurses' services, the food, the cleanliness, and every other aspect. If the hospital's record is ever attacked in the press, anybody who has been treated there jumps to its defence.

Mr. Hayes: My hon. Friend will undoubtedly have seen the recent Marplan poll which showed that 90 per cent. of those asked were satisfied and felt that they were well cared for by the NHS.

Mr. Tracey: I have seen that Marplan poll, and I noted that the Audit Commission found a similar high standard in the NHS when its officers reported.

Throughout the Health Service there are undoubtedly more doctors, more nurses, more out-patients being treated, more highly technical operations carried out, such as heart bypasses and kidney transplants, more dental treatment and a large hospital building programme. I welcome the Government's decision on the nurses' pay award.

The hon. Member for Ross, Cromarty and Skye has asked when we shall spell out how we shall pay for the extra award to the nurses, if we do not take money from the contingency fund. I refer him to the words of the amendment in the name of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister. It states that the Government

"welcomes the 5·5 per cent. increase in health authority and health board funding which, together with the extra resources gained from cost improvement programmes, will enable service developments to take place in addition to the funding of the pay award."

That is the key factor, and answers his question in plain language.

Mr. Kennedy: Will the hon. Gentleman answer the question which the Under-Secretary of State, who spoke about many issues which had nothing to do with nurses' pay or the funding of health authorities, was not keen to answer? Will he answer the economic argument based on the Government's figures, which I spelled out in my speech? Is it not the case that, when the percentage figure in the Government's motion is analysed under the constraints against which the Government measure health spending, in the present year there will be a 3 per cent. cut?

Mr. Tracey: The hon. Gentleman made that point earlier, and I am sure that my right hon. and learned Friend the Minister for Health will answer it with complete authority.

My main reason for speaking in the debate is to stress that substantial savings can be made through the cost-effectiveness programmes. In May this year, my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State, answering a question in the House, said that £13·1 million savings had been made from cost-effectiveness programmes, £10·7 million as a result of contracts going out to tender and £2·7 million as a result of in-house savings after putting services out to tender. Those savings have been made in only a few district health authorities—the ones that have grasped the nettle, carried through the process faithfully and contracted out their services.

It is possible to achieve anything up to the remarkable savings—58 per cent.—made by Merton and Sutton district health authority on the cleaning of St. Helier hospital at Carshalton. The in-house service cost £1·4 million, and the new service costs £583,000.

Why will not Opposition Members, whether from the Labour party or from the other half of the new Lib-Lab pact, encourage trade unions to pursue those policies in better faith? Why do they always wish to destroy the efforts of district health authorities to put services out to tender? Why must the TUC produce propaganda documents——

Mr. Corbyn: Trade unions oppose the privatisation of cleaning and other services because the job is done less efficiently by private enterprise, and workers have worse conditions, lower wages, shorter holidays and fewer work prospects.

Mr. Tracey: That is an almost perfect paraphrase of the propaganda that one hears from Opposition Members.

Mr. John Patten: My hon. Friend mentioned the considerable savings made at St. Helier hospital. Alas, I must report to the House that one criticism of the district health authority was that the standard of work done by NHS employees was lower than the standard of work carried out by private contractors. It should not have been the case, but unfortunately it was.

Mr. Tracey: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. I wish to illustrate how far from the truth was the intervention of the hon. Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn). There is no doubt that the TUC and the Health Service unions have pursued a campaign of destruction and cynicism when attempts are made by district health authorities to put services out to tender. A classic example was Addenbrooke's hospital in Cambridge, whose problems have been reported in the House and outside by my hon. Friend the Member for Cambridgeshire, South-West (Sir A. Grant).

I end with the specific example of Barking hospital. Following a strike by cleaners in March 1984, the TUC reported a lack of regular and effective cleaning, resulting in the presence of grease, dirt and cockroaches. At the request of trade union representatives, an inspector from the Health and Safety Executive made three visits to the hospital. He reported:

"As you know, I have recently made a series of visits to Barking Hospital to look at the standard of cleaning. I have visited in my opinion a reasonable cross-section of wards, public areas and service areas. On each occasion the hospital has been very clean and I have no cause to criticise. Accordingly I have no recommendation to make."

That report was made during the first year of the contract. It has been renewed by Redbridge district health authority for a further four years, which represents a saving of £150,000 a year and a total saving of £750,000. Such savings could be made in many district health authorities, and they would more than adequately fund part of the nurses' pay award.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): The hon. Member for Surbiton (Mr. Tracey) has just demonstrated everything that the Tory party hates about the Health Service. Conservative Members hate Health Service workers, especially the lowest-paid ancillary workers. That is why they are trying to destroy their jobs through privatisation, and their living standards through the inevitable cuts in wages and working conditions that follow privatisation. The brave people at Barking and Addenbrooke's hospitals, who fought for the principle of high standards of cleanliness in hospitals, deserve more praise than the hon. Gentleman gave to them.

I am sponsored by the National Union of Public Employees, which, with other unions, has many members among nurses and midwives in the NHS. The speeches of Conservative Members have not adequately demonstrated to the House the attitude of nurses and midwives to the Government and to the pay increase that has been offered. It is one of disgust and anger, and of shame at being stuck between a Government who will not adequately fund the Health Service and increasing demands for better health care. They are told that the real problem in the Health Service is high pay. That is why they are so angry about what the Government say about them.

NUPE has produced a substantial document entitled "End Poverty Pay—A Strategy for the 1980s", which tries to describe the erosion of the wages of local government and Health Service workers. It states:

"Each year we are climbing up an escalator that is moving down, as the rising cost of living cuts away at our living standards. In some years we can beat inflation and our members are better off. But the Government is making it more and more difficult to climb the escalator, blocking our way with cash limits, the threat of job cuts and the threat of privatisation. So in some years the pay rises we are offered do not even match the cost of living."

That is true of the pay increases that have been offered to some nurses and midwives.

I should tell the House how appallingly low NHS pay is. Under existing pay arrangements for ancillary staff, who are the lowest paid in the NHS, 58·7 per cent. earn less than £100 a week, 92 per cent. earn less than £150 a week and 10 per cent. earn less than £68·70 a week. By any standards, those wages are disgraceful. Before the Government's announcement, 33·1 per cent. of nurses and midwives earned less than £100 a week, 74·1 per cent. earned less than £150 a week and 10 per cent. earned less than £80·60 a week.

Everyone recognises that those who work in the Health Service, in whatever grade, have valuable and responsible jobs. Nurses and midwives are doing extremely valuable and skilled work. How many Conservative Members would be prepared to live on those wages? How many of them go round the country saying what a splendid job the nurses do, but are not prepared to pay them for the work that they must do? That is the issue facing us.

Under the Government, the way in which the poverty trap and the funding of the Health Service and local government work means that the people who have lost out most are already the worst off, and their prospects, particularly those of the nurses after this settlement, are not very good. There are 550,000 people employed as nurses, which is 484,000 whole-time equivalent jobs.

To give a couple of examples of the sort of pay levels I speak of, a nursing auxiliary will get an increase of £3·30 per week as a result of the settlement. Even under the retail price index figures—and people do not live on the retail price index but on what they can afford to buy and to eat—nursing auxiliaries should have an increase of £5 per week. A sister will get an increase of £36·42 per month. All these figures are verifiable, and in my view they are disgraceful.

Conservative Members have made great play of the way in which they believe hospital waiting lists are being reduced and, indeed, of the way in which they believe Health Service expenditure has gone up. I wish to quote from a letter written by Mr. D. J. Holdstock, MD, FRCP, of Ashford hospital, Middlesex, which appeared in The Guardian of 13 July:

"Mr. Clarke claims that the NHS is treating more people. Like most statistics emanating from the Elephant and Castle, this is a myth. Many patients, particularly the mentally ill and elderly, are readmitted many times, having been discharged not because they are well enough to remain in the community, but to make room for others who are worse. Mr. Clarke's figures refer to numbers of admissions, not individuals. Community care, when it is available, is labour-intensive and therefore expensive; often it is a euphemism for care by hard-pressed and unsupported neighbours or relatives."

Many people in the country would support that statement and agree with it wholeheartedly.

The Government stand condemned for their attitude towards the Health Service and Health Service workers, whom they expect to bear the brunt of Government cuts in the Health Service and of hospital closures, of which more than 200 have occurred since the Government came into office. The Government expect these people to care for those who have been so badly treated by a Government who claim that they support the National Health Service when in reality they are reducing Health Service standards in the country. If hon. Members cared to talk to people who work in hospitals and to people who are or who expect to be patients in hospitals, they will observe a dangerously low level of morale and a deep feeling of anger towards the Government. People look forward to the day when the Government are swept out of office and those who genuinely care about the health of the people of the country are put into office.

Mr. Michael Meadowcroft (Leeds, West): I am glad that so many hon. Members have taken part in this important debate even though some were rather wide of the mark in their comments. I had hoped that we would have more of substance from the Under-Secretary. I had hoped that we might have had a rather more formidable attack on the form of words of the motion and a more passionate defence of the amendment.

At one point, the hon. Gentleman used some figures to match nurses' pay to inflation. It is important that we study the figures carefully. Their validity depends on what base year one uses. If one takes the base year of 1979, there has been some increase in the comparison between nurses' pay and inflation since that time. As was mentioned by the hon. Member for Brent, South (Mr. Pavitt) the fact remains that, if one considers the year following the 1975 Halsbury report and awards, nurses' pay has not yet got back to that same level.

Mr. James Couchman (Gillingham): Under the Lib-Lab pact.

Mr. Meadowcroft: The hon. Member for Gillingham (Mr. Couchman) assists me in his reference to a pact. I would be as critical if not more critical of members of the Labour Government who allowed nurses' pay to slip back more than the Conservatives.

The figure dropped between 1975 and 1978, it picked up a little in 1979—and we might speculate on the reasons for that—and it picked up still further in 1980, but it has dropped back since and has never returned to the 1979 level.

The Under-Secretary also challenged us on patient numbers. He said that we ought to come clean on whether we were prepared to accept that more patients were treated. Of course I accept that. There is some element of double counting of people. He referred to the number of treatments. If people are discharged early and have to go back into hospital, they count as two patients in the figures. This should be recognised.

One cannot always measure the adequacy of care by the number of patients treated. I have referred on other occasions to renal work. The local health authority in Leeds is delighted to have less dialysis done because this means that more transplants are carried out. It wishes to see a reduction in the number of patients because this means better health care. As large mental health institutions are closed, there will be fewer patients in NHS care, but more people out in the community, and again, the figures will go down. Therefore, I do not see that the number of patients being treated is an adequate measure of improvement in the Health Service. I would argue with the hon. Gentleman, as I have done on other occasions, that the Government might better claim that the health of a country has improved because fewer people are being treated than claim that this is so because more people are being treated.

The Minister then tried to drive a wedge between the two parties in the alliance. I will give him the official alliance policy position. It has to be recognised that, in the great mass parties in the Chamber, there are differences between all sorts of people. The hon. Member for Harlow (Mr. Hayes) veered a bit here and a bit there, but he expressed his opinion. He was not entirely without criticism. That will happen with all mass parties. Ultimately, one has to come down to some agreed statement, and I will give it to the Minister. The joint programme for the last election, in 1983, stated:

"the continuing commitment of all NHS staff is vital if the health service is to deliver the best care it can. This means that NHS staff must be properly and fairly treated. We gave our commitment . . . to determine pay in the public services by a new system based on fair comparison with other groups and a fair arbitration procedure which will also apply to NHS staff."

I think that that is straightforward. The Minister asked for it, and he has it.

After that, we went all round the block—defence, nuclear power and even jazz. I am not averse to a plug for the band—heaven knows we need it—but with no admission fees. I am also worried about the reference to the band because I have maintained my reputation as a musician by never playing in public, and I was hoping to continue in that.

What is rather alarming—it may be a new trend in the speeches of the Minister—is that, just when I thought that he was going to return to the motion and to the peroration, he sat down. I could not understand this. Not only was there no peroration, but there was no finger wagging. Where is the Minister without some finger wagging?

It was a pleasure to hear the contribution of my new hon. Friend the Member for Brecon and Radnor (Mr. Livsey). Indeed, I anticipate that the increased frequency of the alliance Opposition days will coincide with the increased frequency of being able to welcome new Members representing the Liberal party.

The hon. Member for Harlow baffled me. He started off as a straightforward pure monetarist. I thought that he was going to go straightforwad down the line. He then veered in a centre forward direction but, before he could get right into that camp, he drew back from the brink. At the end, I thought that there was a slight warning. The right hon. Member for Cambridgeshire, South-East (Mr. Pym) should beware if the hon. Member for Harlow sends him a post-dated cheque because the cheque will certainly be cancelled long before the right hon. Gentleman gets round to cashing it.

We then heard the hon. Member for Surbiton (Mr. Tracey), who, I thought, was unnecessarily snide and looked for ulterior motives. I do not believe that there is a monopoly of compassion in any political party. I have never been one who wishes to look into people's hearts and minds to find some ulterior motive. One accepts the debate on the terms in which it is framed and put forward. Thus, if things are right, they should be supported and, if they are wrong, one should oppose them rather than look for some ulterior motive. If things are as good as the hon. Gentleman set out, why has there been virtually no increase in male life expectancy in the 40 years since the inception of the National Health Service? It is not enough to say that things are wonderful, that the Government are doing a great job and that we ought to be able to support everything that they do.

The hon. Gentleman went on about privatisation. The Select Committee report published a week ago says that, although we have had pressure for privatisation for four years, that process has not yet "brought home the bacon". It is difficult for people in the Health Service to count and treble-count the same efficiency savings that the Government are demanding.

I said in an intervention that about 25 per cent. of spending does not go on staff, so the spending available from which cuts can be made is smaller than many people imagine. It has not been proved that it is wise from an economic or from a service point of view to cut staff numbers and their pay.

The logic of a pay review is that, if there is to be independent inspection of pay, the Government must fund it. The psychological effect on nurses of having to fight for pay increases at the expense of the service to which they are committed is immoral and insupportable.

The Minister for Health (Mr. Kenneth Clarke): I congratulate the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnor (Mr. Livsey) on his election and on his maiden speech. He spoke with admirable brevity and clarity and with patent sincerity. I am sure that we all wish him well and trust that he will represent his constituents as well as his distinguished predecessor, Mr. Tom Hooson, whom we all miss.

When the hon. Gentleman referred to his constituency and matters relevant to this debate, he slipped into one or two factual errors. He talked of a 3·5 per cent. cash increase to his health authority, which has received a 4·5 per cent. cash increase. He also heavily laboured the effect of this year's pay award on the finances of Powys health authority. It is costing that authority £22,000 more than it was planning—0·1 per cent. of its revenue allocation—and Powys is one of those authorities which is unaffected by this year's award. I trust that, away from the rhetoric of the by-election, we shall find that, as with everything else the hon. Gentleman said, he devotes himself to the problems of his health authority. I hope that he will consider the terms of the first alliance motion that he has been asked to support.

The hon. Member for Ross, Cromarthy and Skye (Mr. Kennedy) tried to construct a great deal of bad news out of the opening of a new hospital in the Highlands. He also tried to create a good deal of bad news out of this year's review body recommendations and the pay awards for nurses and midwives. That seemed to be the whole point of the argument advanced by the Liberal, Social Democratic and Labour Opposition. They cannot sweep away the underlying good news for nurses, and those who have their interests at heart, of this year's pay award. With the exception of one or two speeches, I detected no criticism of the review body system, or of the size of the award that we are giving.

The creation of the nurses and midwives review body is one of the Government's major achievements. As my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State said, it opens up the prospect of nurses' pay no longer being dealt with by those pre-general election one-off gestures. We now have a permanent system which will give the Government the advice of independent people about the right level of pay for nurses and which will put Governments under an obligation to honour its recommendations.

If the national interest determines it, we will not follow the body's recommendations, but normally, as this year, I am sure that the Government will implement the recommended pay awards. I do not meet many nurses who think that they would be better off going back to what preceded the review body system which the Government have set up.

I listened with care to see whether any of the Opposition parties would commit themselves to the review body. Before we announced the award, the Leader of the Opposition went to the Royal College of Nursing conference and threw out vague figures about the money that Labour might give nurses. I do not think that he expected the level of the full-year award that was about to be forthcoming and hope that what he said was not intended to imply that, under Labour, we should go back to some form of bargaining process. We ought to know whether the review body is safe under Labour.

The alliance is meant to believe in pay policy. The hon. Member for Leeds, West (Mr. Meadowcroft) described what I admit was a fairly generalised passage from the alliance's last election manifesto concerning the arbitration arrangements that might be set up for all public sector workers. If I were a nurse, I am not at all sure that I should be happy to exchange the review body system that we have given to them because of the regard in which we hold them and because they do not take strike action against their patients, unlike other key public sector workers and their clients, for some form of Liberal pay policy for all public sector workers. When, under the Lib-Lab pact, there was pay policy, nurses did especially badly compared with inflation and other workers.

After the Halsbury award, between June 1974 and April 1979, nurses' pay went up by 65 per cent., whereas the retail prices index went up by 97 per cent. That is the record of the Labour Government and the Lib-Lab pact and their pay policy. Before this year's award, we had begun to redress the balance. My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State explained the effect of this year's award. By March 1985—before that award—the pay bill had increased by 126 per cent. because it was already 23 per cent. ahead of prices and we had cut hours from 40 to 37·5 a week. We had also employed 57,000 more whole-time equivalents in England. This year's award gives an average of 9 per cent. in a full year across the profession, up to 14 per cent. for sisters and up to 11 per cent. for staff nurses. That is an extremely good settlement.

The Opposition have to challenge what I believe is undilutedly good news for the Health Service by means of this motion on how the award will be funded. It is being funded as we always said it would be and in a way which health authorities can perfectly well contend with while delivering the patient services that we require. We have said from the word go that the cash limits for the Health Service this year would be increased by 5·5 per cent. We had to say what the Government could afford for the whole NHS, and not divide it artificially.

My hon. Friend the Member for Wells (Mr. Heathcoat-Amory) described the process clearly. I parody what he said, but we do not collect from the Treasury—nor would any Government—one pile of pound notes labelled "services" and another pile labelled "pay." There is a cash limit, which Governments have always determined. We told the review body of that limit. I do not care what anybody said in the Select Committee. I was at the negotiations with the Treasury when we agreed that the cash limit covered everything. There was no 3 per cent. norm for anybody. Therefore, when the review body made its recommendations, it knew what it was working within.

The chairman of the review body made it clear in public statements that he left the timing and implementation of an award which he knew amounted to 9 per cent. in a full year to the Government. We had to make a judgment, and we made a judgment precisely to avoid the dangers of which the motion accuses us.

[Mr. Kenneth Clarke]

We knew that health authority limits in England were going up by £500 million and that health authorities had identified for us £150 million which could be provided through cost improvements—not efficiency savings as some people have called them, and certainly not cuts. Those cost improvements did not affect patient care. We therefore decided that we could pay nurses in two instalments, so the total cost fell as £240 million in one year.

Hon. Members have tried to find anecdotal evidence to the contrary. The hon. Member for Ross, Cromarty and Skye ought to go back to his stray delegate at Cardiff from Teesside and ask how on earth a 2 per cent. cut is being forced on that authority as a result of the figures that I have given. Hon. Members, including the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) and even my hon. Friend the Member for Harlow (Mr. Hayes), threw in examples of health authorities with all kinds of difficulties, but none of those difficulties was attributable to nurses' pay.

The fact is that at the new Arrowe Hall hospital in Birkenhead, at the new Oldham hospital being built at Oldham and in my health authority and others, services and increased pay are going hand in hand because we are giving more money. The alliance even tried to outdo us in money. The hon. Member for Ross, Cromarty and Skye said that the alliance would increase expenditure by 1·5 per cent. each year in economic cost terms. If we had followed that modest target, health authorities would have £500 million less to spend than they have. He is promising——

Question accordingly agreed to.

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER forthwith declared the main Question, as amended, to be agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House congratulates the Government on implementing the recommendations of the Health Service Pay Review Bodies and awarding a fair pay increase to all the staff concerned, with particularly high awards for staff nurses and ward sisters; notes that nurses' pay has risen by 23 per cent. in real terms between April 1979 and March 1985 and will rise significantly this year as a result of the Review Body award; welcomes the 5·5 per cent. increase in health authority and health board funding which, together with the extra resources gained from cost improvement programmes, will enable service developments to take place in addition to the funding of the pay award; and notes with approval the continuing increases in the number of patients treated by the Health Service.

GLC Lorry Ban (Judgment)

7.23 pm

Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody (Crewe and Nantwich): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Have you been asked by the Secretary of State for Transport for permission to come to the House and make a statement on the findings of Mr. Justice McNeill today in the High Court? According to The London Standard, Mr. Justice McNeill informed the court that the Secretary of State's refusal to approve the GLC ban on lorries was "unreasonable, irrational and unlawful." The article states that,

"in issuing a 'direction' last February that the ban could not go ahead without a public inquiry," the Secretary of State had "exceeded his powers" under the Road Traffic (Regulation) Act 1984. It adds:

"The Minister did not have the power under the Act to force them to hold a public inquiry, said the judge."

This is not the first time that the Secretary of State has been found to be acting in an unlawful, unacceptable and certainly unreasonable manner. We cannot understand why he has not seen fit, even at this late hour, to come to the House not only to apologise for his irrational behaviour, but at least to make it clear that he had no right to attack the GLC in the manner he did.

Mr. John Ward (Poole): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Order.

Mrs. Dunwoody: What is more, his intention in so doing was totally unlawful. May I remind you, Mr. Deputy Speaker——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. If I could anticipate the further point of order, the hon. Lady should come to her point of order now.

Mrs. Dunwoody: May I ask you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, whether you are aware that the Prime Minister today told American lawyers in London that the desire for justice imposes very firm requirements on the politician?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Lady must come to her point of order.

Mrs. Dunwoody: In view of the Prime Minister's statement that

"unstinting support for the courts which administer the law and for the police who enforce it" is the first duty of politicians, why cannot the Secretary of State come to the House and tell us why he is behaving in this arrogant and arbitrary fashion?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The answer to the hon. Lady's point of order is that I have not received any such request.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Would it not be in keeping with the traditions of the House that when a serious matter is raised in the courts, once again catching out this ridiculous Secretary of State who is clearly a recidivist, there should be a statement at the earliest possible opportunity? Surely that is something the Opposition can expect.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Secretary of State and the Leader of the House have heard the exchanges and will doubtless take them into account.

Mrs. Dunwoody: Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Is there any procedure whereby the Secretary of State can come here? I am sure that he would welcome an opportunity to make a statement this evening. Can you tell us how to ensure that that happens?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: On a hypothesis, if a request were to be made, the Chair would have to consider it and seek an appropriate moment for the Minister to make his statement. I have received no such request.

Mr. Eric Deakins (Walthamstow): Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Is it possible that the matter is sub judice? I understand that the Secretary of State may be considering an appeal. [Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I know nothing about the judgment. I have heard references to what has been reported in The London Standard, but I prefer to see some harder facts. In any case, it is not a matter for me—nor is the hypothetical question of an appeal. The only issue to which I have to respond is whether I have received a request for a statement to be made, and the answer is no.

Mr. Frank Dobson (Holborn and St. Pancras): Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. While accepting that something in The London Standard is not necessarily a hard fact, it is a hard fact that the Secretary of State and the Leader of the House are here. Are they going to make a statement? If not, are they going to inform you when they intend to make a statement? This is the second time that the present Secretary of State has been held in the courts to have acted irrationally and unlawfully in relation to the GLC. It is time that he came to the House to explain what he is doing.

Mr. Alfred Dubs (Battersea): Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Is it possible that the Secretary of State has not yet received the judgment and is awaiting it before coming to the House? On the previous occasion, legislation was rushed through the House to make legal a previously illegal action by the Secretary of State. The House is surely entitled to know whether that is going to happen again.

Mr. Clive Soley (Hammersmith): Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. As a former probation officer, may I offer my services to the Secretary of State? We all make mistakes occasionally. We are all allowed one, but on the second occasion there is an indication that rehabilitation is needed.

We seek your guidance, Mr. Deputy Speaker, on the Prime Minister's comments. She said:

"The first heresy is that if only a determined minority gather together"——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman cannot raise a point of order about what the Prime Minister is supposed to have said at a meeting today.

Mr. Soley: I apologise, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The Prime Minister was saying that a minority could not be used to break the law. A member of a minority group—the Government—has been found guilty of breaking the law on two occasions, and that must be a serious matter. We are asking the Minister to give an explanation to Parliament. Having been found guilty before the courts on two occasions, he ought to come to the House and make a statement.

Mr. Ron Leighton (Newham, North-East): Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. We all support the rule of law. I wonder whether you could advise hon. Members what they should tell constituents when the courts tell us that the Secretary of State for Transport has twice acted irrationally and unlawfully? How are we to explain to our constituents that the country is being run by Secretaries of State who are clearly irrational and behave unlawfully?

Mr. Roland Boyes (Houghton and Washington): Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. My hon. Friend the Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) underestimates the magnitude of the problem. As a former assistant director of social services, I believe that this is a section 25 job. I shall be consulting my social services colleagues in London to se whether instant action can be taken against the Secretary of State.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: These are not matters for me, and I cannot give advice to the hon. Member for Newham, North-East (Mr. Leighton). The only question to which I have to respond is whether I have received any indication of a wish to make a statement. I have received no such indication. If there is a will to make a statement, no doubt I shall receive a request.

Mr. Dobson: Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I seek confirmation as a genuine point of order. Further to the suggestion of my hon. Friend the Member for Houghton and Washington (Mr. Boyes), will you confirm that it is not possible under the general law for an hon. Member to be subject to section 25 procedure, except with the written consent of Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I know nothing about section 25. Standing Orders are enough for me to worry about.

Orders of the Day

Oil and Pipelines Bill

As amended (in the Standing Committee), considered

New Clause 1

SECURITY OF SUPPLY AGREEMENT

'(1) The Agency shall have power to enter into agreements, on behalf of the Crown and at the request of the Secretary of State to secure the supply of petroleum and petroleum products.

(2) Such agreements shall include provision that—

(a) the Company with production from the United Kingdom continental shelf shall continue to supply United Kingdom customers with crude oil and petroleum products with at least the quantities supplied over the previous year or contracted to supply over the coming year, and will increase the supply where possible and will use its transportation and distribution system for this purpose; and

(b) the Company will make supplies at the prices ruling at the time of request (or as otherwise determined by law and regulations)'.—[Mr. Rowlands.]

Brought up and read the First time.

7.35 pm

Mr. Ted Rowlands (Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

In the 10 sittings and nearly 30 hours of the Committee stage, there was a common thread to our arguments. Our charge throughout the proceedings on the Bill has been that the abolition of the British National Oil Corporation will weaken and undermine many aspects of the security of our oil supplies. We believe that BNOC's control over about 800,000 barrels of North sea oil represented one of the vital means of ensuring our supplies in times of shortage.

The Minister of State, Department of Energy argued repeatedly in Committee and on Second Reading that he had a combination of powers and arrangements to ensure the security of our oil supplies. One part of that combination—and, therefore, a part of the right hon. Gentleman's defence in supporting the abolition of the BNOC—was that he had a series of security-of-supply assurances from the major oil companies, particularly those with refining capacity in the United Kingdom. Therefore, the right hon. Gentleman claimed that he could afford not to activate the participation agreements for six or 12 months.

I asked the Minister on Second Reading about the character of those assurances. He said that he could not give us information at that time, but would consider enlightening us in Committee. However, he said that the assurances from the major oil companies were informal.

The matter was not raised in detail in Committee—the new clause breaks new ground—but we put some sensible and reasonable questions to the Minister about his dependence on those assurances. He told us that he could say no more than he had said on Second Reading, which was very little.

Therefore, we need further advice from the Minister about the nature of the assurances that he has received. We believe that the assurances should be formal agreements with the oil companies. My support for that view was strengthened when I read an article in today's Financial Times about a letter that might be typical of the assurances on which the right hon. Gentleman is dependent.

The right hon. Gentleman will have seen the report in the Financial Times about the letter of assurance from BP to the Department of Energy. Is that typical of the informal assurances that he holds from the major oil companies? Are they in the form of a letter from an oil company manager to a civil servant at the Department of Energy? The illustration in the Financial Times is not even a letter from an oil company chairman to the Secretary of State for Energy; I do not know whether a letter from a chairman would increase or diminish the strength of the assurances, but it gives us no comfort to believe that the assurances may be only informal letters from oil company managers to civil servants.

The second and revelant question is whether, if the letter mentioned in the Financial Times is a typical example of the assurances, the right hon. Gentleman has received any advice about the contractual strength of those assurances. Would such an assurance be legally binding if a dispute arose about its terms?

Although the letter quoted in the Financial Times is dated November 1983, it may be one of the assurances received by the Minister of State. If it is not, I should be pleased to hear how the Minister has strengthened the assurances. More important, I want to ask the Minister about the terms of such an assurance. In the letter, the assurance is given in very general terms. About the types of supplies being offered in times of shortage or crisis, we are told in the letter that the oil company—in this case, BP—would be keeping customers supplied

"in accordance with the relevant contracts and established patterns of business."

If a shortage occurs or there is a potential crisis and pressures grow, those words could mean almost anything to anyone, especially to the oil company giving the assurance. Many of these established patterns of business may involve contracts with terminal dates. There may be very short-term arrangements with the companies concerned. How strong, reasonable and effective would such an assurance be at a time of shortage or crisis?

We also ask the Minister about the reference in this supply assurance letter, if it is still in force, to a total disclaimer on prices. The letter of assurance says that BP

"makes the above affirmation subject further to there being no legal or governmental constraint on its ability to raise prices as a necessary means of recovering costs."

It appears that a fundamental condition of the assurance is that, in return, the Government have to assure the oil company that they will make no endeavour to restrain or to restrict price increases in times of shortage. Those phrases cannot be read in any other way. It appears that, in return for a very general assurance about oil supplies, the Government will have to accept that there will be no intervention in the prices that BP wishes to charge during a time of shortage or potential crisis. That is a serious commitment to make in return for the very general assurance offered by BP.

We do not know whether the letter dated November 1983 is the type of assurance that the Minister told the Committee he had. We do not know whether it is out of date. We do not know whether, since that date, the assurances have been strengthened or improved. However, the Opposition wish to register their objection to a general assurance of this kind combined with a disclaimer, because it does not add up to an effective form of assurance.

Mr. Michael Portillo (Enfield, Southgate): During the last supply difficulty that we experienced, the Government attempted to restrain prices and the result was a shortage of petrol. Why is the hon. Gentleman so dismayed that there should be that disclaimer?

7.45 pm

Mr. Rowlands: I am dismayed because it seems unreasonable that, when Britain is a large oil producer, there should not be some reasonable relationship between its production and refining capacity and the prices that a company in that position should be able to charge its customers. The House will note the belief of the hon. Member for Enfield, Southgate (Mr. Portillo) in letting the market rip, especially in a period of shortage or crisis.

Mr. Portillo indicated assent.

Mr. Rowlands: We shall take note of the hon. Gentleman's nod of assent and explain nationally that that is the position of Government Back Benchers, and I think that we are entitled to know whether the Government accept that unadulterated view of the market. Certain differences have emerged between the hon. Gentleman's position and that of the Government on certain aspects of the Bill. It will be interesting to know whether the Minister agrees with his hon. Friend.

We ought to know whether, in return for a general assurance of the kind suggested in the letter, the Government have offered the major oil companies a free-for-all in prices, forswearing any intervention on price increases during a period of oil shortage. I hope that the hon. Member for Enfield, Southgate will at least support me in saying that, in return for these assurances, we should have some knowledge of what is being suggested, and that there will not be a price disclaimer of the kind that was apparently in the BP-Government letter of November 1983.

These are two very important aspects of the so-called informal supply assurances if they are repeated in the other assurances that the Minister has in relation to supply and in relation to a disclaimer of any form of price control, moderation or restraint in times of oil shortage. Is that the combination about which the Minister spoke when he told the House of his front-line defences to ensure the security of our oil supplies?

Towards the end of the letter, I read:

"This letter will cease to have effect upon the expiry of the royalty agreement."

Will the Minister explain that a little more? If it is assured that this is the letter of assurance between BP and the Government, will the Minister say what that sentence means? If the royalty agreement between BP and the Secretary of State includes the right of the company to the automatic sale-back of all royalty oil, is that a part of BP's royalty agreement with the Secretary of State? If it is one of the conditions of the security of suppy assurance and it lapses when the royalty agreement lapses, how does that leave the assurance given to the House by the Minister that the new agency will be entitled to manage and trade every barrel of oil? Does BP's royalty agreement with the Secretary of State give the company the right to the automatic sale-back of royalty oil, and is the assurance made subject to this agreement?

[Mr. Rowlands]

On more than one occasion when we have discussed these issues the Minister has said that the agency will have a free and unfettered right to decide whether to manage and trade in royalty oil as opposed to giving an automatic sale-back provision to the major oil companies. Again, the House has a right to know about these so-called informal assurances.

In the absence of any trading in participation oil by the new agency, because the agency will have only a limited trading role, these assurances play a much greater part than they would have if we had had an agency active in trading in any significant way in crude oil through its participation agreements.

The new clause states that agreements relating to security of supply must be binding, contractual arrangements, not informal letters to civil servants from the managers of an oil company. In other words, they must be contractual agreements having the force of law. While it would be question of negotiations between companies and the Government, the new clause states that security of supply agreement must be specific rather than general. An agreement in the terms of the letter which I have quoted from the Financial Times would not do. That is why the new clause says in subsection (2)(a) that a company

"shall continue to supply United Kingdom customers with crude oil and petroleum products with at least the quantities supplied over the previous year or contracted to supply over the coming year, and will increase the supply where possible and will use its transportation and distribution system for this purpose".

That would be more specific than the waffly words contained in the BP letter. It goes on to place an onus on oil companies to promote and, where possible, increase supplies to the United Kingdom.

Such obligations on oil companies are not unreasonable, because those companies have major interests in our North sea fields. It would be incomprehensible to the general public if those companies did not respond in the most positive way on behalf of United Kingdom customers at times of shortage. We are not adamant about the wording of the new clause. If the Minister accepted the principle involved, we should be willing to accept an alternative form of words.

The new clause adds in subsection (2)(b) that there should not be a free-for-all in the way that the hon. Member for Enfield, Southgate described, whereby the oil companies would be able to exercise their power over the market and, in times of shortage, rip off the United Kingdom customer. To avoid that situation, we say:

"The Company will make supplies at the prices ruling at the time of request (or as otherwise determined by law and regulations".

No form of words should restrain the Government from being able to intervene, by law or regulations, on prices during a period of shortage.

The new clause would place proper responsibility on oil companies to endeavour to improve the nation's oil supply position in a period of crisis or shortage. Such a responsibility should be on companies because, as I say, the public would find it incomprehensible should the United Kingdom not be in a better position at a time of oil shortage than are other countries that do not have oil supplies off their shores.

Not only will the United Kingdom be in the oil production business for years to come — the oil will decline eventually; we shall discuss that on later amendments — but we still do have a large refining capacity. The public would not understand if the nation, producing more than 2 million barrels a day, did not ensure that major oil companies made a special effort to see that we had adequate supplies during a period of shortage.

Let us not forget that BP, Shell and the other major companies have had their way, as reflected by the Bill. I say that because their thinly disguised desire to have BNOC abolished — to remove BNOC as a major oil trader—is conceded to them in the Bill. Therefore, we are entitled to demand more from those companies by way of security of supply agreements than the untried, untested, waffly, informal assurances at which the Minister is clutching and on which he relied when replying to points made by hon. Members in Committee.

Mr. Portillo: The hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands) sometimes worries me. Although some clear lessons are to be learned from the last 10 years, he does not appear to want to learn them. One is that, between 1974 and 1979, Britain and other western countries responded to the 1974 oil crisis by attempting to restrain oil prices. The result was that we had high inflation, we continued to be heavily dependent on oil and we went through a period of world recession.

In 1979, Britain again tried to restrain the prices of oil products. The result was that in Britain there was a shortage of those products, with queues at petrol stations, whereas other European countries which did not operate restraint had plentiful supplies of petrol—and we were a producer of oil, while those other countries were not.

Since 1979, countries have by and large responded to the second oil shock in a completely different way. They have not attempted to restrain oil prices. Hence, since 1979 our dependence on oil has decreased. We have shown greater efficiency in the use of energy, with the result that in the intervening years we have had falling inflation and enjoyed a period of substantial growth. Today, there is a substantial oil surplus throughout the world, and that is attributable to the fact that countries are less dependent on oil. Even the price of oil has fallen considerably because we have not made the error of trying to restrain prices.

The hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney wishes to lead us back to the bad old days when we tried to put the lid on prices and when, ironically, we suffered from precisely what we thought we were avoiding — inflation in general and high oil prices.

Mr. Bruce Millan (Glasgow, Govan): I shall be brief and will not, therefore, answer the points that were made by the hon. Member for Enfield, Southgate (Mr. Portillo), except to comment that I do not accept his account of what occurred either from 1974 to 1979 or for the period since 1979.

I support the new clause, which was moved comprehensively by my hon. Friend the Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands). The security of supplies was the major point raised on Second Reading, when the Minister's answers were highly unsatisfactory. Nothing that has happened since then, in Committee and elsewhere, has persuaded me to change my view.

I will not go over the whole question of security of supplies and what might happen when the agreements under the International Energy Agency and Common Market are activated or what might happen on the activation of participation agreements. That is to be done with such a period of notice that, in terms of meeting a crisis—whether the crisis is beyond or below the trigger point of 7 per cent.—the whole process of reactivating participation agreements is of no relevance.

On Second Reading the Minister described the informal assurances given to the Government by the oil companies. Therefore, he must be embarrassed that the details of at least one of the informal assurances appeared in the Financial Times this morning. On Second Reading he said that he could not tell us any more than he had about the arrangements—and that was precious little—because the details were confidential. They were not sufficiently confidential to prevent them from appearing in today's Financial Times. I do not know how that happened, but I am delighted that it did. At least we now have information about those informal assurances.

We are entitled to answers to a number of questions about the report in the Financial Times. Is it accurate? Does it give an accurate account of the letter from BP dated November 1983? As 20 months have passed, is that letter still operative? Is it written in similar terms to letters from other oil companies, or is it a one-off letter? If there are other letters—we must assume that there are, and that they are the substance of the informal assurances received by the Government—are they similar to the letter from BP?

I assume that those letters are not legally binding—they could not be informal if they were. On Second Reading and in Committee the Minister said that there were informal assurances. We are entitled to know how far those assurances are binding in the event of a crisis. Why should there not be legally binding agreements for the oil companies, given the circumstances of our North sea oil production? Why should we rely on informal assurances? If the companies are willing to give informal assurances, they can have no objection to having provisions written into legislation.

I shall listen carefully to the Minister's answers to those questions. However, unless there is a legally binding agreement the protection of our oil supplies will be deficient and defective. We must have legislation to deal with that, which is why we have tabled the new clause.

I fully support the new clause, including subsection 2*(b)* on prices. It is an important part of the new clause. However, if the Government said they were interested in security of supply but that it was not realistic to write a price ruling into legislation that would be fair enough. We could draft another new clause to accommodate that. What is essential is that there should be security of supply and that the Government have legally effective powers to ensure that in times of crisis. Indeed, the ordinary member of the public would find it incomprehensible that, despite our excessive production in the North sea, over our national needs, there should be a shortage in a time of crisis and no binding agreement to ensure security of supply. That would be indefensible.

As BNOC is to be abolished, something must be written into legislation to protect our supplies, and the new clause seeks to do that. If the drafting is not quite right, and if there was an objection to the provision on prices—although I would not necessarily accept the validity of that objection—it would be possible to write something into the legislation in another place to ensure security of supplies. I strongly support the new clause.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce (Gordon): The House will appreciate that my hon. Friend the Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace) was very much involved in the Committee stage of the Bill and would have been present today had it not been for circumstances of which the House is aware—that his wife gave birth to a daughter last week. She came out of hospital today and my hon. Friend is properly with her, learning how to change his first nappy. I hope that the House will accept me as a substitute.

I am concerned about the implications of the new clause. The Opposition are understandably concerned about security of supply and the lack of legal force within the existing arrangements. However, the clause attempts to lay down specific circumstances for an unforeseen crisis, yet what will be required cannot be predetermined to the extent envisaged by the new clause. If a crisis involved the stoppage of the flow of oil in the world market, we should wish to retain the oil that we export for ourselves. We could deal with that by producing emergency legislation — something with which the House is perfectly capable of dealing in a spirit of all-party co-operation. That would be a more appropriate way to deal with the problem.

Why is it that the United Kingdom, which accounts for about 1·6 per cent. of the world's oil reserves, accounts for 4·5 per cent. of the world's production? What are the implications of that for the future security of supplies? We are producing oil at a rapid rate and selling it abroad. By definition, the oil sold and consumed now will not be available in future. We should concern ourselves with that aspect.

There is a natural instinct in the Labour party for tight regimentation in this matter. The hon. Member for Enfield, Southgate (Mr. Portillo) put the opposing view, which suggested too much trust in the force of the market to resolve the problem. However, to try to determine something in advance and introduce tight regulation over something that we cannot fully foresee is neither necessary nor likely to be workable.

Subsection 2*(a)* states:

"the company with production from the United Kingdom continental shelf shall continue to supply United Kingdom customers with crude oil and petroleum products with at least the quantities supplied over the previous year."

Some customers might not want or be able to deal with that quantity for internal reasons. The criterion is rigid in the extreme.

Mr. Rowlands: I am sure that the words do not debar the customer from foregoing a supply. Most of the assurances which the Minister is trying to obtain are for times when shortage occurs, but before a crisis. If a customer does not want the oil, the clause does not mean that he must take it.

Mr. Bruce: I am grateful for that clarification, but the clause anticipates circumstances which cannot be anticipated. The one merit in the clause is the recognition that securing crude oil is not a requirement. To the extent that the clause addresses itself to that specific, it is an improvement. It recognises that crude oil being available is no darned good without the facilities to process it. In terms of security, the new clause is an improvement on previous agreements and participation agreements which Labour Governments wrote into legislation. I am pleased that we are learning.

To be frank, I think that the new clause is proposed because of an understandable resentment about what the Government have done to the British National Oil Corporation. Once the company had been split, the only logical solution was to do what the Government are doing. We might not have agreed, but the Labour party is resisting the solution for sentimental rather than rational reasons. My colleagues and I will not support the new clause.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): An hon. Member can seek leave of the House to speak twice at this stage in proceedings, so I look forward to what the Minister has to say. I was not on the Committee considering the Bill, for reasons of which my colleagues are aware. I have sat on a number of other Bills on the same subject. When Lord Carrington was Secretary of State for Defence in the Government headed by the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath), he favoured the British National Oil Corporation. That was because he realised from his ministerial experience that it would be impossible to safeguard supplies without some such instrument. That was his view at the time and I do not know whether he has recanted. I think not.

We need to know whether the letter of intent is sufficient. I have two questions to ask about the Financial Times article. First, is it satisfactory that a letter from Mr. David Simon, the head of BP's refining and marketing division, to an Under-Secretary in the Department should give such assurances? Surely such assurances should be given at least by the chairman of the company to the Secretary of State. I am not a great one for protocol but that seems an odd way of proceeding.

Secondly, the article states:

"BP makes the above affirmation subject to there being no further governmental constraints on its ability to raise prices as a necessary means of recovering costs."

What exactly is the nature of the quid pro quo?

I have kept my comments short because, after the Minister has replied, some of us might want to ask further questions.

8.15 pm

The Minister of State, Department of Energy (Mr. Alick Buchanan-Smith): We have debated this subject on Second Reading and in Committee. I have always acknowledged that the subject causes concern. Security of supply is important to the Government, to the House and to the country. In the changes that we made to BNOC and its functions, and in the changes made when Britoil was formed and in abolishing BNOC security of supply has loomed large. That is why I devoted a large part of my Second Reading speech to that aspect and why we debated certain aspects of participation fully in Committee.

We have made changes because circumstances have changed. The situation is not the same as it was in the early 1970s, either in relation to the oil market or to the structure of the oil industry. The Bill is a reflection of the changes. What might have been appropriate 10 years ago is not necessarily appropriate today.

The hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands) referred to the Financial Times article. I read the article with interest. The article must stand or fall on what it says. The arrangements between the Government and oil companies are confidential and I shall not breach that confidentiality. It is not my place to breach such confidentiality and I do not intend to do so. That would be wrong.

Whatever the source of the article, the information did not come from me. I shall not take any part in breaching confidentiality that would have an effect on that company and on other companies with which agreements have been made.

Mr. Millan: What will the effects be on the other companies and on BP? Everybody has read the article and the information is no longer confidential.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: The matter is straightforward. I am surprised that the right hon. Gentleman, having held a ministerial position, should consider the possibility of discussing confidential matters. If I were to discuss such matters freely in the House and elsewhere, the parties to the agreement would have little confidence in Ministers fulfilling their obligations and responsibilities.

Mr. Peter Hardy (Wentworth): I understand the Minister's difficulty in regard to confidentiality — obviously he does not want to comment in detail on such matters—but he must accept that the terms of the report in the Financial Times give us greater cause for misgiving about the secret undertakings. Will the Minister speak in defence of his arrangement, particularly in the light of his charge that it goes less far than we thought when he told us that the assurances were available?

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: I am certainly prepared to comment on some of the general aspects, but I said that I was not prepared to comment on the specific details of the individual agreements with individual companies. For the reasons that I have stated clearly, I am not prepared to do that.

The right hon. Member for Glasgow, Govan (Mr. Millan) asked about the form of the assurances. They vary from company to company, and there are no two companies in exactly the same circumstances, so there is no standard form of agreement for all oil companies.

The right hon. Gentleman asked about the binding nature of the agreements. He more or less answered his question. Of course they are not legally binding. In 1982, when the matter of the agreements was first made public, it was made clear that the agreements are informal. They are not legally binding, and I have never claimed that they are. Equally, given the relationship that exists over a series of matters between Government and the oil companies, I see no reason and the Government see no reason for believing that in practice those agreements would not be honoured by both parties to them.

I should like to deal a little later with the matter of prices, because it is a fundamental part of the new clause.

The hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney asked about royalties. He would be correct if what is reported in the article to which he referred could be affected by the new arrangements being made as a result of the legislation. I shall turn in a moment to the relevant contribution of the hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce). Circumstances change and, as circumstances change, so may agreements with the oil companies change. If, as a result of the passing of the Bill, there need to be any changes in the agreements with the oil companies, I shall discuss them with the oil companies. We are dealing with a changing situation. The passage of the Bill will create new circumstances. I assure the House that I shall be flexible and reactive to whatever changes arise as a result of the Bill.

Mr. Rowlands: In reading the terms, it appears to be a condition of giving the assurance that the royalty agreement with BP is signed. As I understand the historic position of royalty agreements between BP and the Government, they are for the automatic sale-back of royalty oil. The Minister says now that, in the light of the assurances he has given us, the agency will not be bound by any automatic sale-back arrangements. Will the royalty agreements require revision, and will the assurance fall if the BP does not get its way in the royalty agreement with the Secretary of State?

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: I think that I have made my point quite clear. If changes are necessary, or if agreements are affected as a consequence of the passage of the Bill, obviously each agreement will have to be looked at individually, because there are different circumstances in different agreements. I give the House the assurance that I shall look at those agreements to make sure that they are no less effective, following the passage of the Bill, than they are at present.

Mr. Millan: How can the Minister say that, if they are informal agreements and not legally binding? What happens if an oil company refuses to enter into an agreement? Presumably oil companies are free to do that.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: It is significant that no company has refused to do so. I shall deal shortly with the principle of the matter and with the reason for having informal agreements of the kind that we have, rather than having them in a more legal form, as suggested by the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney and his hon. Friends. It is a fundamental question that we debated to some extent in Committee and are debating again this evening.

Mr. Rowlands: The Minister is always courteous in dealing with interventions. That has been characteristic of the way in which we have conducted our proceedings throughout the Bill. Therefore, I am sure that he will not mind if I intervene again.

The Minister gave an assurance to this House and to the Committee that the new agency will not be bound to give the right of automatic sale-back of oil to any major oil company. It appears from the terms of the assurance that it is tied into a royalty agreement which gives BP the right to an automatic sale-back. Which assurance should we take?

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: I can only repeat what I have said. If there are changes as a result of the legislation, any changes in the agreements will have to be negotiated with those who are parties to them. That has been the character of participation. For example, where it has been BNOC's responsibility, or in relation to other contracts which BNOC has with a non-participation agreement, where on the specific agreement — [Interruption.] The hon. Gentleman cannot have it both ways. He has referred to a report in a newspaper and asked what would arise in the circumstances mentioned there. I cannot go further than I have already. If circumstances arise which affect agreements, or if any change occurs in relation to a royalty undertaking which has been given, that has to be negotiated with the company concerned.

I do not recommend to the House that there should be a legally binding agreement of the kind suggested in the amendment. The agreement in regard to supply of product and security arrangements is between the government and the oil companies, and not between BNOC and the oil companies. The hon. Gentleman is breaking completely new ground, not only on the formality of the agreement but in regard to the making of an agreement between the agency and the oil company.

Where there is an agreement on security of supply, the Government are the proper custodian of one side of that agreement with the oil company, rather than, as in the past, through BNOC, or in the future through the agency. I shall refer in a moment to why we believe in working on a voluntary basis. It is much more appropriate, in regard to the range and degree of relationship between the Government and the agency, that the responsibility for the agreements on security of supply, whether legally binding or informal, should rest with the Government rather than shifting to the agency.

From a practical aspect, an informal agreement is preferable to a formal one. The hon. Member for Gordon gave the reasons in his speech. All the experience of crises over the past 10 or 15 years shows that it is impossible to predict with any accuracy how a shortage might develop and what our priority needs will be in time of shortage. Therefore, we must have as much flexibility as possible in our understanding with our refiners, so that we ensure that they do everything to supply their customers in the best way possible. It is impossible to write down in a legal form, in the manner suggested by the hon. Member for Methyr Tydfil and Rhymney, the kind of flexibility that is necessary if we are to react properly in a crisis.

8.30 pm

The new clause is a much more rigid approach. Although at first glance it has certain attractions, there could be considerable difficulties if we sought to put it into practice. The provisions might be out of step with the commercial facts of production and distribution. The new clause states:

"the United Kingdom continental shelf shall continue to supply United Kingdom customers . . .with at least the quantities supplied over the previous year".

How could this apply to a licensee with an interest in only one producing field, which had passed its producing peak? Who are the customers of a petrol station? How does one establish the quantities supplied over the previous year? Would there be an obligation to supply someone who had recently changed to another supplier?

Once one follows this rigid approach, attractive though it may seem in some respects, it becomes divorced from the real practice of commerce. It assumes a simpler basis of trading in oil and oil products than is the case in the real world. The hon. Member for Wentworth (Mr. Hardy) entertained the Committee for a considerable period by following the chain of a cargo of oil from the time it was produced at the wellhead until it passed through the terminal and was loaded. He regaled us with stories of cargoes being traded 10 or 20 times. That does not apply to every cargo. One simply cannot formalise the practice in this new clause. One cannot try to solidify the pattern of trading after the agreement has been triggered. Entering into such contractual provisions — this is my main opposition to the new clause — would entail a considerable loss of flexibility. Above all else, we need flexibility.

The new clause refers to prices and to the oil that may be delivered under the security of supply agreement. It would be difficult for any United Kingdom continental shelf producer to agree to a pricing condition other than one that allowed him to receive the prevailing market price at the time of delivery. Any agreement would have to be made on that basis. Indeed, that principle was followed by the last Labour Government, when they introduced participation agreements on the basis that BNOC's transactions should be at no gain and no loss to the corporation or to producers. It is inappropriate to write into the new clause or into any informal or formal agreement any conditions on prices, other than that they should reflect market conditions.

Mr. Rowlands: That is not what the BP letter says. BP's point is very different. It tries to bind Governments not to apply any legal or Government constraint. It makes it a condition of the assurance that Governments will never try to constrain or moderate prices. That proposition is very different from agreeing to a price of the type laid down in participation agreements.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: The Labour Government introduced participation agreements on the basis that the transactions should be at no gain and no loss. Obviously, this will reflect market conditions. My hon. Friend the Member for Enfield, Southgate (Mr. Portillo) pointed out that, when the Labour Government endeavoured to use their powers with respect to price constraints, supplies subsequently dried up. Because the United Kingdom market cannot be isolated from the world market, eventually there were upward prices in line with market conditions. The only effect of Government action in intervening was to cause a delay, which threatened supplies. I hope that my slightly more pragmatic approach, in comparison with that of the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney, in the light of the Labour Government's experience, shows what can happen. The Labour Government did not have a single supply assurance from a United Kingdom refiner. They relied on participation agreements. When the crisis came, it had no effect on the users of oil products and we suffered from shortages.

Because it is better to act informally rather than formally in giving flexibility and, because of our experience during previous crises, I believe that my approach is better than that of the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney, and I therefore ask the House to reject the new clause.

Mr. Dalyell rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): Order. The hon. Member has spoken once in the debate. Does he have the leave of the House to speak again?

Hon. Members: Yes.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member may proceed.

Mr. Dalyell: May I repeat the question that was put first by me, secondly by my hon. Friend the Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands) and thirdly by me again. It is no good simply taking refuge in the confidences in the Financial Times article, which states:

"BP makes the above affirmation subject further to there being no legal or governmental constraint on its ability to raise prices as a necessary means of recovering costs."

What is the quid pro quo?

Mr. Rowlands: Will the Minister of State answer the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell)?

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: I shall put the point simply, as I did earlier. I am not prepared to comment on the particular aspects of agreements with companies as reported in the newspapers. I have pointed out the much broader question of principle — that trying to write in conditions on prices, as the new clause does, has proved in practice to be totally ineffective, especially in the experience of the Labour Government whom the hon. Member for Linlithgow supported.

Mr. Rowlands: We have suffered quite a lot from the Minister's complacency, which he has shown yet again in those remarks. It provides cold comfort to customers or members of the public to realise that when the Minister uses the words "informal" or "flexible", it is ministerial double-think and double-talk, allowing oil companies to get away with wishy-washy assurances of the type that the right hon. Gentleman is clutching — which, when the crunch comes, are scarcely worth the paper on which they are printed. For that reason, I ask my colleagues to join me in the Division Lobby in supporting the new clause, which gives proper and meaningful assurances to customers and to the public in times of oil shortage.

Question put, That the clause be read a Second time:—

Clause 2

General functions of Agency

Mr. Hardy: I beg to move amendment No. 1, in page 2, line 18, at end insert—

'(1A) In managing on behalf of the Crown pipelines and storage installations the Agency shall prepare a plan to design and construct an onshore crude oil pipeline system to complement the existing system and shall enter into agreements on behalf of the Crown to make the system available to licensees with production from onshore fields on a common carrier basis at a commercial tariff and the system shall include better rail sidings, tank farms and necessary links with offshore producing facilities.'.

This amendment provides for the design and construction of onshore crude pipeline systems, which will complement existing systems and allow the making of agreements with licensees to use the pipelines as common carriers. As the amendment recognises, this would involve rail sidings, tank farms and links with offshore production facilities. It is a sensible amendment; the Minister will recall that it is similar to one that we debated in Committee, although it is not identical. It has more merit than the amendment that we debated in Committee, and the Minister will have had a little more time to consider the wisdom of our proposals.

The amendment is sensible, because it would make a helpful contribution to the nation's transport facilities. The Minister said in Committee that the building of a pipeline can cause some difficulty, and that the several pipelines that had been built in his constituency had caused him concern as a representative of the local people. However, if he has reflected on the matter since Committee, he will have discovered that, after it has been completed, a pipeline causes much less concern than would many vehicles pounding along the roads in his constituency, to the distress of those who might momentarily have had only a little anxiety about the construction of a pipeline.

If the Minister seeks to maintain the Government's policy of extracting oil as fast as possible from onshore as well as offshore fields, he will present serious problems to those who live in the areas affected. On balance, the vast majority of residents in areas where onshore oil has been discovered would wish to swap the prospect of vehicles pounding along their roads for the sensible and peaceful operation of a new pipeline.

I am sorry that the Government have not been more sensitive about such matters. The Minister was hasty in his rejection of our amendment in Committee, and I wish to put this point to him. My constituency is in an area where onshore exploration is proceeding. The Minister will share my view that onshore exploration in such areas is likely to be fruitful. As a Member for one of the large parts of England where oil is likely to be discovered, I would prefer it to be moved by pipeline than on our inadequate roads.

A short time ago, I told another Minister in the Department that I would strongly object to any opencast development in my area, and that I would object even more strongly to attempts to move on the roads in my constituency the material displaced or the coal extracted. Greedy eyes are already considering one site where the roads simply could not tolerate the additional traffic that would be required. If there is opencast development, the material should be moved by rail or by canal, not by road. The same argument applies in the case of the amendment. There is no reason why the roads should be clogged by vehicles moving material extracted from offshore oilfields when we have readily available the silent, efficient and effective pipeline system.

If the Government advise the Oil and Pipelines Agency that it should go ahead with extensions to the pipeline system, this could lead to substantial industrial orders and to many jobs. I hope that that point has not escaped the Minister's attention. The amendment does not state, although perhaps it should have done, that the jobs created would be largely within British industry. We recognise that, at last, the Government have begun to realise the enormity of the unemployment problem in many industrial areas, and such orders would be welcome and timely. There would be substantial benefits in the transportation of the product and, in the long run, for the environment, and the provision of jobs through orders to the steel and engineering industries, at a time when such jobs are needed desperately.

Since, this year, the Government will receive £12,000 million in direct revenues from our oil activities, the Opposition believe that some of that money could be invested in Britain. We would commend such valuable investment. The Government tend to boast that the oil revenues have allowed us to buy substantial assets abroad. Earlier this year, after calculating that we had received £50,000 million in direct revenues from offshore oil, I asked the Prime Minister during Question Time what benefit we had obtained from it. The Prime Minister's response was that we had enormously increased our overseas portfolio. When she was asked a similar question the other day, her answer had shifted a little. It should shift much more, and one way to shift it would be to devote some of the revenues to establishing a pipelines system that could benefit Britain for a long time.

In Committee, the Minister boasted of how much money had been invested in our existing pipelines. Although it is not as colossal a figure as the investment in some of the projects which the House debates from time to time, the sums involved are substantial. In 1980-81, we invested £2·47 million; in 1981-82, it was £1·87 million; in 1982-83, it was £2·6 million; in 1983-84, it was £3·65 million; and in the last full financial year, the figure was £4·32 million. Those substantial sums would provide more benefit if our existing pipelines were complemented by links to the onshore fields. We do not rule out additional links, which are entirely justified, to ensure that the onshore and offshore fields are complementary.

The Minister must recognise the merit of our proposal. It would provide jobs and a cleaner and healthier environment, and it would please the Select Committee. If the Minister recognises the merit of the consideration of the Select Committee, he will realise that the Select Committee appears to be recommending that there should be improved storage facility and investment, and the amendment would certainly fit well with the Select Committee's relatively recent recommendation.

I hope that the Minister will not dismiss as unimportant our concern about unemployment, the environment and transport. He may feel assured that the Government's docile and substantial majority in Parliament will allow him to continue to reject our logical and intelligent pleas with impunity, but I rather think that in another place there will be concern for the environment and employment which adds grace to that establishment, but which, if ignored in this House, is particularly regrettable since we are supposed to be the democratically sensitive establishment. We are perhaps relieved of the problem and responsibility of taking the longer and more relaxed view, which is often the characteristic of their Lordships. Here we are entitled to discuss realities. The reality of the situation is that the sheer common sense of the amendment deserves consideration.

It may be that the Government Whips have persuaded their hon. Friends to stay away in order that they shall not be exposed to the sanity of our suggestion. The Minister smiles enigmatically, as is his wont, but I should not be surprised if that were the case. I trust that the shock which we had in Committee when the Minister rejected our argument will not be repeated tonight. The Minister is aware that the private sector recognises merit in the pipeline system and in its extension.

He recognised in Committee, and I hope that he will again tonight, the wisdom of the extension of the link which Mobil is now establishing to the terminal at Wymondham in Norfolk. Mobil was serving Mobil's interests, but in fact it was serving British interests as well because it is much more sensible to invest in this way to make the movement of oil efficient without causing social and economic disadvantage. Now that the Minister has had a few weeks for reflection, I hope that he will realise that the Wymondham development by Mobil is one which should be extensively repeated. We would certainly wish this to be so. In that regard, I remind the Minister that we put this proposal forward as a demonstration not only of our belief in sane arrangements in transport and industry but because we believe that there is a substantial place for co-operation in the economy between the public and private sectors. The example of the Mobil development in Norfolk should be repeated. I think that we can justly claim that our approach is entirely undogmatic and that, if there is dogma in these matters, it rests firmly wholly on the Government's shoulders.

On this occasion I hope that the Minister, perhaps in preparation for consideration of the Bill in their Lordships' House, will recognise the powerful arguments in support of our amendments and, for a change, will consider accepting them.

Mr. Bruce: I am not sure what the Minister is going to make of this proposal. I yield to nobody in my willingness to resist the Government's economic policy and to criticise many aspects of their oil and gas development policy. I started out on my political career by standing against the Minister, and I like to think that I have done a little better since then.

I do not think that, in the course of trying to be constructively critical of the Government's performance, I can be expected to support what seems to me a barmy idea. I wonder what kind of impetus is coming from within the oil and gas industry to give rise to this kind of proposal. I certainly agree that we want to look for co-ordination of development, and I would welcome proposals to extend that. However, I am puzzled as to how one can integrate the onshore industry with the offshore industry, which is completely different in geography, scale and location; and where the pipeline is going to or from is a mystery to me.

Mr. Hardy: I recognise the hon. Gentleman's difficulties. He is standing in for his hon. Friend the Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace) at short notice. If he had prepared for the debate, he would have been able to obtain from his hon. Friend the map of the pipeline system. On it, as on the various public documents available, he would have seen where the offshore fields are or are likely to be. He would have noticed that the location of the offshore fields in the area of Wessex is not very far from existing pipelines — perhaps those which have facilities at Hamble. Is the hon. Gentleman aware that, in Committee, his hon. Friend voted alternately with us and with the Government? My impression is that, having supported the Government on new clause 1, he will support us on amendment No. 1.

Mr. Bruce: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman, but I am capable of making up my own mind about the merits of the amendment. I gave way in the hope that he might answer my question. Where is the driving force in the industry about the benefit that it would get from the integrated development that the amendment appears to propose? I still wonder whether it is being suggested that we should pipe oil from Wytch farm to Hound point or even to Sullom Voe.

Mr. Rowlands: The hon. Gentleman does know where the pipeline is.

Mr. Bruce: The hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands) is pushing his luck suggesting that an hon. Member from the Aberdeen area who has been connected with the oil industry does not know where the pipelines are. I am well aware of where the onshore pipelines are. It is sensible to co-ordinate development of new pipelines and to take account of our new requirements when giving annex B approval. However, it is extravagant to suggest that the agency must prepare a plan to design and construct an onshore crude oil pipeline system.

British Gas and BP were interested in an integrated gas gathering system. Those of us who supported the system were encouraged because plenty of people who knew a great deal about oil and gas development felt that the project was worth while. Movement came from within the industry rather than at the whim of a political party. The project did not go ahead, but it was always a sensible idea. The Government would not have considered it so closely if they had not recognised its considerable merits. However, I am not aware of any serious suggestion in the industry for an approach such as this.

The Labour party must show that it is not determined to regulate the industry for purely bureaucratic reasons. It must also show that it recognises that people in gas and oil production are professionals with considerable experience and with whom they should work in partnership. I understand that, in spite of the bold words of the hon. Member for Wentworth (Mr. Hardy), the amendment will not be pursued to a Division. The Labour party would be wise not to press it.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: I am not aware of any pressure in the industry for this type of pipeline. When considering annex B development plans, I consider the pipeline implications and the terminal implications. Proposals and decisions are commercial, but the structure must be thought out sensibly.

The hon. Member for Wentworth (Mr. Hardy) has previously, and generously, acknowledged that I am deeply concerned about the employment potential of our oil industry. He has credited what I have tried to do since coming to this office to ensure that benefits are ploughed back in employment opportunities in the United Kingdom.

Equally, I hope that the hon. Gentleman will accept that offshore fields, to which the amendment refers—I must emphasise that — involve environmental factors. That was one of the major reasons for introducing a new licensing procedure for onshore development and exploration in the past 12 months. No scheme will please everybody, but the new scheme has been generally welcomed by both oil and environmental interests seeking a better balance between the two. I am sensitive to those points.

The amendment concerns crude oil from onshore fields, which, as the hon. Member for Wentworth said, can be transported in a number of ways, one of which is by pipeline. I hate to have to disappoint the hon. Gentleman again, but I question the relevance of the amendment to the Bill. We must remember that the Government's pipeline system was originally constructed to supply military airfields owned by the Government with the materials essential for wartime use. Therefore, the Government did not have then, nor do they now, any strategic interest in crude oil pipelines. I could not see such a pipeline servicing Government-owned establishments, as I am not aware of any that are using crude oil.

Therefore, decisions on how oil is disposed of, or transported from, a particular onshore development are the responsibility, with proper respect for planning and environmental considerations, of those who are concerned with the commercial development of the particular oil accumulation. If the licensees decide that the pipeline is appropriate, it would be for them to construct and operate it. I do not see any justification for involving the public sector, and in particular the Oil and Pipelines Agency, in owning or financing such pipelines.

Those are fundamental objections, but there are some practical ones as well. I endeavour to be practical in dealing with amendments, as I was in Committee. Amendment No. 1 refers to an offshore crude oil pipeline that is complementary to the existing Government pipelines and storage systems. However, as the existing system transports products and the one envisaged by the amendment would convey crude, it is difficult to see how the two could be regarded as complementary. However, if any part of the Government pipeline became redundant and if it appeared that it could be used by the licensee of an onshore oil production field and was appropriate for crude oil, I would expect the agency, as the managing agent of the existing system, to do what it could to facilitate such a change of use.

Despite the speech of the hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce), the amendment is not clear about where the pipelines should go once they have left the onshore fields. I imagine that the licensees would want to connect them to existing pipelines, to refineries or to port loading facilities. The amendment suggests that the pipelines should be linked with offshore producing fields. However, as the major onshore fields such as Wytch Farm and Humbly Grove, two of the bigger ones, are in the south of England and the major offshore fields are in the north of Scotland, it is difficult to see what purpose would be served by constructing such an extremely long pipeline.

Mr. Hardy: The Minister of State's Department has produced an attractive document about British onshore reserves. It shows that the prospects for oil extraction in Britain cover not merely the Wessex area but a large part of the area on the western side of the Bristol channel. It is a pity that illustrations cannot be used in the Official Report, but this illustration shows that the prospects stretch right up into Lancashire on the western side of the Pennines and include a large part of Lincolnshire stretching right across to Northamptonshire and a considerable part of Yorkshire, stretching to Teeside. This means that the Teeside facilities for the oil industry could link in very well with the extraction of oil from the Yorkshire and Humberside region. We are taking a longer view of oil extraction than the hon. Member for Gordon.

9.15 pm

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: I am glad that the hon. Gentleman takes such a long-term view, but I hope that he realises that the map he is holding represents what we know on the basis of geological knowledge, not what we know on the basis of drilling. I am referring to the areas where we are producing onshore oil. Many people would like oil to be produced in commercial quantities in some of these other areas too, but where work has taken place the results have not been quite so optimistic as the hon. Gentleman is and as I should like to be. I have to be realistic and to look at these matters in a practical manner.

For these reasons, I am anxious that the Government's pipelines system should be used as sensibly as possible. Again I pay tribute to the British National Oil Corporation for the way it managed the system. In recent years it has increased the commercial use of the pipelines system, but it has always borne in mind the fact that it has a fundamentally strategic use and that its full capacity has not been needed. The agency will, I am sure, encourage the use of the pipelines system for commercial purposes. To try to stretch a crude oil pipeline as opposed to a product pipeline to one that services crude oil from onshore fields is not, attractive though in some respects is the hon. Gentleman's proposition, one that lies properly with the functions of the Government's pipelines system either as it has been in the past, as it was recently under BNOC or as it will be in the future under the agency. For those reasons, I ask the House to reject the amendment.

Mr. Dalyell: I want again to ask for the leave of the House to put a question. I should like to hear what the Minister of State has to say in reply to it. I have to declare a strong constituency interest in the matter, not only because of the experience of Hound point, which was offshore, but because the whole pipe-laying exercise was so traumatic for some of my constituents and caused problems in particular for smallholders. As a Scottish Member of Parliament, the Minister knows about these problems. Furthermore, there are possibly oil deposits in the Bathgate area of Livingston.

In a previous incarnation the Minister had experience of the Scottish Office. To what extent will these be strategic planning matters for Government Departments to what extent will they be left to commercial interests? This is a very important issue. I listened carefully to the Minister and if I have misunderstood him, I apologise. My impression is that these decisions will be made by commercial interests, and hang the rest of us. I hope that that is not true.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: By leave of the House, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I will answer the points raised by the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell). I can assure him that nobody is more sensitive than I about the laying of pipelines. The hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce) will bear me out when I say that within its small physical confines my constituency probably contains more pipelines than the constituency of any other hon. Member of Parliament. If, for the sixth time, certain landowners have a pipeline running through their land it can be a very traumatic experience. Both my Department and local authority departments are sensitive about this matter, and I take to heart the hon. Gentleman's point.

All onshore oil exploration and production is subject to the licensing procedure of my Department. As I said earlier, those procedures have recently been totally reviewed and a new system introduced to provide better safeguards. That will be welcomed as an improvement on the situation which existed before. Looking at it from the industrial and economic point of view, ultimate control rests with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, who grants the licences. The exercise of the licensing policy is discussed with my right hon. Friends in other interested Departments and we take a strategic view in relation to it. It is not just a narrow commercial view. The proposals and applications come from commercial interests, but the system is subject to licensing and licensing control, and the performance of the licences is monitored.

Mr. Dalyell: The Minister will forgive me for being parochial, but for the Livingston-Bathgate situation may we have an undertaking that at an early stage the two hon. Members concerned—my hon. Friend the Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook) and I, and indeed the regional council and the district council—will be taken into the confidence of those doing the strategic planning, because last time round a great deal of hassle would have been saved if we had been consulted at an early stage, especially in relation to the compensation of some constituents?

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: As I said to other hon. Members who have an interest in exploration or production licences in their constituencies, I am very happy for them to come and discuss these matters. If the hon. Gentleman wishes to follow that up he may do so, should the appropriate stage arise. As the hon. Gentleman may know, just a few weeks ago I announced under the new procedures the first onshore licensing round. Applications have been invited and that round will close towards the end of September. From then on we shall be examining the applications, and thereafter we shall be making an announcement about the awards. If, when the awards are announced, the hon. Gentleman finds that his constituency or that of his hon. Friend is affected, I shall be happy to meet and discuss with him any aspect he wishes to discuss.

Mr. Dalyell: Thank you very much.

Mr. Hardy: We shall not press this matter to the vote. Before the withdrawal of the amendment, could I say to the Minister that, as a result of his constituency experience, there may well be a stronger case for integration in the development of pipelines than seems to have been the case in his own area? I recently saw a pipeline, not for oil, built through my constituency and it was obvious that we manage things very much better in north Yorkshire than they are managed in the right hon. Gentleman's constituency in Scotland.

One of our major concerns was the position of the smaller companies in the round of licensing to which the Minister has referred. Over the months, if it becomes obvious that, in the national interest or in the interest of the small independents, pipeline facilities should be provided, I hope that the Minister will not, out of a sense of dogma, prevent the Oil and Pipelines Agency from applying its ability and experience in the national interest. I hope that he will recognise that its experience is substantial and should be made available and not denied simply because the Minister has remarkably little faith, even in his own Department's publications, but a great deal of dogma.

I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 2

General Functions of Agency

Mr. Rowlands: I beg to move amendment No. 2, in page 2, line 18 at end insert—

'(1A) Agreements entered into under subsection (1) above shall include the provision that the Agency shall lift royalty oil in the relevant chargeable period or where it is unable to do so no later than the end of the following chargeable period.'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, we may take amendment No. 4, in page 2, line 18 at end insert—

'(1A) Agreements entered into under subsection (1) above shall include the provision that, at the request of the Agency, on behalf of the Crown and after consultation with the Secretary of State, the Operator shall reduce production in the field by—

(a) the amount that would otherwise have been supplied to the Agency on behalf of the Crown as royalty oil; and

(b) an equivalent amount of petroleum that would otherwise have been supplied to the licensees such amounts to be left in the ground and the operator shall not produce such petroleum until requests to do so by the Agency, on behalf of the Crown and after agreement with the Secretary of State.'.

Mr. Rowlands: Although the two amendments are being taken together, the only thing that they have in common is a reference to royalty oil. I divide my contribution into two parts and I hope that the Minister will do the same when he replies. The debate will be better if we do it in that way.

Amendment No. 2 picks up a substantial issue which I raised in Committee and which does not arouse partisan feelings. I drew attention in Committee to the difficulties that the OPA may face in managing royalty-in-kind oil. Provisions governing the collection of royalty oil dictate that the agency must take all its entitlement within each six-month chargeable period. If it does not collect the oil within six months, it forfeits the right to collect, and royalty oil is paid subsequently in cash.

Collecting royalty oil within the chargeable period was a problem even for BNOC. I understand that the lifting of royalty oil is a shambles. Irrespective of our views on other aspects of the Bill, we all wish the agency to be as efficient and effective as possible in managing and trading oil. The problem will arise for the OPA if, in any six-month period, the amount of royalty oil does not justify sending a tanker to collect it. The problem was less serious for BNOC, because it could aggregate royalty oil, participation oil and commercial oil to make up a decent cargo. Therefore, in most cases, it was able to collect the royalty oil on behalf of the state.

The OPA will not have the other sources of oil to make up a decent cargo. We tried to persuade the Minister of State to give the agency a more expansive role and allow it to enter agreements to purchase commercial oil, but the right hon. Gentleman turned his back on that. Therefore, the agency will face difficulties and the shambles involved in collecting royalty oil at present will get worse.

Amendment No. 2 suggests that there should be a rollover period, in which royalty oil that was not collected in one six-month period could be rolled over into the next period and help to make up a decent cargo so that the oil could be delivered to the market efficiently. The amendment proposes a system which I gather is the practice in Norway. It offers a practical solution to what will become an increasingly difficult problem for the agency. How does the Minister think that the agency will be able to handle that problem?

Amendment No. 4 raises a different issue connected with royalty oil. I touched on it briefly in Committee. Amendment No. 4 suggests that we should have the power to bank royalty oil. That is an option which should be available to the Government, especially if trends in the market make it commercially and nationally sensible. Here we could be looking at a different scenario from the one that we discussed earlier or the one that we may discuss on Third reading, when we could be facing oil shortages.

9.30 pm

In the coming months, we could see a dramatic fall, even a free fall, in crude oil prices. It is being talked about widely in oil circles, and the shambles that OPEC is in fuels the speculation that there could be a substantial if not a free fall in prices. If a substantial fall occurs, it will have conflicting impacts on our economy. Many aspects of a substantial fall in price could help to develop our economy, but they will also raise genuine questions of oil production policy.

In such a case, would it make much sense to drain as rapidly and as rapaciously as possible our largest, cheapest but declining oil supplies from the Ninian, the Brent and the Forties, or would it make more sense to leave the oil in the ground until a better price could be obtained? It might make honest, commercial common sense to bank a percentage of the oil, especially that in the most mature fields in the North sea. It might also serve as a modest form of depletion policy.

Banking our royalty oil in the mature fields would have no consequence for the development of our new fields. It would have little or no major effect on jobs in the exploration for and development of new fields. Therefore, I am interested to know whether the Minister has any thoughts about banking royalty oil.

Since our Committee stage, the issue of banking royalty oil has been raised. I read with interest in the Daily Telegraph of 1 July the report of an interview between Mr. Roland Gribben and Mr. Peter Holmes, the new chairman of Shell Transport and Trading. Mr. Holmes said:

> "Lower oil prices are bad news for Britain but if Britain could it should be doing something like banking royalty oil."

We do not necessarily agree with his concept that lower oil prices are bad for Britain. We have heard conflicting views about the impact of lower, stable or higher oil prices on our economic and industrial prospects, but the issue of banking royalty oil will again be raised if we see a substantial fall in prices. Although I do not wholly subscribe to the view of the chairman of Shell Transport and Trading, there may be a case for the Government at least to have the option of banking royalty oil.

If that decision is taken, there may also be a case for saying to the oil companies that if royalty oil is to be banked they, too, must bank oil barrel for barrel. In a period of dramatically falling oil prices, there might be a simple, common-sense, commercial reason for the Government to consider banking royalty oil and asking North sea operations to do the same barrel for barrel.

That is the idea that we float in the amendment. The amendment also gives us the opportunity to ask what powers the Minister already has to bank royalty oil. Would it require new legislation to do it or would it simply be the subject of sensible, commercial negotiation and temporary arrangements between the oil companies and the Government?

Given the speed with which oil markets change and trends in development occur, it might not be a bad idea for the Government to have the option which the amendment would provide and which, to borrow some words from the Minister, would be flexible, pragmatic and sensible.

Mr. Bruce: I intervene briefly, if only in the interest of being even-handed and to let Labour Members know that I do not just have it in for them tonight. There is some merit in the amendment. It is flawed in its drafting, as the hon. Member for Methyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands) acknowledged. He moved it as a constructive contribution to considering how we handle royalty oil in the most flexible way in the national interest.

The amendment raises a wider issue, to which I referred earlier—the extent to which we are overproducing oil, in the sense that the United Kingdom has 1·6 per cent. of the world's reserves and is producing 4·5 per cent. of the world's production. Do we have it wrong, or do others have it wrong?

To the extent, therefore, that the amendment represents a sensible contribution in considering how we might be more flexible in the use of royalty oil, and perhaps help to modify production in a way that is acceptable—we are, after all, referring to the Government's oil—the Minister might consider whether what is proposed, or a variation of it, is worth exploring in terms of an extra option which the Government might wish to employ in future.

Mr. Dalyell: We must be flexible about onshore production. In what was my constituency is the town of Bo'ness, which is a mining area containing a number of shafts where subsidence problems in recent years have proved extremely serious. Houses were built on ground which, because of coal production, has since proved to be unstable.

So much for coal. Some people are concerned about what the extraction of onshore oil may mean in built-up areas, and at this stage I register a constituency concern, though I wish to broaden the consideration of an aspect of oil production.

I heard recently, as did many of my hon. Friends, of worries that had been expressed about one of those great glories of medieval English architecture, Salisbury cathedral. I gather that the great spire of the cathedral is built on a base which, along with the chapter house, has a depth of only 4 ft. It is a marvellous engineering construction. In view of the proposal to extract oil in the Salisbury area, I am told that the friends of Salisbury cathedral believe that there could be sufficent destabilising of the surroundings to render the spire dangerous. I do not wish to exaggerate the point, and I put it no higher than that. Reports are available. Should the Department wish to inquire into the matter, it could undoubtedly obtain more facts.

How flexible are the environmental arrangements if it is found that the extraction of oil would create environmental hazards to what we might call the built-in environment? I do not know whether tonight, in considering this amendment, is the right time to raise this issue. It is clear that a substantial and major problem has arisen and that thought will have to be given to it.

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: While the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) acknowledged that the point he raised was not wholly relevant to the amendment, I appreciate its importance. Every aspect of the application for production with which I am concerned is subject to the full rigours of planning conditions, and at that stage the considerations that he mentioned would be taken into account. I will send him information which may help to describe the procedures that must be gone through and which, I hope, provide the necessary safeguards in such a situation.

Mr. Dalyell: It might be found that the geological knowledge was incomplete. In any event, conditions can alter. What would the Government do if permission were given in good faith by all the parties concerned and it was later found that the geological conditions were such that the built-in environment was threatened?

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: Of course, planning permission can be given subject to certain conditions where special considerations might apply. I shall certainly give the hon. Gentleman more than an outline of the exact procedures involved. I hope that that will be of some reassurance to him, but, if not, he is welcome to come and discuss the general issues with me.

The two amendments are important and interesting, and I do not fault them on any drafting ground. The intention behind them is quite clear. I wish first to deal with amendment No. 2 and then to move on to amendment No. 4, because they raise two separate points.

As background to the matter, it is important to understand the Government's right to take royalty oil, which arises from the conditions of the model clauses under which licences are granted. Therefore, if we wish to change the manner or timing of the taking of royalty oil, it is necessary to amend the appropriate model clauses. It would not be possible to amend the contractual relationship between the Secretary of State and licensees by inserting provisions in an agreement between the Secretary of State and the agency, as the amendments seek to do.

The agency will have no contractual or any other entitlement to lift royalty in kind. It will do so as the Secretary of State's agent. I mention that not in any way to knock down the principles behind the amendments, but because it is important to get that perspective right in relation to their practical application. We discussed the principles underlying amendment No. 2 in Committee on 18 June. The hon. Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands) said that there could be problems with roll-over entitlements of royalty going from one chargeable period to another. However, he was wrong to say tonight that the whole of royalty oil is in a shambles —it is not. I acknowledge that there can be problems on roll-over, but not to the extent of disadvantage suggested by the hon. Gentleman. The problem has been with us for some time and BNOC has largely overcome it. I believe that the agency should also be able to overcome it.

In practice, when BNOC has accrued a substantial portion of a cargo of royalty oil near the end of a chargeable period, it has been able to purchase oil from other licensees to make a whole cargo, which it has then been able to lift. There is no reason why part cargoes of royalty in kind should not continue to be aggregated with part cargoes of crude accruing to licensees in the field, either through the agency purchasing the latter—which is why we proposed that the agency should have powers to trade on its own account—or by selling the part cargoes of royalty in kind to the other licensees. There are practical ways in which the agency should be able to deal with that.

It is important to get in perspective the scale of the issue that we are considering. If royalty-in-kind oil could not be aggregated with other oil to make complete cargoes, my Department has made estimates that indicate that royalty in kind oil not lifted would currently be less than 0·4 per cent. of United Kingdom continental shelf production, so the gross scale of the problem should not be all that great.

However, I acknowledge that aggregation has given rise to problems in the past and could give rise to problems in future. I assure the hon. Gentleman that if operational difficulties arise in aggregating part cargoes in the way that I have described, I shall consider the issue again when other changes in the model clauses — which are the correct way to deal with this matter — are next considered. We have no intention that this should be a difficulty, nor do we want it to be a difficulty. There are practical ways around it.

Amendment No. 4 is more fundamental and I cannot accept it. If we have to use the depletion power, the Secretary of State should have the right to use it, not the agency. If it were decided to impose cuts, the responsibility should rest with the Secretary of State.

9.45 pm

It might be helpful if I clarify the Government's depletion policy. The United Kingdom is not able to influence the world oil market through the manipulation of the volume that it produces. We are a medium-sized producer. We produce about 2·6 million barrels a day compared with the United States, which produces 10·5 million barrels, and the Soviet Union, which produces about 12·5 million barrels. We export about 1 million barrels a day net. Any reduction that we made would have little effect on the global oil market.

Anyone who has studied OPEC members or other oil producers will know that any reduction that we made would almost certainly be taken up by others. Any move to cut production would result in clear losses. I am uncertain that we would benefit.

I say that because of the practical and physical nature of our offshore production in the North sea and other areas on the continental shelf. Given the high risk and high cost nature of our production compared with most other offshore areas, and certainly with the big onshore producers, companies would be less inclined to invest in the future if the Government were to restrict production arbitrarily.

One could argue that the arrangement proposed in the amendment puts more of a financial burden on the nation's oil revenues and therefore less on oil companies' returns. However, one must remember that whatever is put in must come out. That applies to any stockpiled commodity. If we are to regain the royalty oil in due course, production would have to be cut to make way for its production. Our production is small in world terms, particularly our production for export. United Kingdom production is soon likely to decline. Our production facilities are designed to produce according to profiles agreed with the Department, and after careful study of the characteristics of the reservoir and other matters. Therefore, any cut in current production would, of its very nature, interfere with those carefully designed plans and could lead to production being prolonged beyond the design life of the facilities, and in those circumstances could be lost for ever. That is a peculiar feature of the offshore developments in the harsh environment that we have. Some of those who talk about depletion sometimes ignore the physical nature of the production from our offshore industry.

I would not, for the reasons that I have given, be happy to accept the amendment, not only for technical reasons but as a matter of principle. For certain fields, the powers that the hon. Gentleman seeks in his amendment would cut across other assurances that have been given, and understandings that have been reached between licensees and my Department during the consideration of development plans. In any case, if we ever wished to restrain production, the necessary powers to do it would be available under the model clauses. Therefore, powers along the lines of the amendment would not be required.

[Mr. Buchanan-Smith]

I repeat the point with which I opened the debate. If we were contemplating such powers, which we are not, they should be exercised by the Secretary of State and the Government and not by the agency.

I hope that this useful debate has helped to explain Government policy and to put into perspective the reason for the policy. In those circumstances, the hon. Gentleman may not feel it necessary to press the amendment.

Mr. Rowlands: In view of the way that the Minister responded to amendment No. 2, I accept his assurance that he will look closely at the situation as it develops in the practical way that I suggested.

On amendment No. 4, I have a sneaking suspicion that before too long it may be the oil companies themselves that will be coming to the Government to suggest ideas along the lines that I raised. I shall just wait and watch this space.

I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

9.52 pm

Mr. Buchanan-Smith: I beg to move, That the Bill be now read the Third time.

We have had good and long debates on the Bill on Second Reading, in Committee, and tonight on Report. I pay tribute to my hon. Friends who have supported us throughout proceedings on the Bill. I also pay tribute to Opposition Members—particularly those who have led for the Opposition—for a useful series of constructive debates in an important area of our economy and on very important issues. I am grateful for the generally constructive way in which they have approached the subject, although I have not always been able to respond by agreeing with them.

To go back to where we started, what we are doing in the Bill is very much based on a change in the structure of the world's oil market. It is that change in the structure and what is happening in the world of industry, business and commerce that caused my right hon. Friend and myself and the Government to look at the activities of BNOC, and particularly its main activity in the trading of participation oil. We were forced to the conclusion that, because of those changes in the market, the corporation had reached the end of its useful life.

I emphasise that the abolition of the corporation does not represent an application of any degree of dogma to the public sector. Rather, it represents the flexible way in which we have endeavoured to respond to the change in market circumstances. At the same time, it provides for a welcome reduction in the size of the public sector, where interference was not needed, although I think that Opposition Members have acknowledged that I have not sought to make that a major part of my arguments in the debates on the Bill.

This has been a useful debate. We have again debated the question of security of supply in times of shortage, a subject to which I attach great importance. If necessary, the agency can exercise certain powers. In our arrangements in relation to participation agreements, international matters and refineries, we have ensured that we retain all those important powers.

In recent years BNOC has been successful in operating as a pipelines agency. I hope that the work of the Oil and Pipelines Agency will carry on and be commercially successful.

I hope that the agency's work will prosper. BNOC has shed all its pure participation supplies in co-operation with the licensees. It has shed also, with their co-operation part of the supplies that it has been obtaining under long-term contracts. I hope that the remaining suppliers will quickly find satisfactory alternative purchasers. The remaining term supplies which the agency can trade freely are now only one tenth of the level before my statement of 13 March. The price paid by the BNOC is what the corporation can realise in the market. To that extent, BNOC has already detached itself from setting a price. That is a good base on which the agency can start.

I pay tribute to BNOC's staff. Things are now different. I wish the new agency and its staff every success.

9.56 pm

Mr. Rowlands: I thank the Minister of State for his kind words about the way that we have conducted our affairs. He has been unfailingly courteous to the Committee and to all hon. Members who have participated in the debates. I am sorry that we were not able to persuade him that in many ways he is fundamentally wrong. It remains our charge and case that, by abolishing the British National Oil Corporation, our oil supplies will be weakened. We do not believe that the right hon. Gentleman's paper assurances from the oil companies, paper participation agreements, and the stripped-down agency which is set up under the Bill provide an adequate alternative form of security of supply. I have charged the Minister of State more than once with the utter complacency behind the way in which he has argued the case for the Bill and the way in which the Government have chosen to pursue the abolition route—abolishing a successful, vibrant and productive corporation.

I am sorry that, despite our efforts, the agency that will be born in the Bill will be a pathetic stripped-down version of what we need. The new agency will be a declining organisation from the start — trading in declining amounts of royalty oil. I do not believe that the Minister will attract people of the necessary calibre and quality to work in that agency, as opposed to those who might reluctantly be forced to go to it from BNOC.

The agency is basically self-extinguishing, as the right hon. Gentleman said. Already in oil circles the Minister's "GOPA"—Government Oil and Pipelines Agency—has been treated with contempt and derision, because everyone knows that it is not the real thing. We shall therefore vote against the Bill because we know that it is not the real thing. We look forward to the day when a Labour Government will establish a real British National Oil Corporation serving the nation's need and especially the challenge of the North sea in the 1990s.

Mr. Portillo: I have had a number of opportunities to make known my views on the Bill, and I shall not weary the House by going into them at great length again.

I am disappointed that, when the Government took the opportunity to abolish BNOC, they felt the need to set up an agency in its place. My principal worry is that the setting up of an agency means that the Government will continue to be involved in the oil market. There is still a danger that the Government will be seen as a price setter, although I understand the points made by my right hon. Friend the Minister of State. There may still be turbulent days ahead in the oil market. In the past, when conditions on the oil market have become turbulent, someone has taken the blame for unsettling the oil price. As we enter the turbulent days ahead, some countries may again be looking for a scapegoat. I hope that my fears are groundless. Nevertheless, I harbour them.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bedfordshire, North (Mr. Skeet) and I attempted to persuade the Committee of the value of two amendments. One would have paved the way towards the privatisation of the oil pipelines and storage system, but we were unsuccessful in convincing the Committee of the merits of that scheme. I understood my right hon. Friend's argument that the time was not ripe for such a move. I was pleased——

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Ordered,

That, at this day's sitting, the Oil and Pipelines Bill and the Lords Amendments to the Trustee Savings Banks Bill may be proceeded with, though opposed, until any hour. — [Mr. Michael Neubert.]

OIL AND PIPELINES BILL

Question again proposed, That the Bill be now read the Third time.

Mr. Portillo: I was pleased to have my right hon. Friend's assurance that that matter could be reviewed from time to time.

I hope that the Bill, which I support, will have a short life as an Act. My right hon. Friend has conducted the proceedings with considerable charm, and I thank him for that. However, he has not succeeded in convincing me that the agency will play a useful role, in particular in enhancing our security of supply. I look forward to the introduction in due course of an oil and gas agency abolition Bill. In November I shall listen extremely carefully to the Queen's Speech to see whether that welcome Bill will be included in next Session's business.

Mr. Bruce: Today the Government have finished a job which I and the Labour party feel they should not have started. We have reached the point where it is as well to move on to a new policy to confront the changed circumstances. My colleagues and I felt that it was right and proper for the United Kingdom to have an integrated state oil corporation, as the British National Oil Corporation originally was. Its break-up is not in the United Kingdom's interests because it reduces the Government's bargaining power with oil companies. It has not been the Government's most conspicuous performance on privatisation, as many shareholders are discovering. However, it is now as well to finish the business, and for the Government to address themselves to developing an oil and gas policy, which they have not yet done.

We are producing oil at the rate of 1 million barrels of oil a day more than our domestic requirements. There was never any agreement or debate either inside or outside the House that we should move through self-sufficiency to that level of production, but that is what we have done. In reality, the production, pricing and taxation policies of the United Kingdom North sea are determined by the Organisation of Petroleum Exporting Countries, not the United Kingdom Government, and not in accordance with the British national interest. That happens to suit the Treasury's interests.

The generation to come will wonder why we produced 1 million barrels a day above our requirements, and why we constructed a taxation system that made it attractive for multinational companies to produce British North sea oil rather than oil from other reserves in other parts of the world, especially as that tax structure did not necessarily suit our national interests.

The Labour party's attitude is often rightly suspicious, but wrongly hostile, towards the oil companies. It does not seem to recognise that oil companies have skill and expertise which we use, and from which we have benefited. However, the Government seem not to recognise that the interests of multinational oil companies and the British national interest do not always coincide. There is a need for a much stronger recognition of that by the Government and for a much clearer debate on what our policy should be.

Now that we are to pass this Bill, the Government should consider their policy in a clear environment, because it is high time that we had a sensible policy for the future development of the North sea. The Government's present policy will come home to roost soon, when production and revenue decrease and they realise that they have not provided for that sad and rainy day.

Mr. Mike Woodcock (Ellesmere Port and Neston): The present chairman of Rolls-Royce, Sir Francis Tombs, recently said that decision-making in the private sector tends to be market and profit-related whereas decision-making in the public sector tends to be highly variable, politically influenced and slow. He was speaking from vast experience of private and public sector management, and most Conservative Members would agree with his sentiments. Of course, most Labour Members would disagree with them.

That division of opinion typifies the difference between the Government and the Opposition on the Bill. Arguments have dealt with which functions are best carried out by private industry and which are best carried out in the public sector. The British oil industry is typified by fierce, free competition, and its success in exploiting our national oil resources profitably provides an excellent case history of the benefits of free competition. It is a profitable industry that contributes massively to the public purse. It enjoys no subsidy, it is largely free of oppressive trade unions, and it has learnt the lessons of economic reality — all very different from some other primary energy industries.

Those characteristics of the oil industry are clearly typical of many large commercial organisations. However, we would all agree that some functions are better carried out by state enterprise than by private enterprise.

When I examined the Bill, I could see no problem with participation agreements and with royalties in kind. However, with my hon. Friend the Member for Enfield, Southgate (Mr. Portillo) I had some reservations about pipeline operations. We have 1,000 miles of pipeline and 41 installations established for war. Some strategic use remains, but their commercial use has been overtaken by events. One could argue that private interests would have operated the system more effectively than did the public sector, but against that we must consider the fact that the principal reason for establishing the pipeline was strategic, that the strategic element remains and that it could increase in the future.

We must come to terms with the fact that the pipeline system is little used in areas with a high defence use, but is used commercially much more in areas with a low defence use. It is difficult to establish suitable terms when defence and commercial considerations mix. However, the commercial users in my constituency at Stanlow, which is served by the pipeline, and the commercial operators in Humberside convinced me that they were happy with the present arrangements and that the management of the pipelines should remain with the state. That is why I concluded that the pipelines would be better managed by the agency.

The Bill is desirable because it renders to the private sector those functions which should be rendered to it, and leaves in the public sector those functions which are best carried out there. I welcome the Bill, which I am sure will contribute to the ever-increasing fortunes of our oil industry.

10.8 pm

Mr. Dalyell: Like several of my colleagues from central Scotland and the senior staff of the BNOC, some of whom are my constituents, nothing will persuade me that that organisation was broken up for any other reason than political dogma. It is a crying shame, and the nation will learn to regret having given up the BNOC. I am sure that it was a mistake.

One question that arose out of the debate has not been answered. Suppose that there is an understanding between British Petroleum and the Government. Is it sensible and right that that understanding should be in the form of a letter from a head of department in BP to a Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State? If there are these understandings, without going too much into the heirarchy about it, for heaven's sake, is not the right thing to have it from the chairman of BP to the Secretary of State? If they are so important, why is it done at such a low level?

Question put, That the Bill be now read the Third time:—

Trustee Savings Banks Bill

Lords amendments considered.

10.21 pm

Mr. Speaker: Earlier, the hon. Member for Dundee, East (Mr. Wilson) asked me to consider whether the Bill might be hybrid. I have considered the matter with great care. I must point out that the business before the House is the consideration of Lords amendments. No individual bank or depositor in Scotland is singled out for adverse treatment from among the class of trustee savings banks or depositors in Scotland by these amendments. Therefore, no question of hybridity arises.

Clause 1

PRELIMINARY

Lords amendment: No 1, in page 1, line 9, "banks" insert

"other than Trustee Savings Bank Scotland Limited which is hereby excluded from this Act"

Read a Second time.

Mr. Gordon Wilson (Dundee, East): I beg to move, amendment (a) to the Lords amendment, in line 2, leave out from 'which' to end and add

'shall not be included in this Act unless a majority of depositors of Trustee Savings Bank Scotland have first given their assent in a postal ballot.'.

Mr. Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to take Government amendments (b) to (d), plus (i) and (ii).

Mr. Wilson: I thank you, Mr. Speaker, for that ruling. Although I may disagree a little, I acknowledge that your view must prevail in these matters. I am grateful for the attention that you have given to my point of order.

I only wish that it were not necessary for me to move this amendment. If the Government had been prepared to accept the Lords amendment itself, or its spirit, TSB Scotland would have been able to continue its separate existence and I would not be moving the amendment, which suggests that the matter should go to a ballot of the depositors of the company.

I make it clear to those hon. Members who have not followed the debate that has been going on for so long that we are not dealing with a small subsidiary. TSB Scotland is the 11th largest company in Scotland and the most profitable bank by a long way, with £10,500 to £11,000 worth of earnings per employee. That compares with the Royal Bank of Scotland and the Bank of Scotland, for which the relevant figure is between £6,500 and £7,500, and the Clydesdale bank at the lower figure of £3,000 per employee. The Lords amendment is right. TSB Scotland is viable in its own right and should be deleted from the Bill. I shall give the reasons in due course.

The directors of the Edinburgh chamber of commerce passed a unanimous motion asking the Government to accept the Lords decision on the grounds that it was important to retain the autonomy of financial institutions in the city of Edinburgh. On 20 April 1985 Mr. Souness, the manager of the Life Association of Scotland and the chairman of the Edinburgh chamber of commerce, referred to the cosmetic formula that had been agreed with Lord Taylor of Gryfe, who a few months ago was instrumental in and deserves credit for derailing the Bill in the House of Lords. He said that the assurance would not count for much and that the issue was about where power lay. Criticism was made of the attitude adopted by the chairman of the Trustee Savings bank's central board, Sir John Read, when he visited Scotland. An editorial in The Scotsman described him as holding "the obdurate belief" that he and his fellow directors had got it right.

The Government's compromise in their intended replacement of the first Lords amendment is not worth a row of beads. I described it at the time as a spineless surrender and I do not retract that statement. The various assurances that are to be found in the letter addressed by Sir John Read to the Chancellor of the Exchequer on or about 16 May 1985 amount to very little. Sir John Read tossed to the Scots a string of beads to keep the natives happy.

The compromise suggests that the registered office of the group should be in Scotland. I am not sure what advantage the Government see in that proposal. The headquarters office, where the power lies, where decisions will be taken and where most of the money will be turned over, will be in London, so the conclusion must be that, like the Distillers Company or Burmah Oil, although nominally the registered office will be in Scotland, the real power and the real headquarters will be in London.

It is also suggested that there will be proposals to ensure that all banks in the TSB group remain as separate banks. This was always intended, so I do not know what advantage TSB Scotland, the banking fraternity in Scotland, the customers of TSB Scotland or the financial institutions in Scotland will derive from the proposals.

Another suggestion is that the trustees will be the directors of the new company. No more ridiculous suggestion could be made. The trustees of TSB Scotland have no credibility whatsoever. They cannot be trusted, apparently, to look after the interests of the Scottish bank. They do not intend to allow it to continue to have an independent existence. If that is so, how can they be trusted further?

I must make some comment on the strange ethics of the situation. Having willingly sacrificed themselves to the predator, the TSB Group, they appear willing to remain in the saddle to be appointed directors of the new banking subsidiary in Scotland. I am not sure what remuneration they will receive for that, whether it is 300 or 3,000 or 30,000 pieces of silver for betraying the birthright which should have been theirs after the creation of the trustee savings bank movement in Scotland two centuries ago. That pecuniary interest sits ill with the role of trustees. Even if it had been independent at the outset, the group will retain the veto, which it can exercise over the choice of new trustees. Any initiative which TSB Scotland might have been able to maintain under the new regime, will be killed off over a period if the TSB Group so wishes.

10.30 pm

There are also managerial problems associated with the changes which have been suggested. At present, these directors will not be elected by anyone; they will be appointed, if we agree with Sir John Read, the chairman of the TSB Group, as new directors of the company, without election. They will not be responsible in any way to any independent body of shareholders. Under that kind of regime, TSB Scotland will go into slack and supine managerial hands. That is because, without responsibility to shareholders, there will be little reason for management to exert itself.

If one looks at the comparison which I gave at the beginning of my remarks between the earning capacity per employee of the Scottish banks, it is noticeable that the one with the lowest figure of £3,000 per employee, is the Clydesdale bank. It is the only Scottish bank which is a fully owned subsidiary of an external bank, the Midland. Much of the profitable work which could be undertaken by the Clydesdale bank goes to the Midland and to its specialist investment companies and merchant banks. The Clydesdale is therefore denuded of some of the more lucrative sections of the market.

Yet this seems to be the area to which we will be condemning TSB Scotland if the House succeeds in overturning the Lords amendment to cut TSB Scotland out of this bad Bill. These directors will be a self-perpetuating oligarchy. They will be appointed by no one, elected by no one and responsible to no one. That is bad in itself. As for the proposal that 75 per cent. of the directors will have to live in Scotland, that is the merest token that could ever have been devised, and in relation to the safeguarding of the net worth, it can be overtaken in the course of time.

We have a thrusting, dynamic bank at present, but the picture will change dramatically if the Lords amendment is over turned. The Government are on very uncertain ground over the Bill. The amendment I have suggested in lieu of the Lords amendment which the Government intend to demolish, is intended to ensure that, before any precipitate or final action is taken, there should be a decision by the depositors of the bank in a ballot. A majority of the depositors should agree to the changes which have been suggested by the TSB. There are specific reasons why that is desirable.

I do not feel it necessary to rehearse some of the background information I gave you, Mr. Speaker, in my point of order earlier today. If one looks at the opinion expressed by Mr. John Murray, QC, to the Trustee Savings bank central board—that is, the London body—one sees the assertion that under Scots law the trustee savings banks in Scotland are owned by the contributors. The contributors are the depositors and the depositors are the members of the bank. Therefore, the ownership of the bank rests with the depositors. If the opinion is correct, they are entitled to the produce, the reserves and assets, of the bank. I should have thought that extending wealth within the community and ensuring the widest possible ownership of the assets of this successful institution would be welcome to the Government. It is surprising that the Treasury was prepared to say in the White Paper that there was doubt about the ownership.

Some of the matters that I raised during the earlier points of order about the information given to the House require answers from the Treasury. Did the Government receive a copy of the opinion? Did they conduct their own legal inquiries into ownership? If the central board had received such an opinion, suggesting that ownership rested with depositors, would not it have been desirable for the bank to go to the Court of Session with an action of declarator asking the court to declare as to ownership, so that that was cleared out of the way at the start?

No attempt has been made by TSB Scotland or by the central board to apprise the depositors, the prima facie owners of the bank, of their rights. It was surely essential that they should have done so. The bank was established for the customers and they have put their faith and money into TSB Scotland. Over successive generations, they have built up a very successful business which is now to be destroyed.

Given the opinion that has been received and the fact that there is to be an action in court tomorrow, it is all the more regrettable that the Government have precipitately determined to drive on regardless. Many people will regard it as legalised theft if, by an Act of Parliament, the ownership and resources of the bank are taken away from the working people for whom it was established and distributed to speculators, which is what will happen if the flotation goes ahead.

Many people in Scotland who have no objection to flotations and joint stock companies feel that this example of exploitation should not be allowed to proceed.

The Government wish to defeat the Lords amendment. My amendment suggests that before any other action takes place, the owners of the bank—the depositors—should be consulted in a postal ballot to get their views. The Government are keen on postal and other ballots in other areas. Before transferring the bank's assets to their friends in the City, they should at least test the strength of their position.

I cannot see what objection there can be to getting the agreement of the depositors. If the depositors, deemed the owners, agree to the demutualisation, if that is the correct term, of the company, at least TSB Scotland, the TSB Group and the Government will be on far stronger ground. That will be the result of a majority vote in favour. It is incumbent on the Government to tell the House whether they will accept the amendment which I have tabled. If they do not respond and if they fail to say yes, I hope that they will explain why insufficient information about this sordid affair has been placed before the House.

We are dealing with an important Scottish company. When I started my opposition to the Bill, I did so primarily on the basis that it would be a loss to the Scottish economy and the financial scene if this huge unit were to be taken out of our control. Its removal would inflict considerable damage on us.

Mr. Robert Hughes (Aberdeen, North): I am following the hon. Gentleman closely. He is making a strong plea for the bank to be left in Scottish control. However, earlier in his remarks he was critical of those in control of the bank's affairs for apparently selling out. The hon. Gentleman cannot have it both ways.

Mr. Wilson: Indeed I can have it both ways. I usually do, and I am usually right. I have explained that my objection to the Bill at the outset was based on the economic and financial loss that the Scottish economy would face. However, we have run into a more fundamental issue, which is whether such a company, which has had successful mutual control in the past, should have that form of control unilaterally dismantled without the consent of the depositors, who I believe to be the true owners of the bank.

We in Scotland have had successful mutual companies in the insurance section which have done very well. I would not trust the trustees as directors in controlling the future of TSB Scotland, especially if they are answerable to no one—except ultimately, I suppose, the TSB central board. I accept that the bank has built up extremely well in recent years, has served its customers and expanded its services. One can recognise work well done of that sort but it is still possible to criticise the trustees of TSB Scotland for their ultimate lack of vision. It appears that they have close sight but no long sight of the future.

Many Scottish companies have been taken over in the past and when that has happened the vitality has often seeped out of them and has not been replaced. Eventually these companies have either been entirely absorbed—that happened to many individual insurance companies which were based in Scotland—or closed, with job losses and a loss of leadership in the Scottish community.

If the Government insist on opposing Lords amendment No. 1, which I consider to offer the best solution, they should consider the formula which I have outlined in amendment (a) which provides that, before TSB Scotland is included in their proposals, consent should be obtained from the depositors by way of a postal ballot. In that way the Government would emerge with great credit. It is still open to them to take that course rather than to find that they have disappointed the Scottish community in the unfortunate way in which the Bill has been prepared.

I could accept from the Minister the view that he has asserted in the past that the Bill is not one in which the Government have a pecuniary interest and that he is acting as agent for the TSB Group and, through that, TSB Scotland, but an agent is responsible to a principal. In this case, the principal is not necessarily the TSB trustees but the owners of the bank, the depositors. If that is so, the Minister would be acting in dereliction of his duty as agent if he accepted instructions from the wrong principal.

Now that he has the information and opinion that I have supplied, I hope that the Minister will acknowledge that the Government should not wish to be involved in a scandal of this sort and, even now, will accept a solution which would remove them from the hook on which they have been placed.

Mr. Donald Dewar (Glasgow, Garscadden): The new TSB's difficult birth is being attended with much doubt and uncertainty. I have no wish, in what I thought optimistically would be a short debate, to rehearse the whole history of the affair. The central issue with which we are concerned in this group of amendments is whether the exclusion of TSB Scotland from the Bill, as brought forward in another place, should survive and whether, if it does not survive, how adequate will be the Government's replacement provisions.

The debate in the other place represented an interesting episode. Lord Taylor of Gryfe apparently has an unbounded enthusiasm for devolution in the world of banking, though that enthusiasm does not have a wider application, if I remember the noble Lord's history.

I do not go all the way with the hon. Member for Dundee, East (Mr. Wilson) or with the depositors in writing off as totally worthless the concessions that have been extracted. In one of the depositors' circulars, those concessions were described as an insult to the intelligence of the Scottish electorate. While that was an overstatement, a number of questions need answering about those concessions and I hope that the Minister will provide the answers.

I am sure that I speak for many hon. Members when I say that we have no enthusiasm for the self-perpetuating board, as envisaged. The board of TSB Scotland will renew itself. It is the equivalent in the world of nature of the amoeba in the sense that it is self-generating, needing no outside help, although there is a negative check in the approval of the main board. I did not have the privilege of serving on the Standing Committee, but I expect that there was an explanation of whether they would be executive directors and whether they would be part-time or full-time. The Minister might wish to clear that up.

More helpful is the fact that the chairman and chief executive of each subsidiary bank will serve on the main board and that there will be no reduction in the worth of the bank without the consent of two thirds of that subsidiary bank's board of directors, although a cynic might ask what the worth of that is, given their silence on present events.

The real question concerns the value of the safeguards. The Minister said that there would be no vesting order until all the alternations in the articles of association had been made and the promised safeguards were in position. However, articles of association can be altered at a later date. The trouble is that the safeguards offered are immediate and there is no guarantee that they will stand the test of time. The Minister may wish to comment on that important matter, especially when we consider the adequacy or otherwise of what he proposes to put in place of the Lords amendment.

It is difficult to be objective about these issues. As we contemplate the scene, one can hear the creaks of bandwagons rumbling, and certain sections of the SNP—I am careful to say "certain sections"—have been shamelessly jumping aboard. Last week it was wreaths in memory of the Labour party at the Royal High building; this week it is the Trustee Savings bank. Goodness knows what it will be next week. We must look at the arguments. There are two main areas of contention—one is the form of ownership proposed for the new organisation and the second is the loss of Scottish identity subsumed in the larger United Kingdom organisation.

I am not convinced by some of the rather romantic visions of the TSB as presently constituted, which have been used to buttress some of the debates during the course of the Bill. I do not want to go back to the philosophy of the Rev. Henry Duncan of Ruthwell and his famous strongbox with its three separate locks. However, I must tell the hon. Member for Dumfries (Sir H. Monro), whose peon of praise for the good cleric I read with interest, that he is a rather unlikely hero for a Conservative Member because his other characteristic was a decision to defy an interdict from the Court of Session during the famous legal proceedings in the Strathbogie case running up to the disruption. I would have thought that that would not have commended itself to Conservatives.

In any event whatever the Rev. Henry Duncan may or may not have done, there is a somewhat rosy coloured glow as people look at how the status of depositors has developed during the course of the TSB movement. I remember an interesting chapter in Olive Checkland's book "Philanthropy in Victorian Scotland", which deals with this at some length. I recommend it to anyone who is interested. I shall weary the House with only one sentence, which is:

"The concept of trusteeship was an elitist notion: depositors had no voice in the management of the Savings Banks."

That holds true today, even as it did in the days of Victorian philanthropy that are sometimes beloved of Government Back Benchers.

I am confident that the average depositor—one of the nameless 1·25 million, of whom there are several on the Benches behind me—thinks that he has a substantial stake in the management of the TSB as presently constituted. However, it is fair to concede that there is a big difference between management and ownership. Whatever the position of the depositors in terms of management, they have a special position in the bank that is not fully recognised in the scheme embodied in this legislation.

There has been a great deal of talk about the Page committee. The findings on ownership were quoted effectively by my hon. Friend the Member for Thurrock (Dr. McDonald) on Second Reading. The House will remember that when that committee considered something very much like the solution that has now been adopted, it reached the conclusion that it was neither practical nor desirable.

There is also the open question whether the bank is or is not, in the law of Scotland, owned by its depositors. The hon. Member for Dundee, East quoted the opinion of a well-known Queen's counsel at the Scottish Bar, Mr. John Murray. We are led to understand—and I have not seen a copy of the document—that his view was that, as an unincorporated body, it was owned by the depositors. Of course, that is not the law of the land. It is an educated guess about what the courts might find if they were invited to consider that question. But it underlines that we are in a peculiar position tonight because we are all aware that there is an action pending in the courts—an application for interdict—that is likely to be heard tomorrow. None of us know the outcome of that. It will be strange if the Court of Session says tomorrow that ownership is with the depositors and grant an interdict on that basis.

Perhaps the Minister can tell us the Government's view of the effect of such an interdict. If he has doubts, he can obtain an instant opinion from another QC sitting on his left—the Solicitor-General for Scotland.

Will Parliament override the court and make the interdict useless? What will be the effect of that interdict? What will happen to depositors who have been established in ownership and have a tangible right, which we are alienating, who will have no rights in the courts because Parliament is legislating to destroy their right to pursue their claim? That raises interesting questions which are not academic and which might become horribly relevant tomorrow.

I hope that the Minister will give us the benefit of his thoughts on the matter. If he cannot do that, I hope that we shall hear from the Solicitor-General for Scotland.

The Page committee, the opinion of counsel and the atmosphere of the trustee savings bank movement has been referred to. I believe that a substantial shift is envisaged in the Bill. It is not a matter that involves only a technical reconstruction of company status.

Leaving aside the question whether the bank is thrusting and dynamic, the TSB has served its depositors and its existence is based upon offering certain services. No one apart from salaried professionals, makes a profit or obtains a fee.

Under the new arrangement trustees will have a different remit. They will be bound by the Companies Act. Their job will be to maximise profits for the benefit of a different body of people—the shareholders. There might be an overlap. They will do that by extracting profit from the depositors. That will create a different atmosphere.

The important position now held by depositors was recognised by the Minister in his recent letter to Mr. R. A. G. Bennett of the depositors' association when he said that the preferential share option scheme was a recognition of the special place of the depositors in the TSB set-up.

Depositors are in a special position. The evidence for that is contained not only in the Page report, but in the way that the bank has been operating. To that we want to add the Scottish dimension. Scotland has a long and distinguished involvement and a well-developed network. Central funds have been gathered there. We have come a long way since the Rev. Henry Duncan's banks were established to "ameliorate the conditions of the lower orders"

I am told that 3,000 employees are involved, that the operating profit is £32 million, that there are 2 million accounts and 1·5 million depositors. There is no doubt that the Scottish bank would be a substantial entity if it existed in its own right. That was tacitly admitted by an authority that might appeal at least to Conservative Members—Lord Bruce-Gardyne—who said on 16 April 1985 that TBS Scotland would be well able to stand on its own two feet. I do not think that there would be any argument about that.

I do not want to argue that case at this stage at any length, but there is an understandable anxiety. It was referred to by my hon. Friend the Member for Thurrock on Second Reading, when she pointed out that there was a danger of the bank, weak in the south, using the vast majority of its resources over the opening years to try to cover the areas where it had not a long and well-established tradition. She rightly said that that should not be at the expense of Scotland and the north.

We have here a fair amendment that calls for consultation. There is clearly a case for that consultation, based on the Scottish experience. There may be an argument about whether it is right to go ahead on the present arrangements, but that should be tested. I hope that I have established that the depositors are people who have a particular interest and should be consulted.

I have no doubt that substantial arguments can be put forward by the promoters of the scheme. They can argue that the employees are, as I understand, largely in favour of the reorganisation going ahead. They can talk about a better service for the customer from a commercial bank with a more competitive system. They can argue that the depositors' association is unrepresentative. It has not hidden the fact that it came late in the field and has only about 200 members out of the 1,250,000 depositors. The promoters can argue that an independent bank would be open to a substantial possibility of takeovers and would be in a weak position. There are all sorts of arguments, and it is not for us tonight to come to a conclusion on them.

I have tried to put some arguments and the hon. Member for Dundee, East has done the same. On both sides there are arguments that should be decided by the depositors, and they should be consulted before we come to a final conclusion on the matter. The very fact that they are entitled to preferential treatment perhaps underlines the case for consultation of the kind that I have mentioned.

[Mr. Donald Dewar]

I am a member of a building society. I was surprised to discover that I am a member because I have only a few pounds in an ordinary share account. A couple of days ago I received a voting slip, because the building society is about to amalgamate. It is asking me to vote on whether I want that amalgamation to go ahead. I accept that a building society has a very different structure from that of a trustee savings bank, but it is thought not inappropriate that everyone who has a deposit in the building society should be allowed to vote on whether the Alliance should join with the Leicester. All we are asking is for the same sort of basic right for the depositors in the TSB.

I hope that the Government will look sympathetically at the amendments. I hope that they will accept that there is a case for consultation, given the Scottish dimension that we have been talking about and given the undoubted change in the status of depositors that would result from the Bill. If the Minister will accept the amendment, or one of them, we can proceed with harmony and consent and there need be no further delay. If he cannot, I believe that we should divide the House upon it and, if we are unsuccessful, mark our disapproval by dividing also on the main Question.

Mr. George Robertson (Hamilton): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. May I ask your advice on the important issue that we are considering? Various privileges are to be conferred by the Bill on depositors with the Trustee Savings Bank. There will be hon. Members in the House this evening who may be intending to vote and who may have accounts and be depositors with the Trustee Savings Bank.

I have an account with the Trustee Savings Bank which contains 81p, but the principle goes beyond that. In view of the lucrative offers that are being patronisingly placed before depositors, Mr. Deputy Speaker, can you advise me —and perhaps the House as well—as to the position of hon. Members if as depositors they were to find themselves in the Division Lobbies this evening?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): The practice of the House is clear. Any hon. Member who has a pecuniary interest in the matter being debated and who is participating in the debate should declare that pecuniary interest. All hon. Members may vote on a matter of public interest. I hope that that is clear.

Sir Hector Monro (Dumfries): I am sure that Dr. Henry Duncan would be surprised that, 175 years after founding the savings bank movement, his name has been trotted about the Floor of the House at 11 pm. The hon. Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) thought that it was unlikely that I would support Dr. Duncan, but I do. He set a fine example of sticking by one's principles over the disruption. At least a fine monument was erected in memory of his good work. This is unlikely to be reciprocated in the streets of Garscadden.

I think that Dr. Duncan would want the House to bear in mind that he spent much of his time promoting the savings bank movement in England and Wales. He was internationally minded and outward looking—very far removed from the narrow internal views of the hon. Member for Dundee, East (Mr. Wilson).

It is important to delve into the history not of the distant past but of the past two or three months. I should like my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary to marry Government amendment (d) with the important letter from Sir John Read, the TSB chairman, which was printed in detail in the other place on 4 July in reply to a written question by Lord Taylor of Gryfe to the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster. How binding is the letter? How tied into the legislation is the assurance that in Scotland we will have the many factors set out in the letter, especially in relation to which is registered in Scotland—I think that this is covered by deed—the issues relative to the charitable foundations under paragraph 4 (iii) and the membership of the Scottish board under paragraph 4(v)?

If my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary spells out in detail how he sees the arrangements for conducting the business of the Trustee Savings bank—both the United Kingdom and the Scottish groups—and how they tie together, that may well go a long way towards alleviating the concern in some parts of Scotland. This concern has not been reciprocated by the staff of the TSB nor originally by the trustees when the Bill came before us on Second Reading.

All of us who live in Scotland, who are interested in the bank's success and who realise that a large part of the bank's success in Scotland will go towards making it a great successor in the United Kingdom—[Interruption.] Why does the right hon. Member for Western Isles (Mr. Stewart) laugh at that? Is he not proud that the Scottish bank can take the lead in the United Kingdom? Should he not be pleased, rather than sit there girning away?

Mr. Donald Stewart (Western Isles): Surely the hon. Gentleman is aware from his experience that that is not the way the scenario will operate. The bank will simply become a branch office without any power.

Sir Hector Monro: Despite all the years that the right hon. Gentleman has served in the House his mind never broadens or becomes more up to date. In some years' time he will realise that tonight he witnessed the passage of legislation that greatly enhanced the prestige of the TSB in Scotland.

I hope that when my hon. Friend replies to the debate, which is broadly similar to the Second Reading debate in the other place, he will spell out how the letter from Sir John Read is tied into legislation. We want an assurance that what Sir John Read said will take place, and is bound as far as possible by legislation.

Mr. Jim Craigen (Glasgow, Maryhill): My hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) said that we were in a peculiar position. Indeed, we are, because we are dealing with a peculiar Bill. On Second Reading I declared an interest as a depositor in the Trustee Savings bank, and, as hon. Members know, I opposed Second Reading.

In the other place Lord Gowrie said that the Government could not allow the Bill to proceed to Royal Assent with clause 3. The Bill should not be enacted. Therefore, I would not be unhappy if the Government's motion, that we disagree with the Lords, were refused. It is becoming increasingly evident that serious questions about the ownership of the bank, if not in England and Wales, certainly in Scotland, have not been adequately resolved.

The group of amendments arises from an amendment of Lord Taylor of Gryfe, which succeeded on Report in another place. That amendment, which aroused a great deal of interest in Scotland, revealed the extent to which Edinburgh's financial establishment had been sleeping because it came some time after this House had given the Bill a Second Reading. It does not instil me with much confidence in Edinburgh as the second financial centre in the United Kingdom that Edinburgh took so long to wake up to what was going on.

It is more than anecdotal——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. Gentleman, but an unreasonable volume of noise is coming from the vicinity of the Bar of the House. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will be given the opportunity to deliver his speech without too much background noise.

Mr. Craigen: It has been suggested to me that Lord Taylor's amendment might not have been passed in the other place if the President of Malawi had not been visiting the United Kingdom. There was a big dinner in his honour at Windsor Castle and, therefore, many on the Government side in the other place were absent. I am sure that Dr. Banda, who resided in and was educated in Scotland, would have a good old chuckle at that.

The more serious aspect was the flaw in Lord Taylor's amendment. Reference was made to the letter from the chairman of the central board. All hon. Members may not share the simplistic confidence exuded by the hon. Member for Dumfries (Sir H. Monro), but it seems an eggshell of a scheme. The first tap of a wooden spoon would give us a smack of what the scheme amounts to.

We have been told that the head office of TSB Scotland will be in Scotland, and that the TSB Group's registered office will be in Edinburgh. I understand that the Scottish Council (Development and Industry) has already said that it wants the entire operation to be located in Edinburgh. The shareholders' annual general meeting will be in Edinburgh, no doubt at the time of the Edinburgh festival.

Those assurances, and the supposed safeguards about residential qualification for the directors of the new TSB in Scotland, do not amount to much. They certainly do not overcome the basic problem of ownership, which the Government have not fully resolved, and the question whether it is right for the Government to consent to the flotation of TSB on the stock market.

Lord Taylor in another place said that the concessions that had been agreed with the chairman of the central board of the TSB were more than half a loaf. However, having examined the concessions closely, it seems to me that they are little more than a handful of grain. They provide some managerial assurances, not proprietorial safeguards, because they do not alter the effect of the change in control.

This might be a convenient moment to say why I tabled amendment (ii), which calls for consultative arrangements with depositors. Although the Government are likely to have their way this evening, I believe that there should be adequate arrangements to ensure that the depositors with the TSB have a voice in the new set-up. It is clear from Sir John Read's letter that he envisages that no more than about one tenth of the depositors will become shareholders of the new TSB. We have been told all along that it is desirable to have shareholders because we wish to involve many more people in the running of the bank, yet it is explicitly acknowledged in the letter that not many more than one tenth of the depositors are likely to become shareholders.

Therefore, it is all the more important that some mechanism is written into the Bill so that the other nine tenths of depositors can have some machinery by which their views and complaints can be made known to the board. That should not be left to the whim of the chairman or the board. Since the TSB wished to be different and to involve more people than do the clearing banks, I should have thought that it would have wanted to have some customer representation within the established arrangements. That is why it was important to table the amendment.

Some reference has been made to mutuality. A depositors' association has been set up. Irrespective of whether it has 230 or 250 members so far, the fact is that there must be some recognition of depositors' rights in this exercise.

I noticed with interest that, in the letter which the Treasury Minister sent to the chairman of the Scottish TSB Depositors' Association on 4 July 1985, the Government made their position quite clear on the matter of mutuality. Copies of the letter were issued as a parliamentary answer. The Minister said:

> "I agree of course that there are successful mutual financial institutions. But it is one thing to allow long-established mutuals to continue in business in their traditional fields of activity and quite another to set up brand-new mutual arrangements in modern circumstances."

The Government effectively appear to be trumpeting a new arrangement that organisations will be either private or public. In the Government's scheme of fiscal and economic affairs, it seems that there will be no encouragement and precious little assistance to mutuality as a concept. I wonder whether that is entirely desirable.

Many hon. Members have experience of mutuality in other areas. The TSB is not strictly a mutual, but I see no reason why it could not have moved towards the concept of mutuality. I think that the TSB could raise the capital for which it is looking, had it had shares which could be indexed and interest paid. I do not think that it needs to float an unknown business on the stock exchange to raise the capital which it says is necessary for many of these developments.

When the Minister tells the House why we should accept the Government proposal and disagree with the Lords amendment, I should like him to say whether the Government, had they known counsel's opinion, which was apparently given to the TSB in April 1979, would have come forward with a Bill, or would have left it entirely to the Trustee Savings bank to introduce a private Bill.

On Second Reading, I described the measure as closet privatisation. I want to know where the Treasury stands in all this. Many questions have been unanswered in the conduct of this highly undesirable plan to sell off the TSB.

As I said before, it will be a highly lucrative exercise. Those who buy will not be risking anything in the way that they would be in buying equities in a business. The reserves of the TSB are such that it will be an Aladdin's cave. I am not sure whether the Minister is Ali Baba or one of the 40 thieves, but I think it is important that the Treasury should spell out precisely where it stands, given the knowledge that the House now has.

Mr. Nicholas Fairbairn (Perth and Kinross): I declare an interest. I am, or was, a depositor in the Edinburgh savings bank, and discovered, following the publication of the Bill, that my account, which stood at £1 10s 6d, is now worth £2·68 28 years later. I do not know whether that is in favour of or against the present structure of the bank, but that is the extent of my interest. No doubt I will be one of the thieves of whom the hon. Member for Glasgow, Maryhill (Mr. Craigen) has just spoken, because I would be entitled to shares if the matter goes forward to flotation.

Several matters of important principle are raised. It is obvious that no hon. Member—and it is not yet settled in the courts—is certain about the legal constitution of the organisation of the Trustee Savings bank. Without wishing to give a firm opinion, I would say that the Bill would turn a non-profit-making association into a profit-making company. If I am right, the distinction is that the original association had, under the trusts legislation—that is why it is called a trustee savings bank—a duty to maximise the benefits of the depositors. That is why the name was changed from the Edinburgh savings bank or any other bank to the Trustee Savings bank. Those who were in charge of it therefore had a duty to maximise the benefits of the beneficiaries—the depositors.

The new company has a completely different duty. It is exempted from, even if it is not precisely under, the requirements of trusts legislation, to maximise profits as a commercial organisation. Such a company has an utterly different structure in law in Scotland and in understanding as an organisation. The Government are merely the agent, runner or duty doer for the board of the TSB in putting forward the Bill. I do not believe that the Government would ever have done that if they had conceived of the legal structure of the bank.

We do not know what the legal structure of the bank is. The Court of Session will begin to decide that tomorrow. We know however, that it was called the Trustee Savings bank because it was believed to be such an organisation. It would have been a contravention of the Trade Descriptions Act 1968 if anybody had called it that and it had not been a trustee savings bank.

I do not wish to judge something which, if it is not sub judice, is very nearly sub judice. Let us assume that, as I have proposed, the court decides that the organisation comes under the umbrella of trusts legislation and has a duty to provide for the maximisation of the benefit of the beneficiaries — the depositors. Then the Bill will supravene abante the rights of the beneficiaries. It will be taking a trust and making it into a commercial enterprise without the consent of the beneficiaries, contrary to the duties of the trustees.

We can take it the other way. The case may go to the first division and then to the other place, so it may be a long process. I am not looking into the motivation of those who raised the action but into the rights and wrongs of the matter. Supposing that the courts decide the other way. Then, have not the depositors, all these years, been misled as to their rights, and the duties of the directors?

I know that there are political motives. I know that there are those who say that anything that is Scottish must remain Scottish, and those who want to know whether the ban will be more Scottish if Sir John Read's letter is implemented than ever it was before. I am unimpressed by either the one side or the other. I am impressed by the fact that the defensive letter of Sir John Read has no force in statute and that any allegation that it is an earnest of eternal will has no force.

I am certain of various matters that concern me. The directors sought the opinion of counsel, which they were always entitled to reject, and which has regrettably—because it is a confidential matter—been revealed. It has been revealed, and we understand that they were informed and did not challenge that information, that the bank belonged to the depositors and that they were trustees for the beneficiaries. The directors then came to the Government to ask them to derogate their duty and later the function of that charity—trusts are charities. That raises serious poblems. If we are then told that the same adviser is advising them on the matters in which they are trying to reverse his opinion, that also raises serious matters.

We are told that Lord Taylor of Gryfe in the other place acts for Morgan Grenfell, which is, after all, acting with Noble Grossart in the Bell's whisky deal. The day after Lord Taylor accepted the advice, who was it that Sir John Read said would be a satisfactory director? It was Angus Grossart, of Noble Grossart. That raises other matters.

I am not, and hope will never be, able to understand anything about finance. I hate alligators, and I hate predators, and I hate everything about finance. However, if the financial institutions of Scotland are to be run on the basis that the TSB gets the advice of top counsel, hides that advice from the Government and asks the Government to bring in a Bill that contradicts it, then asks the same counsel to advise it in the opposite direction, and then in the other place the Government accept a compromise from a noble Lord who is in the financial institution of Morgan Grenfell, and the bank of Morgan Grenfell, in league with Noble Grossart says that the safeguard is to appoint one of their directors, all I can say is that the scepticism of a natural Jacobite Episcopalian is confirmed .

I am not a little Scotlander, but I am a little depositor in Trustee Savings Bank Scotland. I am very sceptical about constitutional arrangements whereby a trust becomes a public company when the question whether or not it is a trust has yet to be decided by the courts. The principles I have raised tonight ought to give a great deal of thought to a great number of people.

Mr. Barry Porter (Wirral, South): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Although I am not an accountant, a Scot or even a Pict, I have listened with great interest to this debate and have become increasingly disturbed by the points about interest that have been raised. I am a partner in a firm that is a substantial customer of the Trustee Savings bank. Originally, Mr. Deputy Speaker, you made a distinction between declaring an interest and speaking and then voting on a matter of public interest. I am not entirely certain about the distinction between the public interests and the private interests of a firm like mine. If this flotation takes place, my firm and I, as a partner in that firm, will have a substantial interest in it. I should welcome a ruling about how you make a distinction between public and private interests in a matter of this nature. At the moment I am reluctant either to speak or eventually to vote upon it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am surprised that the hon. Gentleman has taken such a close interest in this matter, since I have been disturbed by the unreasonable noises that have been disrupting the debate from below the Gangway. I doubt whether I can usefully add to my earlier ruling that all hon. Members have a right and a responsibility, in accordance with the practice of the House, to declare any pecuniary interests that they may have in the subject under debate.

Mr. Porter: Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. On behalf of my hon. Friends the Members for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton) and for Birmingham, Selly Oak (Mr. Beaumont-Dark) I apologise for the noise that they have been creating, but I have been seeking their advice. I am no wiser, nor am I much better informed about the distinction between public and private interests. Therefore in accordance with my conscience I declare an interest. It would be quite wrong of me to vote on this matter.

Mr. Robert Maclennan (Caithness and Sutherland): This has been a strange debate. The Bill has followed a very unexpected course. When the Government first introduced it, the matters that have become so controversial tonight, at a late stage in the proceedings on the Bill, appear not to have ruffled the feathers of those who are alleged to be most at risk from the proposals of the trustees of the Trustee Savings bank Scotland.

There has been a penumbra of criticism throughout the debate of the motivation of the trustees in suggesting this flotation and of the Bill that the Government have adopted —a penumbra that became rather more solid when the hon. and learned Member for Perth and Kinross (Mr. Fairbairn) spoke. He implied a somewhat sleazy motivation. It is going slightly beyond what is strictly necessary to impute improper motives to those who have been putting forward these proposals since August 1982. There has been singularly little criticism of these proposals, either from the depositors or from the commercial rivals of the Trustee Savings bank Scotland, or from anyone who might have been thought to be adversely affected by the proposals.

Mr. Fairbairn: I did not say that the motivation of those who proposed this matter was in any way sleazy. I said that once the matter had been proposed and difficulties arose, what happened thereafter might be subject to close scrutiny.

Mr. Maclennan: The House has been subjecting this Bill to ever closer scrutiny, and no doubt will properly continue to do so for a little time yet. What has come out at this late stage in the Bill is that the proposed shape of the new bank is thought in some way to provide less protection for depositors than previously existed.

The hon. Member for Glasgow, Maryhill (Mr. Craigen) has taken a close interest on the Opposition side of the House in this matter for a long time. He complained that there might be under-representation in the new structure because only 10 per cent. of the depositors will be in the shareholding body. But that will be 10 per cent. more than has been represented in management decisions or in the decision-making process of the bank at any stage in its history. It is at least plausible to argue that the principal concern of the trustees in moving towards this new shape for the bank is the interests of the depositors. One must assume from their silence that the depositors have consented to what has been done. Over a period of three years, they have had plenty of opportunity to raise this matter.

For the bank to be organised as a public limited company would be in the interests of depositors. The bank has increasingly become comparable to a clearing bank and has ceased to be primarily a savings institution. It operates in the hight street like other banks and operates accounts that can be drawn upon. I doubt whether depositors really view it as being, in important respects, very different from, shall we say, the Royal bank or the Bank of Scotland. The operations have become very difficult to distinguish for the ordinary depositor who uses the services of the bank.

These facts have been somewhat lost sight of in the understandable and wholly legitimate controversy that has arisen about whether the Trustee Savings bank Scotland should be operated as a Scottish bank in Scotland with all the benefits that might bring to a strenghtened Scottish financial sector. There was a singular lack of criticism from those who have been concerned to see some strengthening of the Scottish financial sector. I suppose that the hon. and learned Member for Perth and Kinross believes that that is because they were in some way competitors and might not be interested in making that case. There were certainly others who, for political or other motives, might have thought it appropriate to boost the case for the independence of the Trustee Savings bank.

I need not go over the facts about the strength of the Trustee Savings bank Scotland. The statistics were cited by the hon. Members for Dundee, East (Mr. Wilson) and for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) earlier in the debate. It is perfectly clear that the Trustee Savings bank Scotland is by far the strongest part of the whole trustee savings bank coterie. It could have stood on its own feet and I regret that is not what was proposed, because it would have been extremely sensible and we would have given it our support. They said to the Government, "Let us join this new United Kingdom organisation and let us do so without any protection of the separate Scottish interest." That was the point that the Bill had reached when the hon. Member for Dundee, East moved his famous amendment. There are many more hon. Members in the Chamber tonight than there were on that occasion. To give the hon. Gentleman credit, it must be said that he has taken a consistent line on the matter and has pushed the issue further.

The hon. Member for Dundee, East had only 29 votes for his amendment and the matter appeared to have been lost. It was revived only when my noble Friend Lord Taylor of Gryfe moved an amendment in another place that was given all-party backing, including support from the Labour party in the unexpected person of Lord Stoddart of Swindon and reluctant support from Lord Ross of Marnock. Even at that late stage, they sought to extract a new structure for the Scottish side of the TSB.

It was too late to rewrite the Bill. It would have been desirable for TSB Scotland to be established separately, and that could have been done, but it was not open to another place to unravel the Bill. The political reality was that the Government, with their substantial majority in this House, could have overridden any amendment and left the Bill in its original form. It would have had the wholehearted support of the hon. Member for Dumfries (Sir H. Monro) in that. He was utterly contemptuous of the amendment of the hon. Member for Dundee, East and he suggested that the hon. Gentleman knew nothing about Scottish banking. Events have proved the hon. Member for Dumfries wrong.

The agreement that followed consideration of the Bill in another place has resulted in some important changes. I hope that the Minister will say something about the extent to which those changes can be made to stick. They are consensual and are not written into the Bill. They appear to rest on the somewhat shaky foundations of the articles of association of the new company.

However, the changes that were agreed and are set out in Sir John Read's letter are not insubstantial. They show that it is at least the present intention of the TSB to establish a separate Scottish management, located in Scotland and with its registered headquarters in Scotland. The board will appoint its own members and they will not be appointed by the central board in London, although the members will be subject to the board's approval. There will also be a right of representation on the main board.

The provision that 75 per cent. of the Scottish board should be resident in Scotland is not a nugatory provision. It is a practical way of ensuring that the management of the board remains in Scotland.

Like the hon. and learned Member for Perth and Kinross, I am interested in the matters that are to be considered in the court in Scotland. However, whatever the findings, proceedings have begun too late. There can be no question of the legislative process being held up by that late decision to raise these issues in the court. The very tardiness with which that matter has been pursued raises the question whether the issues are so pressing and whether there is the threat to depositors' interests that is suggested may be implicit in what is being done, or in the action that is being recommended by the trustees.

I do not feel that Sir John Read has proposed an ideal compromise and I do not regard the guarantees as copper-bottomed. However, at this late stage I do not think that there is an alternative to accepting them. They go a great deal further than the Scottish Members were prepared to go prior to the vote in another place, which was an extremely valuable step in stopping the Bill reaching the statute book without effective consideration of what might be done to safeguard the Scottish dimension of the bank.

The Bill will be seen to have justified the scrutiny role of another place. Those who would wish to see that role eliminated might think fit to read the reports of its debates and consider how effective it has been.

The Government have, for the most part, tried to play the part of an honest broker. When it came to the crunch, I am glad that they were prepared to put some pressure upon Sir John and his colleagues to produce an end result which, though far short of what we would have wished originally, is a great deal better than the Bill as it first appeared before us. I regret very much that TSB Scotland will not, in its new life, be continuing entirely on its Scottish feet.

Mr. Archie Kirkwood (Roxburgh and Berwickshire): I am pleased to be able to take up the remarks of my hon. Friend the Member for Caithness and Sutherland (Mr. Maclennan). I accept entirely the analysis that he has deployed, but I shall take the issue to a slightly more fundamental level.

It is true that the management of the TSB, in its own terms and within its own lights, has acted perfectly properly. It has acted efficiently and prospered in the best interests of the business as it sees them. The Government have probably acted according to their best lights as an honest broker in a difficult situation in their promotion of the Bill. The scrutiny that was given to the Bill in this place and in another place has revealed some difficulties which some of us—I include myself in the number—did not anticipate would emerge. From an operational, pragmatic and commercial point of view, everything that was said by my hon. Friend the Member for Caithness and Sutherland was right, but I am deeply uneasy about the fundamental principles of Scotts law that are at stake.

I followed carefully the interesting speech of the hon. and learned Member for Perth and Kinross (Mr. Fairbairn). First, a trustee savings bank is an unusual institution, and that presents us with a difficulty. If the Government had thought more carefully about that, they may have prevented us from having to face the problem before us.

The duty placed on the trustees of the original TSB institutions was totally different from that described by the hon. and learned Member for Perth and Kinross. My interpretation of their duty is that it was to promote savings, no more and no less. In other words, in small rural areas and in the high streets of small Scottish towns they tried to engender the ethic of thrift. If that was their function, and if they had no similiarity to a company limited by shares under the Companies Act, they were —and, therefore, still are—in a unique position. They do not have a joint stock bank structure, which is what the Bill sets out to achieve. The difference is that the trustees had the duty to promote savings, whereas a joint stock bank is established to make profit for the benefit of the shareholders. The two are totally different and no amount of legislative magic can translate the TSB into a joint stock banking company without considering who owns the assets of between £600 million and £700 million.

The bank has plans to continue, and I have no doubt that the TSB would prosper, if it were permitted to continue as it is. The depositors would benefit from that. While I would not go all the way with the hon. Member for Dundee, East (Mr. Wilson), especially in some of the language that he used, there is a danger that the House may be asked to put constitutional clothing on what is, in effect, an act of appropriation of the worst sort. That makes me uneasy about the whole process.

A small number of depositors have argued for a greater say, but I should have been happier if more of them had backed up the lead that was given by some of their number. While, therefore, the issue can be considered on a commercial or organisation level, on the one hand, it can be considered on a political level, on the other. It can be considered on the level of decentralisation and devolution to Scotland in terms of the amendment, and I join those who say that there is a cogent argument to be made for decentralising the bank and making it an exclusively Scottish institution—a point that I made on Report.

Now that the Government have had time to look at all the ramifications, and now that the Minister has heard the legal opinion, I should be interested to know the Government's attitude, although I have been a solicitor for long enough to know that one should not believe everything in an opinion. What is the Government's solution to how to bridge the gap between the present association and the joint stock bank being created by the Bill?

My only suggestion—and I realise that it is fraught with practical difficulties—is that some way, somehow, the depositors' opinion must be tested. They must be brought into the process. I would feel deeply restive and uneasy going through the Lobbies to support a measure with which in all other respects I agree, but where the legal questions are of fundamental importance to me as a Scots lawyer.

Mr. Craigen: Does that mean that the hon. Gentleman will support the amendment tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) and my amendment which deals specifically with consultation with the depositors?

Mr. Kirkwood: I listened carefully to the hon. Gentleman's speech, and he has made one or two perceptive speeches on this matter. I want to hear the Minister before I decide how to vote. I support the hon. Gentleman's case, but I want the Government to address themselves to the fundamental legal question about the ownership of the assets of the bank.

Mr. Peter Pike (Burnley): I have spoken during every stage of the Bill. Unlike the hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland (Mr. Maclennan), who asked what could be done at this late stage, I believe that the Government could withdraw the Bill. Quite simply, irrespective of whether the Government accept the Lords amendment or whether any of the amendments being debated are carried. I believe that we will still be left with a bad Bill. It would be best if the Government withdrew the Bill.

The advertisements of the TSB on television show what it has achieved, so it is hard to believe that it desperately needs the Bill to be passed now. We should allow more time for more thought and come back with a better Bill next year. We should not speed through the Bill when the TSB advertisements show its success over recent years. Rapid progress is not essential. Unlike other privatisations, the Government have no financial gain from this Bill. Any money resulting from the sale of shares will remain with the TSB.

We do not have to accept the proposals for Scotland. We should wait to see what is determined in the court. The amendments on consultation are exceptionally important. Unless the TSB Scotland is very different from the English regional banks, there has not been any consultation with its customers. The hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland mentioned that the Bill has been under discussion for three years. Therefore, when they have been sending statements to customers, I cannot understand why the TSB in Scotland or any of the regions has not carried out a consultation exercise and informed its customers of its proposals and why it wants to carry them out, and sought their views.

Customers and depositors should be able to express their view. Tomorrow the court will decide whom the trustees represent. If the trustees are acting in the best interests of depositors, they should have the confidence to consult them and see what they want to do.

I support the amendment to the Lords amendment. If it is not accepted I shall support several other amendments, but the best solution is for the Government to withdraw the Bill to allow proper consultation. The Government are acting as agent, so the legislation is not essential to them. Let the Government withdraw the legislation. Let us give the matter a year's thought and introduce a better Bill in the next Session.

The Economic Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Ian Stewart): Any Minister called upon to take through the House a Bill relating to a body with no owners of its assets has a formidable task. I am convinced that the Government were right to think most carefully about the basis on which they should legislate. Throughout proceedings I have tried to keep in mind the origins of my family in the manse and to have a generous, liberal-minded approach, particularly to the Scottish question.

The Scottish question has two parts. The first is the question of independence and the operation of TSB Scotland as a bank with a Scottish identity managed and run in Scotland. The second question is about the constitution, the way in which that bank should be accountable and whether depositors should have a different constitutional position. The Lords amendments are also relevant.

Before embarking upon the legislation, the Government considered the legal position carefully. We were satisfied that there was no element of expropriation in the Bill. The contents of Mr. Murray's opinion were known to us at all material times. I am advised that Mr. Murray's opinion was not the only opinion obtained by the trustees of the Scottish trustee savings banks. Before proposals were discussed with the Government, they had considered advice. It would be wrong for us to advise the House to delay consideration of the measure pending the outcome of an action which is taking place at a late stage in the Bill's progress.

Mr. Dewar: There was an intervention from the Government Benches below the Gangway from a certain solicitor. Perhaps I should have said—although I do not think it amounts to an interest—that I am a partner in a law firm which no doubt on occasion has contact with the Trustee Savings bank.

Will the Minister say a word or two about the effect of an interdict, if there were to be such a happening in the courts, based upon a finding that ownership rested with the depositors? What would be the impact of that and what would be the effect on the Government's plans?

Mr. Stewart: If the pursuer—I understand that is the correct term for an appellant in a Scottish court—in this case, contrary to the advice that the Government have received, were to succeed in obtaining a judgment against the trustees of TSB Scotland, we would, of course, consider our subsequent action in the light of that judgment. [Interruption.] As I have already said, it would be wrong for us to defer consideration of the Bill at this stage.

Mr. Eric Cockeram (Ludlow): May I help my hon. Friend and other colleagues in the House? A similar occurrence took place about there years ago during the passage of a Bill of considerably greater constitutional significance than this one—the Canada Bill. An action was started very late in the courts in an attempt to delay the Bill. The Lord Chancellor in another place ruled that Parliament should not — indeed, could not — have its business put aside because a citizen or a group of citizens had started an action in the courts, and that Parliament must proceed with its business. Furthermore, he ruled that it would be wrong for Parliament to bow to such actions. Otherwise, any citizen or group of citizens could delay Parliament's business on any Bill passing through the House.

Mr. Stewart: That is a helpful contribution. [Interruption.] I am surprised that Opposition Members should find amusement in such sensible comments as I have made. I suppose they would wish me to say that the Government would not consider their subsequent action in the light of such a judgment.

Mr. Craigen: Returning to the assurance that the Minister gave earlier as to what would happen if the declarator were to fall the other way and not the way that the Government expect, will he give an assurance that the Bill will not be sent for Royal Assent until the matter of the court judgment is resolved?

Mr. Stewart: I do not propose to give any specific assurances about the outcome of any action which has not yet been heard. It would be irresponsible of me to do so. I have given the House a reasonable assurance on the point raised with me by the hon. Gentleman. I gave way to him because of the long and close interest that he has had in the Bill. I compliment him on the consistency with which he has put his case. But I think that he and all hon. Members should recognise that there has been a very long period during which it has been open to any depositor to challenge the TSBs on the point of ownership.

The present legal framework of the TSBs goes back to the Labour Government's Trustee Savings Bank Act 1976. The current proposals which are now contained in the Bill were first put forward three years ago in a statement by the TSBs which received extensive press coverage and which was reflected in the annual report of each TSB at that time and subsequently. Details were then spelt out in the Government's own White Paper last December, and the Bill has proceeded through its various stages in the Commons and in another place during the past six months. At no point during that time did any depositor see fit to challenge the legal basis on which the proposals were made, and we consider the present action to be misconceived.

Mr. Wilson: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that the TSB movement made no attempt to contact its depositors to tell them what was happening, let alone to find out whether they would approve such changes?

Mr. Stewart: I am coming to the matter of consultation with the TSB depositors, and I shall take account of the hon. Gentleman's point.

The difficulty with the TSB's constitutional position is that, contrary to what the hon. Member for Dundee, East (Mr. Wilson) said, the depositors are not the owners. The hon. Member for Glasgow, Maryhill (Mr. Craigen) said that the TSB is not strictly mutual. In fact, it is not mutual at all. Had it been mutual, the task of producing a Bill for the future of the TSBs would have been a great deal easier. No legal ownership makes it extremely complicated.

The question of depositors being consulted lies at the heart of the amendments proposed by the hon. Member for Dundee, East and by the hon. Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar). In 1976, the Government introduced a provision that 25 per cent. of the trustees of each TSB should be elected by the depositors. Those elections took place, but in almost every case they were not contested. Between 1976 and last year, only two elections were contested. In both cases, the same person contested the elections, and was heavily defeated. That does not seem to demonstrate a great fever of depositor interest in the conduct of the TSBs. In many ways, it would have been healthier if more depositors had taken the opportunity of putting forward and supporting candidates, but in 1976 it was felt that this was a means of allowing some form of participation by the depositors. In practice, the depositors have greeted that provision with comprehensive apathy. That is not a basis on which we could say that the constitutional arrangements for the TSBs should be overturned or qualified in a way that would suddenly give the depositors a decisive part to play by a ballot, as the hon. Member for Dundee, East proposed, or by some other means of consultation.

Mr. Fairbairn: Under the provisions of the 1976 Act no one has ever invited me as a depositor to vote for a person who wished to be a trustee. Surely I am not expected to put forward my own candidates and propose my own ballot. As a depositor, I should have been asked. I assure my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary that I have not been asked, and I do not know of any other depositor who ever has been.

Mr. Stewart: I do not know whether all the depositors in TSBs in Scotland are as active and enthusiastic as my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Perth and Kinross (Mr. Fairbairn). I understood that he had a deposit of £2·68, which he had allowed to sit in the TSB without paying much attention to it. Had he gone to the TSB, he would have seen that notices are put up in the branches about elections. Had he been a keen depositor, he would have asked for a copy of the TSB's annual report and accounts and would have found full details of all these proposals. I do not want to point the finger only at my hon. and learned Friend, because that would be unfair. I was about to say that there are a million or more people like my hon. and learned Friend, but perhaps that would not be credible, and I should say that there are a million or more depositors with TSB Scotland, who are like my hon. and learned Friend in that they have taken no part in the operation and activities of the TSB with which they deposit their money. Faced with such a lack of enthusiasm from depositors, it would not be right at this late stage to introduce half-baked procedures for consultation with depositors who have not taken advantage of the statutory provisions, which were specifically inserted into the 1976 legislation to give them an opportunity to express their opinions.

Mr. Tom Clarke (Monklands, West): In view of the somewhat nonchalant way in which the Minister dismissed his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Perth and Kinross (Mr. Fairbairn), will he explain where in his argument there is anything consistent with the Government's recent attitude to trade union ballots?

Mr. Stewart: There is a slight difference between trade unions and TSBs, which resides in the fact that trade unions have members and TSBs do not. Earlier I explained how difficult it was to deal with a body which had no ownership or members, because it was not a mutual organisation. TSBs are certainly not constitutionally like trade unions.

I said that the question related to two aspects. The second is that, of the Scottish identity of TSB Scotland. The hon. Member for Dundee, East said that if we did not reject the Lords amendment, we would allow TSB Scotland to continue a separate existence, but that is exactly the opposite of the case. The Bill would then repeal the existing legislation under which TSB Scotland is constituted, and would not provide for it under the new legislation. TSB Scotland would, therefore, have no position in law, be unable to gain recognition as a bank, and presumably, therefore, have to cease business.

The Government have followed a much more constructive approach. Following the proceedings in another place we have endeavoured to ensure that in its final form the Bill will reflect the interests of the TSBs —the management and depositors—be soundly based in law, and reasonably take account of the anxieties expressed in Parliament during the Bill's passage. That is why amendments (b), (c) and (d) seek to introduce a specific provision—the concept of eligibility to succeed —whereby a separate new banking company will be registered in each territory and will take over the assets and business of the previous TSB in that country or territory.

The fact that we must move to disagree with the Lords amendment, and that I must suggest that these amendments should replace it, is purely because of the procedure in another place which meant that these amendments could not technically be tabled there on Third Reading. Therefore, they must be considered by this House.

In addition to the amendment that makes it plain that successor banks will have a separate identity closely related to their country, many hon. Members have drawn attention to the contents of Sir John Read's letter to my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, which is printed in the Official Report of 4 July. We should recall the undertakings given in that letter: first, that the head office and registered office of each bank should be in its country; secondly, that each bank's board should appoint its members and that they should not be London nominees; thirdly, that 75 per cent. of the directors should be normally resident in that country; fourthly, that the chairman and chief executive of the banks in England and Scotland should be appointed to the group board; and, finally, and importantly, that the holding company should not be able to reduce the net worth or set the dividend policy of the subsidiary banks without the agreement of two thirds of their directors.

As the hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland (Mr. Maclennan) said, they are important changes. He said that they were not all he wanted, but he fairly recognised that they constituted an important safeguard for the Scottish identity of TSB Scotland in the future. My hon. Friend the Member for Dumfries (Sir H. Monro) asked how independent the bank would be. All that I can say is that, whereas at present the trustees of any bank can merge it with another without an Act of Parliament, after the Bill is passed they could not do so without returning to the House with a private Bill. If this evening's proceedings are anything to go by, they might have great difficulty in gaining the approval of the House.

Mr. Craigen: The Minister mentioned depositor apathy in elections. Will he spell out what accountability there will be in the elections by new shareholders of the directors of banks?

Mr. Stewart: The new shareholders will have a direct say in the nomination and re-election of directors in the group parent bank. They will have no such say in relation to the subsidiaries. It is correct to say that the boards of the subsidiaries will appoint further directors in due course, but that is the normal pattern with subsidiary companies in groups. In this case, there will be greater assurance of the independence of those boards because of the provisions that I have just mentioned. It will be impossible for the parent company to nominate directors to the subsidiary boards of TSB Scotland or any other TSB. Those are important changes.

I accept fully that, although the amendments passed in the other place caused extensive reconsideration, they have resulted in important improvements in the basis on which the Bill will proceed. I willingly acknowledge that all those who have put forward ideas on Scottish independence have played their part in bringing that about. I hope that most hon. Members will accept that, having reached this stage, the Bill reflects most of the concerns that were expressed during its passage. Therefore, I hope that they will support the Government's amendments.

Dr. Oonagh McDonald (Thurrock): I have felt like an intruder during much of the debate, because despite the way in which some people interpret my surname, I have no connection with Scotland — [HON. MEMBERS: "Shame."] I have connections with a better place.

The Minister referred to the legal position, and insisted that there was no need to delay the Bill pending the legal action. One can understand his point. However, it was entirely unsatisfactory to say that, if the judgment went against the Government, he would merely consider subsequent amendment. He did not consider the possibility that if the judgment went against the Government, it would mean that the depositors' accounts had been expropriated. Therefore, the Government would have to consider the matter seriously and the Bill would not receive its Royal Assent.

Secondly, the Minister referred to the letter from the chairman, which was published in the Official Report of 4 July. Once again, we find that some of the main commitments are in the articles of association. We had to make the point frequently in discussion of the Bill on Second Reading, in Committee and on Report that those articles of association could be changed, provided that 51 per cent. of the shareholders agreed. As my hon. Friend the Member for St. Helens, South (Mr. Bermingham) pointed out at one stage, given that shareholders are to be limited by the articles of association to 50 per cent., one need only envisage 11 institutions which hold 5 per cent. of the shares getting together to be able to change the articles of association.

Thirdly, the Minister said that the depositors were not owners and therefore should not be consulted. Even so, that does not give a strong enough reason for refusing consultation because the depositors, after all, occupy rather a special position as regards the TSB Scotland. If one in four in Scotland are depositors with the TSB Scotland, this should be an important consideration.

[Dr. Oonagh McDonald]

In all the debates, we have emphasised very much the special character of the TSB in Scotland. While one might say that the depositors are not owners and therefore have no right to be consulted, if we accepted the Minister's argument, we could still go on to say that, although they may have no legal right to be consulted, it would be quite in keeping with the whole tradition of the TSB Scotland to consult them.

Finally, the Minister accused the depositors of comprehensive apathy, and gave that as a reason for not allowing them to be consulted at this important stage of the change in status, however ill-defined, of the TSB, and particularly of the TSB Scotland. Like Viscount Whitelaw, the Minister seems to believe that one should not go round the country stirring up what he is pleased to call apathy. The Opposition believe that it would be quite proper to stir up the depositors' apathy on this occasion, and to allow them to be consulted before this important change takes place.

The Minister's replies have been very weak, and he has not given us any of the guarantees which my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) requested. We shall vote accordingly.

Mr. Wilson: With regard to the legal side, as the Minister put it, I have rarely come across such a brazen attitude as that adopted by the Minister. He discards an opinion which states that the ownership of the bank lies with the depositors. He says that the Government took other legal advice, and has given no indication of what that might be. I find that remarkable.

In relation to the amendment, he has not convinced me that the provisions are other than minimal, and they will do very little to safeguard the independence of the Trustee Savings bank.

In summary, there has been breach of trust, in my opinion. There has also been breach of ownership, in my opinion. Having heard the Minister, I think that there has been a breach of the Government's credibility.

Question put, That the amendment to the Lords amendment be made:—

Question accordingly agreed to.

Amendments made to the Bill in lieu of Lords amendment No. 1 disagreed to: (b), in page 2, line 11, leave out from 'and' to end of line 13 and insert 'eligible to succeed them'.

(c), in page 2, line 30, after 'business', insert 'and eligible to succeed it'.

'( ) For a company to be "eligible to succeed" an existing bank it must have been, immediately before the vesting day, a subsidiary of the Central Board or the existing holding company and it must—

(a) in the case of the company which is to succeed the existing bank for England and Wales, be registered (and accordingly have its registered office) in England and Wales;

(b) in the case of the company which is to succeed the existing bank for Scotland, be registered (and accordingly have its registered office) in Scotland;

(c) in the case of the company which is to succeed the existing bank for Northern Ireland, be registered (and accordingly have its registered office) in Northern Ireland; and

(d) in the case of the company which is to succeed the existing bank for the Channel Islands, be incorporated (and accordingly have its registered office) in any of the Channel Islands.'.—[Mr. Ian Stewart.]

Lords amendment No. 2: after clause 1, insert the following new clause — Share holdings for deposit holders and employees

" . From the vesting day 25 per cent. of the shares in the TSB Group shall be held in trust for holders of deposits in the TSB Group and employees of the TSB Group, the trustees being elected annually in equal numbers by appropriate Associations of both groups."

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House doth disagree with the Lords in the said amendment.—[Mr. Ian Stewart.]

Dr. McDonald: The point of principle involved in the amendment was debated on Second Reading, in Committee and on Report. We support the Lords amendment which proposes that, in order to preserve the traditional character of the TSB, 25 per cent. of shares should be assigned to depositors and employees.

The employees are particularly keen that the amendment should be accepted, because it would give them more weight in their negotiations with the employers. Throughout the discussions about the future of the TSB, the Banking, Insurance and Finance Union has pressed for the flotation of shares to resemble the British Telecom flotation in which a proportion of shares were set aside for employees.

The objection from the TSB and the Government is that the bank hopes to get more than 1 million shareholders, but that seems to be an arbitrarily selected figure and a piece of window-dressing by the TSB management to make its flotation and plans for the future of the bank look more attractive to the Government. We need not take that figure seriously.

On Report we debated an amendment proposing that 50 per cent. of shares should be set aside for staff and depositors. The Economic Secretary to the Treasury said that he would "like to see a substantial proportion of the shares of the issue being so allocated." —[Official Report, 20 February 1985; Vol. 73, c. 1129.]

It seems to us that 25 per cent. is a substantial proportion and, in view of the Economic Secretary's comment, the Lords amendment should be accepted.

Mr. Kirkwood: Having lost the earlier argument on the ownership of the TSB, we should note that an amendment calling for 49 per cent. of shares to be assigned in the manner proposed by Lords amendment No. 2 was moved by my noble Friend Lord Taylor of Gryfe. That proposed proportion of ownership having been lost, my noble Friend Lord Banks moved an amendment that proposed 25 per cent. ownership which was tested and fell, but it is wrong for the Government to overturn the amendment which was successfully moved by Lord Banks.

The Government are pressing for wider participation and there is a case for a much broader basis of ownership than the Bill would provide without the amendment. All that it is offering is priority for depositors and staff in the purchase of shares. The amendment would leave 25 per cent. in trust for depositors and employees, with 12·5 per cent. each.

The Minister, Lord Gowrie, considered some objections against the amendment and raised them, but they were all dealt with effectively by Lord Banks when he spoke of the difficulties that were perceived by the Government in having a structure that provided for 25 per cent. to be in trust for depositors and staff. It was made clear in another place that it is possible for commercial operations to survive and prosper with a proportion of a company's shares held in such a way. The John Lewis partnership was cited as an example, where 100 per cent. of the shares are held by employees. That is a very successful commercial operation and there is no reason why a similar procedure should not operate for depositors, especially in an organisation with the tradition of the TSB.

A series of further questions were put to Lord Banks in another place and they were all dealt with effectively and I do not believe that the Government have a case. It is wrong for them to deny the staff and depositors an element of future interest in the TSB as a whole. It is wrong also for the Government to seek to overturn the amendment that was made in another place.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood) has referred to the debates that took place in another place. I do not think that we need to rehearse all the arguments again. He referred to the John Lewis partnership, which has a trust for 30,000 staff. There is a difference here, because we are talking about many millions of depositors.

The central question is whether the TSBs should be mutuals or in Companies Act form. I do not believe that there should be a half-way house, a sort of pseudo mutuality, for part of the capital of the TSBs. If 25 per cent. of the capital were put in trust in the way that is proposed, in addition to the 5 per cent. for charities, that would create a block of 30 per cent. of the share capital, which would dominate the direct shareholding of depositors and other small shareholders. It would cut across the intention of the TSBs to obtain a large number of depositors and other small shareholders. The hon. Member for Thurrock (Dr. McDonald) poured scorn on the figure of 1 million, but that is the TSB's objective. If we were to accept the Lords amendment, we would make it much more difficult for the TSBs to achieve their goal.

There are great difficulties in practical terms. The two reasons most strongly in favour of a Companies Act constitution are, first, the need for accountability to shareholders, which would be overborne by the combination of the charity holding and the 25 per cent. depositor trust, and secondly, and more importantly perhaps, access to capital. If 30 per cent. of the capital were held in a restricted way, it would be impossible to raise capital from the other shareholders without giving the same increase in capital to the trust, and the trust would not have sufficient resources to respond. It would seriously hamper the activities of the TSBs without giving them the other compensating advantages of a different structure.

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Durant.]

1.17 am

Mr. Kenneth Hind (Lancashire, West): I am glad to have the opportunity to discuss the current teachers' pay dispute. I am a former polytechnic lecturer, married to a college lecturer who comes from a family of teachers, so the continuation of the pay dispute causes me concern. It must be in our interests to create the best education system possible. One of the ways to do that is to attract to the teaching profession the best qualified and most able teachers to teach our children.

The profession must be presented as an attractive vocation. Little can be more important if we are to nurture and develop the seed corn of tomorrow's Britain. The future is in our hands. We must have the best teachers available at our disposal.

We must consider the problem in the light of the society that we want for the future. As information technology and technology generally advances we shall need to provide people with higher qualifications who can cope with the jobs created by that technology.

We shall see a society in which there will be fewer hours of work, in which people will retire earlier, and in which they will stay at school longer. They will have to learn at school how to cope with the increased leisure that such a society will provide.

The second function of the future education system will be to provide the necessary training for the skills that will be required for the jobs of the future. We are effectively facing a social revolution, and the main function of the education system will be to enable people to adjust to it. It is for that reason that many of us in this House are very concerned to get the best teachers that we possibly can.

The main reason for the present teaching dispute is the reduction since 1979 by about 1 million of the number of children in our schools. It has had a number of important effects on the teaching profession. The number of posts available for promotion is becoming much more limited. A considerable number of teachers are now stuck on scales 1 and 2. There is no movement and very few senior teacher posts are being created.

Would-be teachers are being required to stay at school for an extra two years to do A-levels, to take degree courses and B.Ed. courses. Many of the honours graduates go on to obtain teaching certificates. They do not go into a job until they are 21 or 22. Those extra years at school or university have to be rewarded by proper terms and conditions of service and a decent salary when they enter the teaching profession. This House should help towards the creation of attractive terms and conditions for the teachers who come into our schools.

At the age of 21 or 22, on a salary of £8,500 at the top of scale 1, and with very little chance of promotion, the job of a teacher is not a very attractive proposition. A scale 1 or 2 teacher today is earning the average wage, not of an accountant, lawyer or bank manager; his wages are on a par with those of a gas fitter, deck hands on ships, crane drivers and machine minders. In some cases, people in those other occupations are doing financially better than our teachers.

The top of the pay scale of a head teacher in a primary school is about £13,500. That teacher can be responsible for upwards of 300 primary schoolchildren between the ages of five and 11. The pay scale is in no way commensurate with the responsibility that a head teacher carries.

In secondary education, £22,500 is the maximum for head teachers with 2,000 pupils, including fairly large sixth forms. Their pay is not commensurate with that of industrial managers, senior officers in the Army and senior officials in local government and central government. Today on page 3 The Times pointed out that, over the past ten years, the wage levels of head teachers in secondary schools have been severely eroded compared with those other posts. Local education authorities have reduced staff levels as schools have shrunk.

Morale is at an all-time record low. What can we do to deal with this? The symptoms have been the annual pay round and the inevitable arguments about pay levels, followed by industrial action and arbitration. I doubt whether many hon. Members agree with the teachers' industrial action. I reject it. There can be no forgiveness for those teachers who put children's education in danger. Many of us understand the frustration that leads teachers to take industrial action, but, if the teaching profession is to prove its dedication and professionalism, it will not be done by acting in this way. I and many of my colleagues have pointed out to teachers that, if they want to improve their terms and conditions, by acting in this way they are not impressing those whom they need to influence—the parents, Members of Parliament and the Government. They are going down the wrong road.

We must see an end to the annual pay round and the disputes cycle. In an early-day motion I and my hon. Friend the Member for Cambridge (Mr. Rhodes James) urged all parties in the dispute to negotiate in a spirit of goodwill for a long-term solution.

Some of those who represent the teachers at high levels, especially in certain unions, do not negotiate in a spirit of good will. This has been shown by offers by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science to meet the union leaders. They refused to negotiate over the 1986-87 pay settlement, even though in October we shall be finalising the rate support grant for that financial year. Many Conservative Members must suspect that the leaders of certain trade unions, in the interests perhaps of the main Opposition party, are using the dispute to discredit the Government. They are interested, not in the profession as a whole, but in making political points. Perhaps Mr. Jarvis and some of the leaders of the NUT at national level have been reading Trotsky carefully and taking to heart his advice that demands should be made on the capitalist system which it is known it cannot meet. Teachers would do well to look at the motives of some of the union leadership.

I and the majority of my colleagues do not believe that the teaching profession is full of Left-wing activists. Teachers as a whole are eminently sensible people who realise the position that they are in. They want to settle the matter. We should be giving them the opportunity to do so. We should be talking about teachers in the way that my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary and other Ministers talks about the police and the way that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services talks about nurses, to emphasise the value of the teaching profession to the nation and to make it clear that we support that attitude and value them as a section of the community.

It is important for Conservative Members and the Government to make teachers realise that we care about their future and the future of education. It may be worth mentioning that the Opposition Benches are empty, and that the 32 Labour Members who are members of the National Union of Teachers are conspicuous by their absence, together with alliance Members, who have constantly wooed teachers. Where are they tonight? Not one is present.

In future we must look for a long-term solution. We must see an end to the annual pay round and its associated disputes because not only teachers and parents, but everyone, is fed up with it, and want it ended. To end it, our approach to the problem must be realistic. Teachers must realise that although they have a great deal of support and sympathy for their case in the House, the dispute must be settled in a climate of economic reality. They must realise that states are like individuals in that there are cash limits on what they can afford.

I advocate that any settlement must include the assessment of teachers' performance. I appreciate that that is disputed, but from my conversations with teachers I know that they are not afraid of assessment. They say, "We are good teachers. We are not afraid of it." It will give excellent teachers an opportunity to shine, and it will resolve the problems relating to out-of-school activities, school lunch hour supervision periods, and the other parts of a teacher's daily life.

We should consider restructuring the pay scales. The teaching profession must recognise that unless we attract mathematic and science graduates and computer scientists into the profession we shall not be able to create the technologists and scientists of the future, who will be important to the development of Britain. We shall not attract them to teaching unless they are paid adequate wage levels, commensurate with industry. Clearly, British Telecom, Plessey and the big corporations can exceed some of the salaries at present offered to young scale 1 and 2 teachers.

A complete restructuring is required. To return to Houghton in 1974 is a waste of time, because too much water has passed under the bridge since then. We must regard the appropriate levels of remuneration on the Clegg review of 1981 as a base from which to work. If we are to give teachers' pay increases we should consider a long-term pay settlement, for example, spread over three years, including assessment and conditions of employment. We should guarantee them an inflation13Acc-proof rise over and above an equalisation rise to represent the erosion in their pay levels, which has clearly occurred between 1981 and 1984. We could begin to achieve that by repealing the Remuneration of Teachers Act 1965, which set up the Burnham and CLEA/ST committees. It is a nonsense to negotiate on pay in one committee and on terms and conditions in another. We should merge the two committees. In 1981, my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Warrington, South (Mr. Carlisle), who was then Secretary of State for Education and Science, told the House that it was the Government's intention to amend the Remuneration of Teachers Act 1965 to bring pay and conditions of service within the scope of "a single negotiating body."

That is sound sense, but there are still two committees. Instead of discussing pay in one committee and conditions of service in another, they should be discussed together.

If we repeal that Act, there may be an alteration in the union representation on the newly constituted body, which will truly reflect the membership of the unions in the teaching profession. They have changed greatly, especially recently. Many teachers have left the large unions and joined smaller ones because they will not go on strike. In west Lancashire, teachers undertook some industrial action at the beginning, but they have now rejected it. They have been reasonable in all discussions about this matter, and they have consistently declared their desire to talk to the Government and move towards a long-term solution wherever possible. The spirit of west Lancashire teachers should prevail throughout the country.

A settlement of the long-term problems must include assessment of teachers and — I am sure the general public would welcome this — a no-strike agreement, so that parents can guarantee their children's teaching.

As matters stand, there will be no resolution of the problem. I urge my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State to do everything that he can to give the teachers a reasonable working wage and to undertake the restructuring of their contracts. I am aware of the Department's desire to settle the matter. Perhaps my hon. Friend can persuade the Department to reach a settlement, which can be put to the Cabinet, so that resources can be made available for the future and so that there is an end to the constant rounds of negotiations.

I await with interest the views of my hon. Friend the Minister, who should be aware that I speak not only for myself but for many Conservative Members who believe that we should put this problem behind us. The only way in which we can run our education system is to have vision and ideals as to the direction in which it should go. The moment we lose sight of our ideals, we shall lose our way. Let us develop the best education system that we can obtain. The best way to start doing that is to solve the teachers' pay dispute on a long-term basis.

Mr. Robert Rhodes James (Cambridge): I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Lancashire, West (Mr. Hind) on behalf of the House for having introduced this subject on the Adjournment. I should like to say how much I agree with him.

We are faced with a difficult situation, with which my hon. Friend has dealt fairly and responsibly, in which we accept the particular difficulties of the Government. I urge that our concentration should be on the problems of those teachers on scales 1 and 2. We need a new deal for the profession. Can we not forget the problems of the past, the difficulties we had with the teaching unions, and look for a moment to the future and try to build a teaching profession which will be worthy of the children and their parents for the future of the nation? Surely there are answers to the questions posed by my hon. Friend.

I am sure that my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Science will respond to the questions. It is a question not simply of resources, but of will, and whether it is our desire that we have a teaching profession which is worthy of the children and parents of this country and are prepared to provide the means to do that. That is the question for the House tonight.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Science (Mr. Bob Dunn): I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Lancashire, West (Mr. Hind) for raising this subject and acknowledge the support given to his views by my hon. Friend the Member for Cambridge (Mr. Rhodes James).

The debate is on an important matter which is of concern to all of us in the House and, indeed, to parents, children, and other members of the public throughout the country. The teachers' industrial action has disrupted our schools for virtually the whole of the spring and summer terms, and that must be a matter of considerable anxiety to us all.

As the House will know, the unions' response to my right hon. Friend's constant encouragement to negotiate reforms which would benefit education standards and the teachers themselves has been far from positive. First, they began to back-pedal in the talks which, until last summer, had appeared to be making progress. As I said, they broke off discussions last December, and have refused to resume them. More recently, they have refused even to address the Government's offer of additional resources next year if acceptable reforms can be agreed until they have achieved what they consider to be an acceptable settlement of their 1985 pay claim.

In saying that, I wish to emphasise at the same time that the Government and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State do not undervalue teachers. They fully recognise both the importance of the job that they do and the skill and dedication with which the great majority perform their difficult task. They also recognise that career prospects for capable and effective teachers are much diminished. We firmly believe that the Government's offer of additional resources next year, subject to agreement on reforms, can provide the means both to achieve progress towards further improvement in the standard of education provided in schools, and to begin to meet the genuine concerns of teachers about their pay prospects. I urge the unions not to squander another opportunity to achieve real and lasting improvements to their members' position.

My right hon. Friend has made it clear that further agreement in principle must be reached by October if more resources are to be made available next year. That is a genuine deadline, because at that point decisions have to be taken on the rate support grant settlement for 1986-87. Already nearly two months have passed since the Government's offer was made. Time is fast running out. This represents the only way forward to more money for teachers' pay. It is of paramount importance to the health of the education service that the unions face up to economic reality and begin to negotiate constructively and realistically on the basis of the Government's offer. I am sure that my hon. Friends the Members for Lancashire, West, for Cambridge and for Bury, North (Mr. Burt), who is also with us, support that view.

We must acknowledge that time is fast running out. If we are to progress in the light of the Government's offer, the unions must take advantage of the opportunity to make progress in a spirit of moderation and co-operation, which will be presented by the resumption of discussions in the Burnham committee tomorrow. I am sure that the House hopes that that opportunity will not be lost. Both sides know exactly where they stand. The Government's position has been made clear in the letters of 21 May, 2 July and 9 July. It would be the height of folly if either side were to delude itself into thinking that the Government could be persuaded to change their stance.

We are fully cognisant of the fears and anxieties of teachers who genuinely wish to make a full and effective career in teaching at a time of falling rolls and school closures. I listened with interest to, and shall bring to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, what my two hon. Friends have said in this important debate.

Question put and agreed to.

Oral Answers to Questions

SOCIAL SERVICES

Care in the Community

1. Mr. Fisher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many people he estimates have or will come out of long-stay sub-normality hospitals under the care in the community policy in 1984, 1985 and 1986, respectively.

The Minister for Health (Mr. Kenneth Clarke): There were 31,500 discharges of people from mental handicap hospitals and units during 1983, the latest year for which figures are available. However, 27,500 of the discharges followed periods in hospital of less than one month. Only 1,800 followed periods of two or more years and, within this figure, 760 patients had been in hospital for over 15 years. Figures for 1984 should be available in September. We cannot yet make estimates for future years.

Mr. Fisher: Will the Minister confirm that in many authorities the funds are not available to provide the full range of community care that is needed by those who have been in hospital for a long time? Will he speak to the Secretary of State for the Environment and ask for a 100 per cent. disregard for such funds, or will the Government continue to penalise local authorities which are trying to provide the services which these people so desperately need?

Mr. Clarke: Many of the services for discharged patients who have been long-term stayers in hospitals are provided by health authorities, which are substantially increasing their spending in this area. Local social service departments throughout the country have increased their spending on social services as a whole by 17 per cent. over and above inflation over the past five years, and many are making good progress. I do not believe that local authorities which are making a proper choice of priorities are inhibited from joining in the care in the community policy.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Is my right hon. and learned Friend aware that there is widespread concern about the many children who continue to be admitted to long-stay sub-normality hospitals?

Mr. Clarke: I share my hon. Friend's concern. I am glad to say that the number of mentally handicapped children in hospital has dropped by 50 per cent. during the Government's period in office, but we would like to see them all out of hospital. That is why we have allocated so much money for that purpose. I hope that all admissions will stop soon.

Mr. Carter-Jones: Will the Minister consider the problem that arises from the effect of tapering on joint funding in the discharge of long-term patients? Will he take into account especially the problems that are faced by Prestwich?

Mr. Clarke: The rules on disregarding joint finance for local government spending purposes have been eased slightly, but the joint finance was always intended to taper after the requisite period. We have given new powers so that health authorities can provide funds without any time limit where it is intended to move long-stay patients out of hospitals.

Mr. Alfred Morris: Will the Minister make himself fully and urgently aware of the compelling case put to the all-party disablement group about children in mental hospitals when Peggy Jay and her colleagues from Exodus came to address the group earlier this month? Is he aware that there are still 450 children in such hospitals and that four more have been added this year? If some regional health authorities can tackle the problem positively, why not all of them?

Mr. Clarke: I agreed with my hon. Friend the Member for Surrey, South-West (Mrs. Bottomley) when I expressed the wish that all admissions could now cease. The fact that only four have taken place this year shows that we are near the end of the problem. The number of children in those long-stay wards dropped by over a half. We have provided money to enable health authorities to get the remainder out. I share the all-party group's aims, and I hope that we shall soon realise them.

Mr. Meadowcroft: Is the Minister aware that MIND on Merseyside has reached an agreement with the health authority by which the health authority will pay £14,000 a year for every person taken out of institutions in that area? If he believes that to be good practice, will he commend it to other health authorities?

Mr. Clarke: Certainly, I shall. Almost all health authorities now have some variant of those arrangements. It is important that they should all have plans whereby they can obtain the better services required for those patients by paying the correct sum to other health authorities, if they are to take over the obligation, to local authorities or to voluntary bodies, including those such as MIND, which have a good record.

Private Mental Health Facilities

2. Mr. Thurnham asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what are the criteria for registering private mental health facilities with the National Health Service.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The criteria for registering a private mental nursing home are for the district health authority in whose area the home is located to determine, having regard to the provisions of the Registered Homes Act 1984, the Nursing Homes and Mental Nursing Homes Regulations 1984 and the Mental Health Act 1983.

Mr. Thurnham: Is my right hon. and learned Friend satisfied that existing codes of practice are of a sufficiently high standard, without being too strict, and that they can be enforced without new legislation?

Mr. Clarke: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I am. If there is a dispute between a proprietor and a local health authority the matter can be determined on appeal to the registered homes tribunal, which the Government set up under the legislation that I have just set out.

"The Reform of Social Security"

3. Mr. Yeo asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what further representations he has received regarding the Green Paper "The Reform of Social Security".

The Secretary of State for Social Services (Mr. Norman Fowler): By today some 450 representations have been received about the Government's proposals for the reform of social security.

Mr. Yeo: Is my right hon. Friend aware that of the many welcome aspects of these proposals one of the most important is the arrangement whereby benefit will be withdrawn on a tapering basis in relation to net rather than gross income? Is he further aware that many employers in my constituency have drawn attention to further examples of how the present system acts as a disincentive to people seeking jobs?

Mr. Fowler: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend. That change will mean that we can tackle the unemployment and poverty traps in a way that has not been possible until now.

Mr. Hugh Brown: Many of my constituents are, unfortunately, in receipt of supplementary benefit. When shall I be able to advise these practical people whether they will be better or worse off after the reviews?

Mr. Fowler: The hon. Gentleman will be aware of our proposals in the Green Paper. In the White Paper we shall put forward illustrative figures, but, of course, ultimately he will have to await the uprating in April 1987 to know the exact rates.

Mr. Ralph Howell: Does my right hon. Friend accept that there is no way in which he or anyone else can solve the unemployment or the poverty traps unless tax is brought into the equation? So long as tax and social security are kept separate, there is no way in which the poverty or unemployment traps will be solved.

Mr. Fowler: I am aware of my hon. Friend's interest in this matter. In the Green Paper he will have seen a number of ways in which the two sytems are moving closer together. He will also be aware that in the autumn my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer will be making his personal taxation proposals.

Nurses (Pay)

4. Mr. Willie W. Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement on nurses' pay and the representations made to him on the recent proposals of Her Majesty's Government in response to the review body's recommendations.

Mr. Fowler: Following my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister's announcement on nurses' pay on 6 June, we have received a number of letters. Most have concerned the staging of the award and its funding. Agreement has now been reached with the staff side on all the new salary scales, which were notified to health authorities on 1 July.

Mr. Hamilton: Is the Secretary of State aware that anyone interested in the Health Service was appalled by the miserable ministerial speeches made in yesterday's debate? Does he recognise that for every percentage point over 3 per cent. paid to nurses and others there will be a diminution in the standard of service to patients, because of the tight cash limits imposed on the local health authorities? Does he further recognise that even with the 5·6 per cent. increase that is to be given to nurses—those dedicated people—between now and February they will have to suffer a reduction in their standard of living?

Mr. Fowler: I do not agree with anything that the hon. Gentleman has said, including his comments on the outstanding speeches made by my right hon. and learned Friend the Minister for Health and my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security. Since 1979, nurses' pay has gone up by 23 per cent. above inflation. After the review pay award, their pay will have increased by between 25 and 30 per cent. The Government set up the independent pay review body which the nurses wanted, a desire which the Labour party ignored.

Mr. Colvin: Will my right hon. Friend recognise the unique importance of midwives, even if the pay review does not? Will he ensure that in the final recommendation midwives' pay is related to their contemporaries who remain in nursing or who progress to health visiting?

Mr. Fowler: I am sure that the review body will take that into account. We recognise the great importance of midwives in the Health Service.

Mr. Pavitt: Will the right hon. Gentleman confirm that the pay award was, on average, 8·5 per cent., possibly rising to 14 per cent. for some grades, but that in the year 1985-86 nurses will receive an average of 5·6 per cent.? Will he now look at another problem that he has not solved —that of bottle-necks? Is he aware that in hospitals near here there is such a shortage of neonatal nurses that, although there is sufficient cash, the service is run in a way that is hazardous to the health of patients? Is he further aware that there is a shortage of theatre sisters and sister tutors?

Mr. Fowler: I shall examine any specific issue that the hon. Gentleman wishes to draw to my attention. The review body recommendations mean that nurses' pay will increase from between 4·1 and 14·3 per cent., and for professions auxiliary to medicine by up to 16·6 per cent. The award has to be staged, but by the beginning of the new financial year all those changes will be in place. This is an outstanding award for the nurses and it would do the hon. Gentleman more credit if he recognised it.

Mr. Marlow: Why, when the Northampton district area health authority, which is one of the most economic and efficient health authorities in the country, can provide for nurses' pay without a cut in services, do the more profligate authorities seem to have a problem? Is it that the Labour party wants a propaganda weapon with which to beat the Government over the head, when, in fact, the health authorities could do the job properly?

Mr. Fowler: Few health authorities are complaining that they are unable to manage. One or two of those that are complaining are the ones which complain about virtually everything. At the beginning of this year we provided £500 million more cash for health authorities in England. The stage award that we have announced for this year can be afforded out of that.

Mr. Kennedy: Has the right hon. Gentleman seen the reported response by Mr. Trevor Clay of the Royal College of Nursing to the speech made by the Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security yesterday? If so, what is the Secretary of State's response?

Mr. Fowler: I have seen the letter that Mr. Clay wrote to The Times this morning, if that is what the hon. Gentleman is talking about. If the hon. Gentleman wishes to talk about nurses' pay, he should check with Mr. Clay whether he and the RCN supported the setting up of an independent pay review body. This Government have achieved that. The Labour Government ignored the problem.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Has the Secretary of State seen the Nursing Mirror survey, which reveals that 90 per cent. of all nurses believe that their wards are dangerously understaffed, and shows that trainee nurses are responsible for the manning of wards at night? Is that fair, and how does the Secretary of State justify that? The voice of the profession demands action.

Mr. Fowler: That question is not fair, because the Government have put more money and resources into the Health Service than the Labour Government did. Above all, we have put more money into the Health Service capital building programme. The hon. Gentleman's question reveals that he is unaware that the last Labour Government cut the capital programme.

Single Homeless Persons

5. Mr. Hirst asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what representations he has received about the provisions for the single homeless in west central Scotland; and if he will make a statement.

The Minister for Social Security (Mr. Tony Newton): Provision for the single homeless is primarily for local authorities to determine. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services has, however, a responsibility to provide temporary places for people without a settled way of life. In west central Scotland, the Department currently runs the Bishopbriggs resettlement unit for this purpose. As my hon. Friend is aware, it is our policy progressively to close these units, in parallel with measures to develop more appropriate alternative provision. In the case of Bishopbriggs, our aim is to close it within the next three years, and a review team chaired by the Department and including representatives of the Scottish Council for the Single Homeless and local housing interests is currently, through a process of consultation, assessing the needs of the single homeless in the area and considering proposals for alternative facilities. My hon. Friend has written to me about the matter, as has the hon. Member for Dundee, East (Mr. Wilson) and one member of the public.

Mr. Hirst: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that reply. Is he aware that there is considerable concern in west central Scotland about the Department's proposal to close the resettlement unit at Bishopbriggs, which has in the past provided a refuge for single homeless people? Is he prepared to extend the consultation period, and will he give a commitment to retain the unit if the consultations show a pressing need for it?

Mr. Newton: My hon. Friend knows that we are determined that this shall be part of a programme of ensuring proper alternative provision. In that spirit, I am happy to say that I would be willing to extend the consultation period to the end of this year. The same will apply to the other seven units which we have in mind for relatively early closure.

Mr. Maxton: Will the Minister take an early opportunity to visit the Bishopbriggs resettlement unit and talk to the staff about the excellent work that they have been doing? What voluntary services will take on the work of that unit, when others in the west of Scotland say that at present they could not take on its role? Rather than simply extending the consultation period, will he make it clear that the Bishopbriggs resettlement unit will be kept open?

Mr. Newton: The purpose of the consultation period—the consultations involve some distinguished people, including the former chairman of the Supplementary Benefits Commission and representatives of the Scottish Council for the Single Homeless—is to establish what the possibilities are for alternative provision. I shall bear in mind the hon. Gentleman's request for me to visit the unit. I am due to visit some resettlement units in the next few months, though I cannot make him an absolute promise to visit that one.

Limited List Prescribing

6. Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what progress is being made in setting up the review committee on the selected list of National Health Services drugs.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We announced details of the advisory committee on NHS drugs on 12 July. The committee's first meeting is to be held on 23 July.

Mr. Latham: As the doctors do not want a personal appeal system, may we now be assured that the new review committee will get on quickly with the job of reviewing the list, because there seem to be about a dozen drugs which doctors and patients believe should be restored to the list as soon as possible?

Mr. Clarke: I assure my hon. Friend that we shall ask the committee to get on with its task as quickly as possible. I cannot guarantee that it will admit to the list all the drugs to which my hon. Friend referred. There are genuine divisions of clinical opinion, and all of those that have been excluded so far have been excluded on the unanimous opinion of a group of experts who said that there was no scientific or medical need for them.

Mr. Park: Is the right hon. and learned Gentleman still prepared to consider specific cases where a medication is seen by the medical profession to be the only one?

Mr. Clarke: There are no drugs seen by the medical profession to be the only available drugs and which have been excluded from the NHS. We still get some individual complaints, but, as I say, the best advice that we could gather was that there was no medical or scientific need for the drugs that are now excluded. However, the new committee will look at individual products, at the request of doctors and manufacturers, and consider whether anything should be restored to the NHS list.

Dame Jill Knight: Why does my right hon. and learned Friend think that the BMA refused the appeal machinery offered by the Government? Could it have been because of the minuscule number of complaints about drugs that had been received?

Mr. Clarke: It would not be wise for me to try to speak on behalf of the BMA on all these matters. There was a division of opinion before it was decided to decline the offer that we made. I agree with my hon. Friend that the number of difficulties turned out to be remarkably small and that many doctors no longer perceived a need for the individual appeal mechanism about which we were once talking.

Mr. Howard: Will my right hon. and learned Friend ensure that the drug Mucodyne is drawn to the attention of the review body at the earliest possible opportunity?

Mr. Clarke: It will be considered by the committee at its first meeting.

Drug Misuse

7. Mr. Evennett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he is yet in a position to formulate a national policy for the prevention of drug misuse.

Mr. Fowler: Prevention is one of the key elements in the Government's overall strategy for dealing with this problem. We set out our policies in the document "Tackling Drug Misuse", which was published last March.

Mr. Evennett: I thank my right hon. Friend for his comments and congratulate him on his efforts in this difficult matter. Will he consider directing more attention towards educating parents and teachers about the problems of drug misuse, so that those problems can be detected at an early stage?

Mr. Fowler: Both aspects are important. We have instituted an advertising campaign, and the Department of Education and Science is also taking action. One of the aims of both campaigns is to give more information to parents and teachers.

Mr. Kirkwood: Has the Secretary of State had time yet to study the report on this important and vexed question by the Select Committee on Social Services, which was published on 20 June? Will the right hon. Gentleman give us an assurance that, in view of the public disquiet about the escalating problems of drug abuse, he will expedite the Government's response to the report and proceed to implement some of its conclusions?

Mr. Fowler: We shall give urgent attention to that report. I share the concern of the hon. Gentleman and the Select Committee about the problem.

Mr. Harris: Does my right hon. Friend agree that his task and that of his ministerial colleague in the Home Office with responsibility for warning people about the misuse of drugs is made more difficult by certain books, especially one by Harold Robbins called "Descent from Xanadu" which glamorises drug taking among tycoons? I do not ask my right hon. Friend to read this trash; I simply draw his attention to it.

Mr. Fowler: I am sure that the whole House deplores any publication that seeks to glamorise drug taking.

Mr. Dobson: Has the Secretary of State read his Department's report entitled, "Drug Misuse: Prevalence and Service Provision"? If so, does he agree that he is bound to conclude that there is much more "prevalence" than "service provision" and that fewer than a quarter of the district health authorities have received any help from his Government to set up rehabilitation clinics?

Mr. Fowler: We are rapidly expanding the rehabilitation units. Spending has increased to £11·5 million—almost double. The hon. Gentleman may want to claim that more needs to be done. I agree, but I hope he will recognise the initiatives which the Government have taken to deal with this serious problem.

Mental Health Act 1983

8. Mr. Proctor asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a further statement on progress in implementing the Mental Health Act 1983.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Implementation of the Mental Health Act is continuing satisfactorily.

Mr. Proctor: Is my right hon. and learned Friend aware that people involved in mental health matters are concerned that the Central Council for Education and Training in Social Work is adopting a negative attitude towards the training of approved social workers under the Act? Is he confident that there will be sufficient approved social workers to fulfill the functions of the Act later in the year?

Mr. Clarke: With respect, I think that my hon. Friend's criticisms should be directed not at CCETSW but at WALCO, which is still continuing the ridiculous boycott of the courses that had been arranged for approved mental health workers. I hope that the union will soon end its unhelpful attitude. It is rejecting a policy that had all-party support and preventing the building up of a cadre of professionally trained people.

Mr. Eastham: Does the Mental Health Act 1983 contain provisions covering people serving in prisons? At Strangeways prison 12 prisoners are designated as mentally ill. When I visited the prison last Friday, I heard of one prisoner who was partially sighted and mentally inadequate and on remand on a charge involving about £6. It is costing about £250 a week to keep him in prison.

Mr. Clarke: We are desperately anxious to end this problem of people in prison who are mentally ill and require treatment. I am glad that their numbers are decreasing. This is however, a long-standing problem. New powers have been brought into effect whereby prisoners can be remanded to mental hospitals for reports. That, I hope, has helped to alleviate some of the problems. I am sorry that it has not been used in the case to which the hon Gentleman referred.

Children in Care

9. Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what plans he has to seek to reduce the need to receive children into care.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security (Mr. John Patten): We support the growing emphasis on preventive measures and policies in child care. Indeed, the number of children in local authority care has been decreasing. It is for local authorities to provide services for children in need, whether to keep them with their families or, in the interests of the children, to provide alternative arrangements for their care.

Mr. Corbyn: Is the Minister aware that every year 500 children are received into care by local authority social service departments because of homelessness? Will he accept that the policy of selling council houses and cutting back on the construction of new council houses makes this problem far worse, and is likely to increase the number of children taken into care due to homelessness? Does he not think that he ought to give the House a statement on what he intends to do to improve the housing stock of the worst-off people in the country, so that children are not brought into care?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think that that is well beyond the Minister's responsibilities.

Mr. Patten: As you say, Mr. Speaker, it is well beyond my responsibilities. I recognise the hon. Gentleman's views about homelessness, because in Islington there is a considerable amount of homelessness. I also recognise that in Islington there are a considerable number of children in care. However, the numbers of children in care have been decreasing nationally. Most children go into care for a range of reasons. Homelessness might be one of the reasons that cause children to go into care.

Mr. Hayes: Despite welcome modifications in the law brought in by my hon. Friend, does he accept that there is still a long way to go to achieve a balance between, on the one hand, of protecting the child who needs protection, and on the other of looking after the interests and rights of the parents?

Mr. Patten: It is a difficult balance to strike, and social workers have a difficult job in trying to strike that balance. I pay tribute to the work they do. In any case where a child is placed into care, it is the welfare of the child that has to be paramount, and the future of the child that has to be considered above all else.

Ms. Harman: Does the Minister recognise that children in care are largely the children of the poor, and that high levels of unemployment, his Government's policies of undermining wages councils and planned cuts in benefits—which mean that more families will not be able to make ends meet—will result in more children being split apart from their families and having to be fostered, adopted or put into children's homes? Is this not the very opposite of being the party of the family, in that the Government are providing for the splitting apart of families?

Mr. Patten: Once again some of the hon. Lady's questions go beyond my departmental responsibilities. The numbers of children in care are reducing. Those who look after children in care have a responsible and difficult job. That is why I hope that the hon. Lady, who has been uncharacteristically silent for some time about problems affecting children's homes in her constituency in the London borough of Southwark, will back me at the meeting of the London borough of Southwark's full council tomorrow in a call for a full investigation of all homes over which doubts have been cast.

Homeless Families

10. Mr. Nicholas Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he last visited a bed-and-breakfast establishment used for homeless families.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security (Mr. Ray Whitney): In recent months I have visited a number of board and lodging establishments catering for single people and for families.

Mr. Brown: Will the Minister come and visit the people who are living in tents opposite the metro station by the Newcastle Haymarket, and will he explain to them the Government's response to the report of the British Association of Social Workers "Housing in social work", which sets out the fact that it costs the Government twice as much to provide bed-and-breakfast accommodation as it would cost the state to provide decent council housing?

Mr. Whitney: I shall happily look at any particular problems in Newcastle that the hon. Gentleman wishes to bring to my attention, but I hope he will understand that the measures we have taken are a sensible use of the social security budget.

Mr. Fallon: Is my hon. Friend aware that on Tyneside alone there are 5,500 empty council houses, a quarter of which have been empty for more than a year? Will he consider telling these hypocritical Labour councils to allow homeless couples homesteading rights on any council houses that are empty?

Mr. Whitney: I take note of the important point that my hon. Friend makes, but, of course, he is taking me into realms beyond my responsibilities.

Mr. Conlan: When will the Minister stop the rip-off imposed on public funds by the owners of these so-called bed-and-breakfast establishments?

Mr. Whitney: I welcome the hon. Gentleman's support for the measures introduced by my right hon. Friend some months ago.

Mr. Holt: While my hon. Friend is looking at Newcastle, will he also look at the fact that that city has banned the use of Noddy and Babar the Elephant books because of the racist overtones?

Mr. Speaker: I do not know whether that has anything to do with bed and breakfast.

Hon. Members: Answer.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I, too, was confused. It may have something to do with bed, but nothing to do with breakfast.

Mr. Meacher: On a more relevant point, is the Minister aware that in a study undertaken by the citizens advice bureaux into board and lodging restrictions affecting young unemployed persons in Stoke it was found that in two thirds of cases return to the parental household was impossible because of divorce, sexual abuse or parental refusal, and that in another one fifth of cases the DHSS was apparently quite unaware of grounds for exemption? Does that not show how utterly unjust these regulations are? When will the Government accept that the real answer to this problem is not to force young people into wandering round the country like nomads, but to restart the housebuilding programme and to provide adequate rented accommodation in the public sector?

Mr. Whitney: As the hon. Gentleman knows, our original proposals established very important exemption categories, and local DHSS officers are under clear instructions to make those exemption categories widely known. The studies that we have had so far, and the feedback from local social security offices, suggests that the regulations now in place are effective and helpful.

Ambulance Services, Merseyside

11. Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what representations he has received concerning cuts in ambulance services on Merseyside; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: We have received no such representations. The Mersey regional health authority has consulted widely on proposals to reorganise the emergency service provided by the metropolitan ambulance service. The proposals were drawn up following a study on accident and emergency cover in the Mersey metropolitan area.

We cannot comment at this stage on the likely outcome of local consultation, which will not be completed until 31 July. Hon. Members whose constituencies lie in the metropolitan area were sent copies of the consultation document.

Mr. Parry: The Minister will be aware of early-day motion No. 771, which has been supported by 38 hon. Members. I have received representation from the public, patients and NUPE, who are objecting to the reduction of five ambulances in a fleet of 30. Will the Minister have words with the regional health authority, given the possibility of a catastrophe in Liverpool, when lives and limbs could be at stake? Will he make sure that essential services in the city are maintained?

Mr. Patten: I am, of course, aware of the early-day motion, and I shall pass the hon. Gentleman's comments on to the chairman of the regional health authority, Mr. Don Wilson. However, I understand that the proposals involve no loss of service and no loss of jobs. I also understand that the ambulance service in Merseyside is an expanding service, with an 8 per cent. growth in jobs over the past eight years and a further 10 per cent. growth in the next decade.

Unemployed Persons

13. Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he estimates that the relative financial position of the unemployed will improve in the two years after the implementation of the social security review.

Mr. Newton: A firm estimate of the effects cannot be made until benefit rates are set within any new structure of social security benefits which may be settled following the current consultation on the Green Paper proposals.

Mr. Cohen: Is not the Minister's answer a cover-up of the truth? Will not the financial position of the unemployed drastically deteriorate after the implementation of the review, as a result of which the unemployed will be impoverished? Is not the Government's message to the unemployed and those who become unemployed that they will be made financially and socially insecure?

Mr. Newton: All that the hon. Gentleman has done is to convey the impression that he has not even read the Green Paper. One of the major causes of concern has been the position of families with children, whether unemployed or in low-paid work. It is clear from the Green Paper that that is a group to which the Government wish to give greater emphasis.

Mr. McCrindle: In any consideration of the effect on the unemployed of the proposals in the social security reviews, is it not wise to take into account the fact that encouraging people who may be discouraged at the moment from taking a job is a positive step in the interests of those who are unemployed?

Mr. Newton: That is correct, and the effect on both the poverty and unemployment traps, especially the latter, is one of the major advantages of our structural proposals, as is the improved earnings rule for those who have been out of work for a long time.

Mrs. Beckett: Is the Minister aware that those who lose service through unemployment will be most disadvantaged by the abolition of SERPS? Does he recall that when the Secretary of State announced that abolition he told the House that it was the result of unexpected and unforeseen developments and that those developments had come to light during the reviews? In the light of the statement in the last few days that these matters were not discussed, and in the light of the Government Actuary's statement that costs were not unforeseen and that what has changed is the Government's willingness to meet the costs, will the Minister now tell us whether his right hon. Friend intends to apologise to the House? [Interruption.] Further, will he tell us the real reason for the abolition?

Mr. Newton: I am in some difficulty about replying to the hon. Lady, because I heard only about half the question. I can say, however, that it is quite clear from the additional analysis, including work relating to the 1981 census carried out for the review, that the prospective cost of SERPS is significantly greater than was fully appreciated by those who made the decisions at the time.

Mr. Favell: Will my right hon. Friend bear in mind that many people take low-paid employment out of a sense of pride? They find it enormously difficult to make ends meet.

Mr. Newton: Yes. Not the least of the failures of our social security system is that we have put many people in low-paid work in the intolerable position of knowing they would be better off out of work. We intend to put a stop to that.

Mr. Meacher: Is the Minister aware that all the cuts, as opposed to the restructuring in the Green Paper, the abolition of SERPS, the requirement on the poorest families to pay at least 20 per cent. of their rates, the removal of mortgage interest payment relief from those on the dole for the first six months, were not recommended by the review committees and imposed only on the personal decision of the Secretary of State? What other decisions, what other cuts, did he impose which were not recommended by his own review committees? Will he now publish all the review committee reports so that we can judge how much he has deviated from his own advisory review committees to impose cuts?

Mr. Newton: It was made absolutely clear throughout that the Government would be taking decisions and putting forward proposals as Government decisions after taking account of the work of the various teams which were set up. What I would like to know from the hon. Gentleman is when we shall know whether his proposals about mortgage interest are the policies of the Leader of the Oppostion and the Labour Party.

Limited List Prescribing

14. Mr. Meadowcroft asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he has yet received the reply of the British Medical Association to his proposals for an appeals procedure on the limited list.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Yes, Sir. The general medical services committee of the British Medical Association has now formally declined our proposals for a local appeal mechanism for the selected list of drugs.

Mr. Meadowcroft: Would support from general practitioners wishing to implement such an appeal system be sufficient for the Minister to implement it for them unilaterally?

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: It would be very difficult to implement a scheme without the co-operation of the people who originally asked for it. We have gone through the process of having this mechanism asked for by the BMA. We then negotiated with BMA representatives to their satisfaction. Eventually, our proposal was rejected by the conference of local medical committees. As I said earlier to my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Edgbaston (Dame J. Knight), what has happened is that, in practice, the need for such a mechanism has turned out to be insufficient.

Dr. Mawhinney: Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that that is an unacceptable decision by the medical profession? Bearing in mind that he regarded such an appeal mechanism as important for patients when he established the system, will he pursue the proposal, preferably with the help of the medical profession? If that is not possible, will he seek some other way to set up such a mechanism?

Mr. Clarke: The decision was taken on the advice of the conference of local medical committees, a body fairly representative of general practitioners. The history of the matter is that the mechanism was called for before we introduced the selected list system, when there were exaggerated fears about the likely effect on patients. In practice, the need for such a mechanism has diminished and we are getting along well without it, but if the BMA or the medical profession changes its mind we shall, of course, consider the matter again.

Dr. M. S. Miller: Why does the right hon. and learned Gentleman not go straight to the general practitioners themselves? He does not need to have the support of every GP, but if a sufficient number will follow the scheme they will be able to carry out their main purpose of pursuing the best interests of their patients. Why does he not go straight to the GPs and let them work the scheme?

Mr. Clarke: With respect to the hon. Gentleman, who has been a general practitioner, I do not think that a sufficient number of GPs are challenging the decision of their own local medical committees. The present system is working reasonably well, and now that we have set up a new review committee to keep the list up to date it is unlikely that there will be any major difficulties in practice.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Mr. Holt asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 16 July.

The Prime Minister (Mrs. Margaret Thatcher): This morning I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in this House I shall be having further meetings later today. This evening I hope to have an audience of Her Majesty the Queen.

Mr. Holt: Does my right hon. Friend agree that, apart from the lunatic fringe on the Opposition Benches, the vast majority of people in this country and in the world will be heartened by her strong and robust words yesterday on the subject of terrorism? Will she re-emphasise those words today and at every opportunity, especially to the justices of this country and to others responsible for sentencing policy, so that not only terrorists but all who are involved in vicious crime are brought to book and receive long sentences?

The Prime Minister: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. I believe that most people share the views that I put across on the need for maximum co-operation between countries on terrorism and the need for very severe sentences of imprisonment for those convicted of crimes of violence.

Mr. Roy Jenkins: What does the Prime Minister intend to do to prevent a repetition of the disastrous effect of the exchange rate on British industry in 1981?

The Prime Minister: I have no reason to think that the present exchange rate is adverse to British industry. As the right hon. Gentleman knows, when the pound is higher against the dollar we can get raw materials and semi-fabricated components at a lower price. When the pound is lower against the dollar exports become more competitive, but it is not advisable to rely on the exchange rate for competitiveness.

Mr. Cowans: Will the Prime Minister take time out to visit Trinity House and take the Secretary of State for Transport with her—even if he has to be taken on a lead—and discuss the efforts being made by Trinity House to have lighthouse tender ships built in this country? Is she aware that she is being asked merely to match the offer and to repay the efforts of the shipbuilders on Tyneside who built the Endeavour for the Falklands campaign as well as the Ark Royal, but who for their pains now see ships for Britain being built in Korea? Will she show some compassion? Will she show the kind of woman she is and repay the people who work for us? They are British.

The Prime Minister: The hon. Gentleman is aware that the gap between the price quoted in Korea and that quoted by British Shipbuilders was too great to be bridged by subsidies under the intervention system. The hon. Gentleman knows that we subsidise the business, but if we are to get business we must be able to match competitiveness and efficiency.

Q2. Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 16 July.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Winterton: Does my right hon. Friend agree that a substantial reduction in interest rates would be much to the advantage of British industry and therefore outweigh any disadvantage to the value of the pound? Will she therefore have a word with the Bank of England and get the British banking system to act in the interests of manufacturing industry in the United Kingdom?

The Prime Minister: Many interests have to be considered in the determination of interest rates. My hon. Friend is aware that, when the value of the pound went down seriously, that was extremely damaging to the reputation of Britain, to British industry and bad for inflation. My hon. Friend is aware that we shall keep interest rates at whatever level is needed to maintain downward pressure on inflation, but no higher than that.

Mr. Kinnock: May I join the Prime Minister in her praise for the performers and contributors to Live Aid? As she said, it was humanity in action. By the same token, is it not inhumanity in action when a Government cut 18 per cent. off an aid budget in real terms in five years, when that same Government reduce the aid budget by 3 per cent. in real terms—£40 million just in this year—and when that Government, despite the emergency in Sudan and Ethiopia during the past two years, have not added one penny to the aid budget, except for the Hercules services, which they are now thinking of withdrawing? With a record such as that, what price the brotherhood of man?

The Prime Minister: The right hon. Gentleman is comparing the taxpayers' aid with voluntary aid. There has always been a place for voluntary aid. Voluntary services have done a great deal. For example, Christian Aid, Oxfam, War on Want and Save the Children have always been extremely active in this area and the new Live Aid was an extremely welcome addition. As for what we have done for Ethiopia and Sudan, in 1984 we provided £266 million, of which £248 million went to sub-Saharan countries, including £234 million for long-term development. In the year to March 1985 we spent £95 million on famine relief operations in Africa. This year we expect to spend at least £60 million. As the right hon. Gentleman is aware, my right hon. Friend the Minister for Overseas Development is now in Ethiopia and considering the needs for future months, especially the need to keep going with the Hercules.

Mr. Kinnock: I am more than prepared to compare Government aid — taxpayers' aid — with the charitable contributions made freely by people in Britain. When I do, I see that in the past year, a year in which the Government took £40 million off aid, the people were prepared to subscribe £67 million in aid—[HON. MEMBERS: "What is wrong with that?"] Well, why do we not have it all together, public and private? I also see that the Government have cut an amount equivalent to 10 times that which has been subscibed in the wake of the Live Aid concert. In any case, is the Prime Minister not ashamed of the fact — [HON. MEMBERS: "No."] — that the only way in which she is prepared to provide short-term aid to the starving is by robbing the hungry of the world as she shuffles round the aid budget? Will she do three things? First, will she reverse this disastrous and cruel cut in aid policy? Secondly, will she make a contribution — [Interruption.] I can understand the irritation, embarrassment and shame of Conservative Members. Secondly, will she make a contribution to the international food and agricultural development fund, which helps poor farmers in Africa? Thirdly, will she give us a guarantee now that the essential Hercules service will continue—and not be withdrawn — for as long at the need for it exists in Ethiopia?

The Prime Minister: First, as the right hon. Gentleman knows, the majority of general aid is spent on capital long-term projects of the sort that he proposes should take place, that is on the development of food resources in Africa. Secondly, I am extremely proud of the Government's record on aid to Ethiopia and the Sudan. We were the first to respond, and that is what the right hon. Gentleman cannot stand. As he knows, within the aid budget there is always a certain amount both for disaster and famine relief and for contingencies. The right hon. Gentleman is well aware that the Government were the first to respond to the need in Ethiopia, and quick to respond in Sudan. We were the first to respond to the need for transport to take food to its destination. Yesterday, in response to a serious shortage of transport, my right hon. Friend the Minister for Overseas Development announced further assistance of £2 million to help with the purchase of transport.

Mr. Steen: Will my right hon. Friend seek time this afternoon to drop a congratulatory note to Bob Geldhardt —[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. Interruptions take up the time of the House.

Mr. Steen: Will my right hon. Friend seek time this afternoon to drop a congratulatory note to Bob Geldof— [Interruption.]—and will she thank him for raising £50 million to be sent to Ethiopia? Will she remind him that young people, far from being hooligans on the football terraces, are as compassionate and caring as any people in the world?

The Prime Minister: Obviously, I sent a letter to Mr. Geldof before the concert congratulating him on the idea. We are all delighted that it had such a magnificent result.

We congratulate him not only on the result, but on the leadership that he gave to young people and to humanity everywhere.

Q3. Mr. Cohen asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 16 July.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Cohen: Will the Prime Minister condemn the monstrous murder in Ilford of Mrs. Kassam, who was eight months pregnant, and her three children in what was almost certainly a racial attack? Does that not highlight the need for tougher laws against racial attacks and harassment, such as I shall introduce tomorrow? Will the Prime Minister give a pledge to introduce such legislation at the earliest opportunity and to end her Government's failure to act in the face of an increase in racial attacks?

The Prime Minister: I am not yet convinced that we need any changes in the law. It would be premature to embark on legislation before the Home Office has received the Commission for Racial Equality's proposals for amending the Race Relations Act 1976 following its review of that legislation. One wholly and utterly condemns that terrible attack, which had such terrible consequences for the Kassam family.

Q4. Mrs. McCurley asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 16 July.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mrs. McCurley: In the light of the optimistic economic forecast made today by the chairman of the British Steel Corporation, will my right hon. Friend comment on the future of Ravenscraig and on the fact that those on the Left who are the most vociferous in howling for its retention were the ones who were prepared to make it the sacrificial baa lamb during the miners' strike?

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend is correct. The results announced by the British Steel Corporation are the best for 10 years, although the steel industry lost £180 million because of the miners' strike. But for the effect of the strike on steel, it would have been in profit to the extent of about £40 million. It is an extremely good result. I agree with my hon. Friend about Ravenscraig. The people who work there struggled nobly and successfully to keep it going. Those who are now pleading for more for Ravenscraig are the very people who were anxious to close it during last year's coal strike.

Mr. Dormand: Will the Prime Minister give some thought today and, indeed, every day, to the plight of the long-term unemployed? Will she examine some of the studies that have been made of people who have been without work for a long time, to see the devastating effects of long-term unemployment? Does she sometimes have qualms of conscience about the catastrophic effect of long-term unemployment on families? Is it not the biggest single indictment of her economic policies?

The Prime Minister: It is because we are so very much aware of the catastrophic effect of long-term unemployment on the morale of people and their families that, in the Budget, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor announced nearly a doubling of the community programme and a substantial increase in jobs so that the long-term unemployed can have a chance of a worthwhile job after their periods of unemployment. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman has seen a document from Europe, published today, which shows that the numbers in employment in Europe are increasing, and that the increase in jobs in Britain during the past year is greater than that in all the other European countries put together.

Mr. Golding: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, arising out of questions. Can you ask the Government Whips whether, when they are planting out, they could choose more fertile ground and occasionally water the plants?

Mr. Speaker: I have no responsibility for the Whips.

"Lifting the Burden"

3.31 pm

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. John Moore): I wish to make a statement on the White Paper "Lifting the Burden".

One of the major objectives of this Government is to make sure that the right conditions exist for enterprise to flourish. This is essential for the creation of jobs and wealth. The country needs more jobs and we need more wealth to pay for all the socially desirable things we expect to be provided—such as pensions, the Health Service and education.

For far too long, successive Governments — albeit with good intentions — have tended to stifle much-needed enterprise with restriction and regulation. Today, we are publishing a White Paper called "Lifting the Burden", which sets out to put that situation right.

As the House will recall, in March of this year, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry published a report entitled "Burdens on Business". This showed that Government requirements constitute a major drain on business—particularly small business—in terms of direct cost and of management time.

"Lifting the Burden" is the result of the Government's consideration of the recommendations in that report and of looking more widely at the scope for change. It also reflects the widespread representations on the report which the Government have received.

The White Paper is the first major step in a continuing programme of removing unnecessary regulations. It refers to about 80 measures covering a wide range of initiatives in a number of areas, including planning, tax and social security, employment protection, and trade and industry — some of which have already been undertaken and some of which are for the future. Each is designed to allow firms to divert scarce resources away from complying with bureaucratic requirements and towards developing and expanding their business.

This is but the beginning of the process, for one of the most important elements in the White Paper is the setting up of a new system within Government to assess proposed and existing regulations from the point of view of the burden the may impose on business. The primary responsibility for this must be within the appropriate Department, but a Central Task Force is being set up, within the Enterprise Unit in the Cabinet Office, to assist Departments in their consideration of how the burden on business of regulations can be minimised.

I should emphasise to the House that we are not seeking to remove all regulations. Essential protection for workers, consumers and the general public must be maintained. And we must protect our quality of life. The Government have sought to strike the right balance between liberty and licence. The White Paper adopts a balanced approach. It represents a major step forward in giving businesses the freedom to flourish and grow. I commend it to the attention of the House.

Mr. Tony Blair (Sedgefield): It is obviously not possible to give a detailed response at this stage, but we hope that there will be a full debate on the White Paper in due course. In general terms, we would, of course, support the abolition of unnecessary bureaucracy in the interests of small businesses, but the test that will be applied to the White Paper is whether it deals with the real problems of the economy and unemployment or whether it is just another Government gimmick designed to distract attention, and in particular whether we are talking about cutting unnecessary bureaucracy or about subordinating vital protections for the consumers and employees in the interests of ideological obsession with deregulation.

Turning to the substance of the White Paper, why do the Government identify the one major problem of regulation and then proceed to deal only with the minor ones? Is it not the case that the only area of regulation mentioned by more than one in five of the Department's own survey was value added tax? Is not that the main problem faced by small businesses? Is it not correct that the White Paper proposes no new action of any substance on that? Why, in particular, did the Government block Opposition amendments to the Finance Bill that would have eased the bad debt relief on small firms?

Secondly, will the Minister undertake that there will be no less environmental protection from the changes in planning procedure? Will he tell us why they are given such prominence when only a minute percentage of his survey said that they were a major factor?

Thirdly, any loss of standards — and I think there may be — in fire regulations or health and safety regulations would be a wholly unacceptable and wrong price to pay. How on earth can it be right for the Government to impose different rights and duties in regard to safety for the public and employees based on the size of the firm? Is the Minister saying that the risk of mishap is less with small businesses? If so, may I tell him that all the evidence indicates the contrary, and that small businesses give rise to the most safety risks?

We shall oppose vigorously the suggestions about unfair dismissal law and wages councils. What philosophy is it that says that fair play and fair rights of employment are a constraint on proper business activity?

Many of the proposals seem to have been derived not from business experience but from political doctrine. Why is it that the scrutiny which gave rise to the White Paper received views from the organisations representing employers but not from a single organisation representing employees? Why were the Institute of Directors and the Adam Smith Institute so closely involved with the proposal? Is it not the case, as the survey itself found, that "most small businesses see problems with finance and sales as more serious than problems with compliance costs"? The same survey said:

"The main reasons for business being good are individual effort and good demand."

If those are the main problems, why have not the Government dealt with them? Why create an agency to cut red tape but not agencies for industrial development? Why do we end planning protections but cut back on local authority initiatives which would create more jobs? Why do we cut back on unfair dismissal but not give proper training in the face of skill shortage? Why do we worry about the cost of meeting health and safety regulations but decline to lower interest rates?

At first blush, the White Paper is a shabby and irrelevant document from a Government whose ideology is unable to solve the real problems of our economy. Will a single job be created by the scheme? If not, of what use is it?

Mr. Moore: The hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair), who spoke from the Opposition Front Bench, has clearly not benefited from the opportunity to read the White Paper. I accept and understand that we have had rhetoric and dogma in the extreme as opposed to the Government's attempt to respond to the "Burdens on Business" study, which sought to ask business what would be helpful in improving opportunities for employment——

Mr. Andrew Faulds (Warley, East): Shocking!

Mr. Moore: It is fascinating that as soon as there is an attempt——

Mr. Faulds: Tatty!

Mr. Moore: The patience of the Government is as long, if not longer, than the time taken by sedentary interruptions from the Opposition Back Benches. As soon as there is a serious attempt by the Government, as there is in this instance, to address many of the problems that business identifies in an endeavour to create jobs, we have ribald cat-calling from the Opposition that does so much harm to the House, and certainly to the Opposition.

The hon. Member for Sedgefield talked of rhetoric. I know that hon. Members generally have not had an opportunity to study the White Paper. I respond to the hon. Gentleman's first point by saying that my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House was present throughout his comments, and I am sure that he will have noted the hon. Gentleman's request for a full debate. Paragraph 1.1 of the White Paper states:

"This paper is about one important aspect of helping enterprise to grow—by reducing burdens imposed on business by administrative and legislative regulations."

The White Paper is related specifically to that.

The hon. Member for Sedgefield spoke about VAT. The Government, through the Budget and in considering the Finance Bill in Committee, have relieved a substantial burden of bad debt by introducing £25 million worth of relief. I am surprised that the hon. Gentleman, who I imagine speaks with some knowledge of industry and business, is not aware of the degree to which planning procedures have inhibited the growth and development of jobs. The matters to which the White Paper addresses itself in pages 10 to 16 are critical.

The hon. Member for Sedgefield asked about health and safety. Those of my hon. Friends who have not had the opportunity to read the White Paper in detail will be reassured — the hon. Gentleman made an assertion which, if true, would be difficult to argue with — by paragraph 5.6 on page 22 of the White Paper. The last sentence states:

"The Government are committed to maintaining necessary protection and have no intention of down-grading health & safety standards either generally or in relation to small firms."

The hon. Gentleman's next question was directed specifically to jobs. I refer to paragraph 1.16 on page 4 of the White Paper. Research Associates examined 200 businesses as part of the "Burdens on Business" report. It was clear that there was a cumulative job loss of 200 within that net of 200 firms. That might be an indication of the burden that has been carried by the 1·6 million businesses in Britain and the job losses within them. It is clear from business surveys that jobs are lost in consequence of regulations. It is clear also that the removal of the regulations is a major first step in the Government's attempt to help in this area.

Sir Peter Hordern (Horsham): If it is necessary for the Government to take 80 separate measures to help small businesses, it is a wonder that they have been able to survive at all. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Minister on bringing, belatedly, these measures into existence. Is there anything in them that will raise the level at which VAT is to be paid and the level at which corporation tax is to be paid by small businesses? Is anything to be done about the wages councils?

Mr. Moore: I thank my hon. Friend for his comments. The White Paper relates to business as a whole, not just to small businesses, which are especially burdened by regulations and legislation.

I should have responded to one of the points made by the hon. Member for Sedgefield by drawing attention to the reference to the VAT threshold on page 17 in paragraph 4.2. It states:

"This threshold below which firms are exempted from having to charge VAT is the maximum permitted under EC law. The Government believe that Member States should have more flexibility to raise their VAT threshold if they wish. This goal is being pursued through the initiative launched by the Prime Minister at the European Council meeting in March this year."

That is a clear commitment to action which has already been initiated by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister. There are no references in the White Paper to corporation tax threshold.

Mr. Ron Leighton (Newham, North-East): Is the Minister aware that the main burden which needs lifting from British industry is the burden of the present Government and their restrictive policies? Is he aware that it is a complete illusion to think that the current mass unemployment has anything to do with the trivia mentioned in the White Paper, including the attack on the Health and Safety at Work etc. Act 1974? If he believes all this stuff, will he give the House an estimate of how many more jobs will be created as a result of the proposals in the White Paper?

Mr. Moore: I have already tried to illustrate, by referring to page 4 of the White Paper, the problems that business encounters in relation to the inhibition of employment through regulations and legislation. I tried to show how it could be quantified. Hon. Members might like to interest themselves in the White Paper. I appreciate that they have not had time to read it, and I accept that difficulty. However, I hope that when the hon. Gentleman, who is a fair man, reads it he will recognise that, while at other times we may be discussing the Government's fundamental economic policy, here we are discussing an equally important set of policies which relate to the removal of the kind of supply side rigidities that have so inhibited the development of jobs and employment.

Mr. John Browne (Winchester): Does my hon. Friend accept that all men and women, regardless of party, who believe in freedom and enterprise will welcome the statement as pure music? They will see it as a bold, imaginative and, above all, co-ordinated attempt by the Government to remove bureaucratic burdens from employment. However, will he assure the House that he will introduce measures to ensure that protection is given to the green belt and to ensure the abolition of wages councils?

Mr. Moore: I am not sure that I fit the bill for introducing music, but I am pleased that my hon. Friend noticed the degree of co-ordination represented by the White Paper. My noble Friend in another place has been responsible for introducing the degree of co-ordination that the Government need. The debate is about the difference between licence and liberty. As my hon. Friend is plainly seriously interested in the issue, I draw his attention to page 10 of the White Paper which is entitled "Planning and Enterprise".

[Mr. Moore]

My hon. Friend asked about the green belt. The planning aspects are clearly identified in paragraphs 3·2 and 3·3. They make it clear that "The Government's policy is to simplify the system and improve its efficiency . . . An efficient and simple system can speed the planning process and facilitate much needed development which helps create jobs — in construction, in commerce and industry, and in small firms."

The White Paper then makes this important point:

"The Government is equally concerned to protect"——

[Interruption.] This may not be important to Opposition Members, but I know that it is important to people outside the House—

"and enhance the environment in town and country, to preserve our heritage of historic buildings and rural landscape, to conserve good agricultural land and maintain the green belts."

I am sure that that statement is welcome.

Mr. George Park (Coventry, North-East): Does the Minister realise that the greatest service the Government could render industry would be to ensure that the terms of trade between this country and other countries are fair and equal? Why does he not propose to do something about discriminatory tariffs and the differences in fuel and energy costs? Why does he continue to levy on motor vehicles a tax which is not applied to any other commodity in this country? Those are some of the measures that would lift the burdens from industry.

Mr. Moore: The hon. Gentleman is making legitimate points about questions that are probably better addressed at other times. He will be particularly interested in page 29 of the White Paper, which illustrates the actions that my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and others are leading within the European Community to try to ensure that the regulatory burden that emanates from Europe, as well as that from within the country, is reduced.

Sir Reginald Eyre (Birmingham, Hall Green): Is my hon. Friend aware that, despite the surprisingly ill-informed reaction of Labour Members, the White Paper's approach is very much to be welcomed, particularly the proposals relating to the simplified planning zones? These could be helpful in contributing to the solution of the problems of the inner city areas, and would help to attract developments into those areas, where unemployment is worse. When will legislation be introduced on this? Will my hon. Friend assure the House that in the meantime he will encourage local authorities to prepare their plans and to make applications for this beneficial form of zoning?

Mr. Moore: I appreciate my hon. Friend's remarks. I know his long experience in this sector and I enormously respect the expertise that he brings to bear. I no longer express surprise at Labour Members' reactions. I know that my hon. Friend will be particularly pleased to study with care page 11 of the White Paper which, in paragraph 3.6 (i), goes into considerable details about the important — [Interruption.] Labour Members may be unaware, until they go back to their constituencies, of the importance of simplified planning zones. They will find that it arouses considerable interest in their local authorities.

I know that my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Hall Green (Sir R. Eyre), with his considerable experience, will particularly appreciate what is said in the section on simplified planning zones in the White Paper. The White Paper says:

"It is proposed to introduce new legislation".

I hope that that will be very soon.

Mr. Paddy Ashdown (Yeovil): As the Minister will know, the alliance has supported the Government's attempts to try to lift the burdens on small businesses where those are sensible and responsible. Therefore, we welcome the general direction of the White Paper, even though it appears at first sight to be somewhat long on rhetoric and short on specific measures.

I have three questions. First, would not a full day's debate on this matter be useful? Secondly, would it not be highly inappropriate to shift the burdens from the small business men if they were to be shifted to small business employees, resulting in extra exploitation and reduced conditions of work? Thirdly, will the members of the Central Task Force include representatives of both small businesses and small business employees?

Mr. Moore: I unreservedly thank the hon. Gentleman for welcoming the basic thrust of the White Paper. I find his welcome a little jaundiced by his suggestion that it is long on rhetoric. We have not had to conspire with the hon. Gentleman's party in this and he will find on closer examination that there are many specific details.

I cannot comment further than I have already about the possibility of a debate. That is up to my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House, who is still here and has heard the hon. Gentleman's comments. Because of the excellent material within the White Paper, I can see no reason why the Government would not welcome such a debate.

The hon. Gentleman is right. This is an attempt to shift the burden of regulation and legislation from where it is unnecessary, and from employer and employee alike. We do not intend to shift the burden from one to the other. It is envisaged that the small Central Task Force will have representatives from the outside world, and I am sure that my noble Friend Lord Young will concern himself with ensuring that small business men are included in the brief. I shall make sure that I put the hon. Gentleman's points to my noble Friend.

Mr. Michael Grylls (Surrey, North-West): Is my hon. Friend aware that in the United States the creation of jobs in deregulated industries has been twice as fast as that in other industries? Therefore, the major advance that has been announced today in freeing owner-managed businesses from destructive bureaucracy is very much to be welcomed. Can we expect to receive yearly White Papers to describe progress on the deregulation programme so that the House of Commons may measure how fast we are moving?

Mr. Moore: I thank my hon. Friend for his welcome of the White Paper. I should like to see action flowing from the recommendations rather than a whole series of White Papers. My hon. Friend is right in the major thrust of what he said in relation to the United States. We mention the matter on page 3 of the White Paper. He is right to mention aspects of the way in which deregulation in the United States has not only enhanced job creation but reduced massively costs to business and industry and to the taxpayer. It has been successful all round.

Mr. Harry Ewing (Falkirk, East): As the name of the Secretary of State for Scotland does not appear on the White Paper, will the Financial Secretary tell the House whether the White Paper relates to Scotland as well? If it does, what is the position in relation to simplified planning zones? Does not the Minister regard it as very dangerous that a private developer will have the right, under the proposals in the White Paper, more or less to ask the Secretary of State to instruct a local authority to proceed with a planning application under the simplified planning zone procedure? Is not that highly dangerous, coming from a House of Commons where so many private developers are represented through the voices of Conservative Members?

Mr. Moore: The hon. Gentleman is right to draw our attention to the different planning position in Scotland. It is referred to in the White Paper. Obviously the hon. Gentleman has not had time to read it, which I appreciate——

Mr. Ewing: I have.

Mr. Moore: I am sorry. I should like to draw the hon. Gentleman's attention to page 10, paragraph 3·5, which states:

"The Secretary of State for Scotland is also issuing a new circular on development control priorities and procedures in which these principles will be drawn to the attention of Scottish planning authorities."

I shall draw the hon. Gentleman's additional points to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State. I shall be happy to ask him to answer the hon. Gentleman's specific points.

Mr. Anthony Beaumont-Dark (Birmingham, Selly Oak): I welcome the White Paper, but can my hon. Friend tell us whether we shall change the accounting procedures with regard to auditing, because many small companies are treated by the Revenue as if they were ICI? Will that be incorporated in the simplification of the whole revenue procedure?

Mr. Moore: There is a study of specific accounting points that are referred to in parts of the White Paper and details in regard to accounting procedures. That study is due to report in the autumn—in September, I think—but most of the detailed improvements relating to accounting are separate from the particular proposals that are likely to be in the taxation Green Paper, which relates to non-cumulation and the possibility of the combination of tax and social security and tax and NIC.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): Will the hon. Gentleman look at page 11, paragraph 3.6(i), which states that local authorities

"will also be required to consider proposals for the establishment of SPZs initiated by private developers"?

Does that mean that every local authority will, as a matter of law, have to consider every plan that is put forward by a private developer? That is what it says. Has it occurred to the Government how many staff will be involved and the sheer cost of that? Is not this in fact a private developers' charter?

Mr. Moore: With respect, I draw the hon. Gentleman's attention to the beginning of that paragraph, which states that new legislation will be introduced. It will be possible at that time to discuss the details that the hon. Gentleman is talking about. The central point is in the next sentence, which says:

"This will enable the local planning authority to specify types of development allowed in an area, so that developers can then carry out development that conforms to the scheme without the need for a planning application and the related fee. Planning permission for other types of development can be applied for in the normal way."

That is the central theme. I know that the hon. Gentleman will wish to address the additional points on the introduction of the legislation.

Mr. Jeremy Hanley (Richmond and Barnes): The White Paper clearly shows that the Government agree with the vast majority of people in this country that reducing unemployment is the main social and political priority. Does not my hon. Friend agree that those who seek to preserve the regulations that so often are a disincentive to employment should justify that as a higher priority than increasing employment?

Mr. Moore: Yes, absolutely.

Mr. Dave Nellist (Coventry, South-East): Is it not a fact that the White Paper will do nothing to lift the burden of mass unemployment from 5 million people in this country—[Interruption.]—but, rather, will increase the rate of exploitation of workers, particularly youngsters, women workers and the 9 million low paid? Is the Minister aware that paragraph 5.10 of the White Paper represents a continuation of the Government's idea that lads and lasses working in hairdressing, on a £33.40 minimum wage, are responsible for the mass unemployment? Where do the Government get the idea that 2·75 million young workers who come under wages councils are responsible for the mass unemployment that we have in Britain?

Mr. Moore: To bring a semblance of reality back to the debate——

Mr. Nellist: Unemployment is real for those without work.

Mr. Moore: —paragraph 5.10 points out, among other things, the unnecessary restrictions that relate to women's hours of work. At present, technically, women cannot do more than six hours' overtime and, unless exemption is granted, women cannot work shifts. The proposed legislation will remove those outdated constraints. I should have thought that hon. Members on both sides of the House would welcome the way in which the basic rights of such people are still protected and would welcome the removal of discrimination against women.

Sir William Clark (Croydon, South): In view of the fact that between 1980 and 1984 140,000 net new businesses wer set up, does my hon. Friend agree that the lifting of burdens is bound to accelerate the rate at which businesses are established? In view of the EEC regulations on VAT, may we have more flexibility in the threshold of £19,500, at any rate for new businesses, even if that means increasing the threshold for new businesses for the first few years of their existence?

Mr. Moore: I welcome my hon. Friend's comments about the generation of new businesses, which is critical to creating employment. I referred earlier to paragraph 4.2, which gives the Government's position on the threshold, and I have taken careful note of my hon. Friend's remarks about the threshold and new businesses.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): Why do small business men in my constituency always tell me that they do far better under Labour Governments than they do under Conservative Governments? Could it possibly be because the monetary stance of Labour is more helpful to them? Is the Minister aware that his statement will do nothing to deal with the monetary stance of the Conservatives, which is at the heart of the problem?

Mr. Moore: Much as I personally like the hon. Gentleman, I could not for a moment begin to deny what people would say to him, knowing his particularly delightful, aggressive personality.

Sir Dudley Smith (Warwick and Leamington): Is my hon. Friend aware that an increasing number of people who have established small businesses in recent years have been looking forward to the day when there would be a bonfire of unnecessary regulations and that they will, therefore, welcome his announcement today? I have not had a chance to read the White Paper. Does it deal with finance? If not, will my hon. Friend have a word with the chairmen of the clearing banks because greater flexibility on their part would go a long way towards encouraging small businesses?

Mr. Moore: My hon. Friend is well informed on these issues. He may not recall that earlier I mentioned the way in which the White Paper referred to one important aspect of helping enterprises to grow—by reducing the burdens imposed on business by administrative and legislative regulations. I am aware that my hon. Friend raises a point about which we hear in other parts of Government, and I shall make sure that the Chancellor and my other colleagues are informed about what he has said.

Mr. Nigel Forman (Carshalton and Wallington): I welcome the proposals in this comprehensive White Paper, but is my hon. Friend aware that perhaps the most important point to small businesses is the need to raise the VAT threshold? Is he aware how vital it is for us to press that point in the Community and to achieve progress, with a VAT threshold of perhaps £50,000, as soon as possible?

Mr. Moore: My hon. Friend reiterates a point that has been made three times. I am sure that my right hon. and hon. Friends will not only welcome his support for the relevant part of the White Paper but will have heard his comments.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): The Minister should stop trying to pull the wool over people's eyes. Is it not a fact that the Tories' macro-economic policy of the last six years has resulted in more than 100,000 small and larger companies going under, with each year more bankruptcies and company liquidations occurring that in the preceding year? That process has continued throughout the reign of the Tories. How on earth can our problems be solved by the Government simply allocating clever little titles such as "Lifting the Burden" and how can micro solutions conceal the fact that the economic stranglehold of the Tories prevents companies from recovering?

When will the Minister offer a decent solution—for example, by telling small companies to go to the Governor of the Bank of England and say, "We would like to be treated in the same way as Johnson Matthey. We are a small firm, but we are employing some people. Why cannot we be treated in the same way as the City crooks?" Why do the Government have double standards—one for the their friends, and one for those whom they are prepared to cast into the gutter?

Mr. Moore: I was waiting eagerly for the subject of Johnson Matthey Bankers to be introduced into this micro debate. The hon. Gentleman will appreciate—because occasionally he tries to embrace facts—that the net increase in the number of small businesses in the past five years has been about 140,000. There has been a net increase at the micro level. He might care to give the House the benefit of his Socialist form of macro-economic policy when we next have a major economic debate. I am sure that that would be fascinating to the country at large.

Mr. Tim Eggar (Enfield, North): I welcome the White Paper, which is clearly good for employment. My hon. Friend said that every Department would have to carry out an exercise on compliance costs. May we be assured that the results of that exercise will be published on the face of Bills and regulations? The House as well as Ministers should understand the cost of regulations that are being introduced.

Mr. Moore: I am not sure that publishing all attempts at achieving a more effective cost analysis within Departments with every proposal is necessarily the best way of ensuring that the proposal sees the light of day. However, I shall consider the point that my hon. Friend makes.

Mr. Ian Wrigglesworth (Stockton, South): I welcome any effort by the Government to remove burdens on businesses, but is the Minister aware that many people will be puzzled about why it has taken the Government six years to take the initiative that he has announced this afternoon? If he is serious when he says that essential protection for workers, consumers and the general public must be mantained, will he explain how the essential protection for workers will be maintained in view of the proposed changes affecting wages councils, particularly in respect of statutory sick pay and improving industrial tribunal procedures?

Mr. Moore: The answer to that part of the hon. Gentleman's question concerning the time involved is that the Prime Minister, in August of last year, in response to suggestions from the Department of Trade and Industry that there was considerable concern about the pressure of regulations on businesses, set up a committee which reported to the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry in March 1985, and in the three and a half months since that date the White Paper has been produced. I should have thought that, in Government terms, that was very fast indeed.

I feel sure that the hon. Gentleman would wish to address his other questions about wages councils and protection to the Secretary of State for Employment. I urge him to look with care at the section in the White Paper which relates to sickness pay, because the position and rights of workers, as dealt with in the White Paper, are carefully protected while the issue goes for further consultation.

Mr. W. Benyon (Milton Keynes): I draw my hon. Friend's attention to paragraph 3.15 of the White Paper. If it is true that the deregulation of new rents is beneficial to employment, why should it not be done now, by backing the legislation that my hon. Friend is to introduce?

Mr. Moore: My hon. Friend's voice will obviously be added to the pressures which the Government always bear in mind when trying to decide at what point to do those things that they consider it right to do.

Mr. Stuart Randall (Kingston upon Hull, West): What consultation did the Minister have with the various employees' organisations, including the trade unions, and to what extent will employees be represented on the Central Task Force?

Mr. Moore: My noble Friend said in his statement in another place about the "Burdens on Business" study that an invitation had gone out to all in the outside world to give advice and to make a contribution. To the extent to which they did that, or ignored that advice, I cannot force trade unions or any organisations to contribute to any debate. The report has benefited from considerable outside debate.

I cannot specifically say who will be in the task force, but it will be composed essentially of civil servants and some people from outside the Civil Service. I shall address my hon. Friend's point about representative employees as opposed to small businesses to my noble Friend in the other place.

Mr. Michael Howard (Folkestone and Hythe): I welcome the White Paper's proposals as they affect the operation of the planning system. Does my hon. Friend agree that the balance which the planning system exists to strike is not identical in a period of relatively high unemployment as in a period of relatively full employment? Does he share my hope that the White Paper's proposals will lead to increased recognition of this fact by local planning authorities?

Mr. Moore: I particularly welcome that point. I should have thought that all who were concerned about unemployment would seek to make that point. I draw my hon. and learned Friend's attention to paragraph 3.13 on page 15 which states:

"the twin priorities of generating jobs and providing sufficient land for housing have not been reflected fully or quickly enough in structure plans and the planning decisions of local authorities."

We must ensure that this important point is put across in our debates.

Mr. Robin Maxwell-Hyslop (Tiverton): Will my hon. Friend ensure that a VAT inspector who examines the books of a business and finds that they are in order signs a statement to that effect so that another VAT inspector who disagrees with his findings cannot announce that he was wrong and try to collect many years of back duty?

Mr. Moore: My hon. Friend's suggestion seems on the surface to be so eminently sensible that I cannot see why I cannot simply say yes. I shall carefully consider his point and write to him about it.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield): Although I welcome the proposals in the White Paper as far as they go, does my hon. Friend accept that matters such as interest rates, energy costs, fair trading conditions and rates probably impose a greater burden on small businesses than any of the aspects to which the White Paper referred? Will my hon. Friend therefore direct the Treasury's attention to those matters? I welcome the planning proposals in the White Paper, especially as Carswells Transport Limited which has a head office in my constituency, is likely to have to make 600 people redundant because of a decision by the Tewkesbury district council.

Mr. Moore: I am glad that my hon. Friend has illustrated so graphically an aspect of the planning implications for jobs which might be in jeopardy. There are many aspects of business beyond the particular burdens imposed by administrative and legislative regulation. The White Paper addresses that problem. I am delighted to have my hon. Friend's support in our attempt to face these difficulties.

Sir Kenneth Lewis (Stamford and Spalding): As one who has been involved in a comparatively small business, I know that the White Paper will be warmly welcomed by people in business, provided that the Government get on with it. The White Paper states that the task force will be set up for three years. Will it really take three years? I hope that the task force will have something to show for its work if not this Guy Fawkes' day then by 5 November 1986. Will my hon. Friend take account of the fact that "Burdens on Business", which was issued by the Department of Trade and Industry, came out in March? The Cabinet task force should direct its attention to that report on which there has not yet been any action.

Mr. Moore: My hon. Friend will be delighted to know that this White Paper is the action that flows from the "Burdens on Business" report. I draw the attention of the House to the relative position of that three-year rule in relation to the task force. Paragraph 8.7 on page 35 states:

"In order to prevent the setting up of permanent machinery which may outlive its usefulness—and to serve as an example to others—the Government have decided that the life of the task force should be limited to about three years, in the first instance, at which stage there will be a review of its performance".

I reassure my hon. Friend that the three-year period has nothing to do with the desire to implement the actions in this document immediately.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): As it appears that my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary is about to establish a splendid platoon of civil servants——

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: Section.

Mr. Marlow: —section of civil servants to scrutinise any regulations that might threaten to drown our small businesses in a sea of paper work or to throttle them with red tape, will my hon. Friend say that, as the greatest threat to the life and sanity of any small business comes from regulations defined by the megabureaucrats in Brussels, those regulations will be subject to the same scrutiny by the same committee?

Mr. Moore: I know that my hon. Friend, who has been corrected on his infantry advice—10 is nearer a section than a platoon—will be pleased to look at paragraphs 6.1 and 6.2 on page 29. They bring out the ways in which the Government's initiatives in Brussels will ensure that the same type of unit is created there so that the same attempt is made to reduce the regulations and the excessive burdens on the bureaucrats. We have already pressed in Brussels for a review of all existing and proposed legislation and for the establishment of a permanent procedure to vet permanent and future proposals with respect to their impact on business.

The Government have undertaken a review and have put to the Commission and other member states an initial list of 40 directives or regulations which have been adopted or are in the pipeline and which we regard as excessively burdensome. My hon. Friend will be happy to know that action is already in train.

Mr. Tim Yeo (Suffolk, South): Is my hon. Friend aware that the White Paper is most welcome because, irrespective of individual items, its net effect will be to promote the creation of jobs, except perhaps for members of the Opposition Front Bench? I reiterate my concern that two of the most enticing measures—raising the VAT threshold, and deregulating new private lettings—do not have a timetable set for their implementation.

Mr. Moore: I thought that I had made clear the Government's strong position on the first matter. I recognise that my hon. Friend is adding to the support for both items to ensure that there is a greater sense of urgency.

Mr. Michael Hirst (Strathkelvin and Bearsden): Is my hon. Friend aware that one of the most irksome burdens on small businesses is the preparation and completion of quarterly VAT returns? When reviewing the VAT threshold, will my hon. Friend consider the possibility of smaller businesses paying VAT on an estimated basis during three quarters with full annual accounting once a year?

Mr. Moore: I shall certainly look carefully at that proposal.

Mr. Bowen Wells (Hertford and Stortford): Does my hon. Friend agree that the reaction of the Opposition Front Bench, especially of the hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair), reflects the fact that Labour Members do not understand how new jobs will be created through small businesses? Does that mean that the Labour party is basically unqualified to take office? Does my hon. Friend agree that any self-respecting business has long since ignored trivia, much of which is included in the White Paper, but welcomes their exemption? Will my hon. Friend pay attention in his Department to a long-seen need to simplify methods and encourage low interest rates to obtain venture capital for more small business start-ups?

Mr. Moore: I hear what my hon. Friend says in his latter point, but I know that he will welcome the extraordinary success of the business expansion scheme and the way in which many regard the opportunities available through the business expansion and loan guarantee schemes as being much more attractive than investing in many other parts of the world.

On my hon. Friend's first point, I can happily leave the absence of the Opposition's qualifications to the electorate.

Mr. Michael Fallon (Darlington): Is my hon. Friend aware that the White Paper will be warmly welcomed in the north-east where the biggest burdens on business are the Labour councils which frustrate planning applications, refuse to sell industrial land freehold and seem hell-bent on establishing business-free zones? Will my hon. Friend draw the attention of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor to the need to allow the industrial companies that want to expand the right to buy land freehold from public authorities?

Mr. Moore: I shall draw the attention of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor to that point. My hon. Friend is absolutely right. His description of business-free zones, in comparison with the attempt to introduce simplified planning zones, perfectly illustrates the difference between the Government's attempts to give practical help and the Opposition's posturing.

Mr. Henry Bellingham (Norfolk, North-West): Is my hon. Friend aware that many small businesses and entrepreneurs in west Norfolk will welcome these proposals? Obviously judgment cannot be passed until action is taken, and I urge the Government to get on and take that action. Is it not time that the small firm was totally exempted from the requirements of the annual audit?

Mr. Moore: In the White Paper, there is a reference to a discussion in relation to the potential exemption of the small firm from the annual audit. With regard to the first point, my right hon. and noble Friend in another place will be leading this activity within Government with his normal sense of aggression. I am sure that, through his leadership, we will have action in this area.

Mr. Roger Gale (Thanet, North): I welcome the broad thrust of the White Paper but notice that some Departments appear to have contributed rather more wholeheartedly than others to the work of Lord Young. I am sure that Thanet farmers will be pleased to know that > "The Agricultural Departments take action whenever possible to ease the burdens on agricultural, horticultural, fisheries and food sector businesses imposed by domestic legislation".

May we therefore look forward to the early abolition of the Potato Marketing Board?

Mr. Moore: I shall draw my hon. Friend's remarks about the Potato Marketing Board to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food.

Mr. Peter Thurnham (Bolton, North-East): Does my hon. Friend feel that this welcome White Paper goes far enough in helping to create new jobs? If he is suggesting that 1·6 million new jobs could be created, are we doing enough to get rid of Socialist red tape?

Mr. Moore: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. This is a first step, it is an important beginning, but it is a critical step in the long-term direction of removing the burdens which restrain business from creating new job opportunities.

Mr. Alan Howarth (Stratford-on-Avon): Is my hon. Friend aware of studies showing that in the United States a remarkably high proportion of existing businesses were originally started in their founders' homes? Will he comment on those findings? Does he agree that any measures that the Government may be able to take to make it easier for somebody to start a business in his or her own home in this country could be of significant benefit in reducing unemployment?

Mr. Moore: My hon. Friend is right about the American studies. I have some experience of that side of the Atlantic. He will be interested to know that the Government have considered this matter in the White Paper at pages 12 and 13 in section 3.6, paragraph (vii) (a), (b) and (c). I know that he will be particularly pleased with what the White Paper says on this issue.

Mr. Neil Hamilton (Tatton): I welcome my hon. Friend's spirited response to my hon. Friend the Member for Norfolk, North-West (Mr. Bellingham) when he said that he would put maximum pressure on Ministers to implement these proposals. Does he expect to get more co-operation from them on deregulation than the Treasury has had on containing public expenditure?

Mr. Moore: I shall try to ignore the potential twist in that tail and simply say that the product is here. There has clearly been a major effort by all Departments of Government to ensure that within three and a half months there is a comprehensive attempt to lift the burdens on business.

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough and Horncastle): Does my hon. Friend agree that rural unemployment is a particular problem, not so much because people in villages experience difficulty in finding jobs but because they have to go to towns to get them? This is in no small way due to the controls which central Government and local government have piled on village industry.

What will the task force be doing to encourage people to set up industries in their own homes, given that most new businesses are clean and efficient? In particular, will my hon. Friend encourage the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food to go rather further? According to paragraph 5.29, its only contribution so far has been to free "certain aspects of trade in cattle semen".

Mr. Moore: I think that my hon. Friend will know that the Ministry does go a little further. The planning regulations applicable to rural areas emanate in most cases from the Department of the Environment. I know that he will be pleased when he reads the White Paper with more care because he has argued so vigorously for many of the proposals in it. I will certainly press my right hon. Friend the Minister to consider what other contribution he can make to this aspect of deregulation.

Mr. James Hill (Southampton, Test): My hon. Friend has made great play of the deregulation side of the White Paper. Is he aware of my early-day motion on impediments to free ports? It concerns a series of regulations being brought forward by Customs and Excise, and, if ever there was a case for deregulation, it is within the free ports area.

Mr. Moore: I am aware of my hon. Friend's early-day motion. I will certainly examine that matter again with Customs and Excise.

Royal Assent

Mr. Speaker: I have to notify the House, in accordance with the Royal Assent Act 1967, that the Queen has signified Her Royal Assent to the following Acts:

1. Road Traffic (Production of Documents) Act 1985.
2. Gaming (Bingo) Act 1985.
3. Agricultural Training Board Act 1985.
4. Family Law (Scotland) Act 1985.
5. Prohibition of Female Circumcision Act 1985.
6. Controlled Drugs (Penalties) Act 1985.
7. Licensing (Amendment) Act 1985.
8. Copyright (Computer Software) Amendment Act 1985.
9. Hospital Complaints Procedure Act 1985.
10. Local Government (Access to Information) Act 1985.
11. Sexual Offences Act 1985.
12. Charter Trustees Act 1985.
13. Insurance (Fees) Act 1985.
14. Further Education Act 1985.
15. Food and Environment Protection Act 1985.
16. Surrogacy Arrangements Act 1985.
17. Representation of the People Act 1985.
18. Local Government Act 1985.
19. Royal Holloway and Bedford New College Act 1985.
20. Streatham Park Cemetery Act 1985.
21. Harrogate Stray Act 1985.
22. Alexandra Park and Palace Act 1985.
23. C-Poultry Company Limited Act 1985.
24. Plymouth Marine Events Base Act 1985.
25. Greater London Council (Money) Act 1985.

Lorries (GLC Ban)

Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody (Crewe and Nantwich): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I shall be grateful if you will confirm that it is impossible to discuss the arrogant bungling of the Secretary of State for Transport since he has appealed to the courts in the matter of the Greater London Council ban on lorries. Is that the case?

Mr. Speaker: That is the case. I understand that the right hon. Gentleman has lodged an appeal today so that the matter is sub judice.

BILL PRESENTED

International Fair Trading

Mr. Michael Latham, supported by Mr. Greville Janner, Mr. Peter Thomas, Mr. Robert C. Brown, Mr. Geraint Howells, Mr. Ian Wrigglesworth, Mr. Roy Beggs, Sir Geoffrey Finsberg, Mr. Ian Mikardo, Mr. Ivan Lawrence, Dr. M. S. Miller and Sir John Biggs-Davison, presented a Bill to make further provision regarding fair international trade between the United Kingdom and certain countries outside Her Majesty's dominions, with particular reference to the trade boycott of the state of Isreal by members of the League of Arab States: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Friday and to be printed. [Bill 194.]

STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS, &c.

Ordered,

That the Inshore Fishing (Prohibition of Fishing and Fishing Methods) (Scotland) Order 1985 (S.I., 1985, No. 962) be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c. —[Mr. Durant.]

Rent Acts (Amendment)

4.26 pm

Mr. Francis Maude (Warwickshire, North): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to amend the Rent Acts to make new provision in relation to the supply of private rented accommodation.

I hesitate to suggest new legislation in view of the horrifying list that we have just heard you read out, Mr. Speaker. It is already a very complicated Session. I am sure that the House will be glad to know that there is very little prospect of this measure reaching the statute book in this Session.

We have in this country a substantial net housing surplus, but at the same time a large number of people are homeless. The explanation for this apparent paradox is quite simple. Enormous numbers of houses and flats remain empty. A trip down the high street of any town will reveal that a number of flats above shops are generally empty. Unless the shopkeeper lives in the flat, it will generally be empty. The same applies to farm cottages. I know of one farm which has 12 cottages, all of which are empty. In London alone there are estimated to be 200,000 empty dwellings.

We have to ask ourselves why they are kept empty. If one examines the Rent Acts, the explanation becomes quite simple. If a landlord allows a tenancy to occur in any of those dwellings, he runs the risk of losing control of the dwelling for up to 100 years because not only will the present tenant have absolute security of tenure but so, too, will two generations of successors. A small business man, a shopkeeper or a farmer does not know what the state of his business will be in two years' time, let alone in 100 years' time. How on earth can he justify ceding possession and control of the property in that way? The farmer may easily decide in two years' time that he wants possession of a farm cottage. If he wants to take on an extra employee, he must have that accommodation available. Therefore, he keeps the dwelling empty, and another homeless person is kept homeless.

Even if he allows a tenancy to occur, a state official is empowered to intervene to set a so-called fair rent. Fair rents throughout the country now represent a net yield of some 1 or 2 per cent. on the investment. That is a bad return in anybody's book. It is approximately one third of the market rent, and it goes a long way to explain why a number of private landlords allow their properties to become dilapidated and to fall into bad repair.

My proposal would allow all new lettings to take place on terms agreed between the landlord and the tenant. It would affect no existing tenancies. All existing tenants would retain security and the ability to have their rents set by the rent officer.

Under my proposal, new landlords and tenants would be able to agree that the tenancy should run for, say, a period of two years at a rent agreed between the two of them. This would be an ordinary agreement enforceable in the courts by either party in the ordinary way, and the tenant would have absolute security of tenure for the period of that tenancy.

There is no reason why in a free society Parliament should take from responsible adults the power to make agreements on terms acceptable to both parties. It would be outrageous if we were to suggest that state officials should have the power to intervene between the buyer and seller of a house or a car and to say, "You cannot sell it for that price because it is not a fair price. You must sell it for this price." That would be monstrous. It is a concept that is quite alien in a free society. It is time that we got rid of this ridiculous control that prevents landlords and tenants making arrangements to their mutual advantage.

By drying up the supply of private rented accommodation, the Rent Acts have done untold damage to the homeless and the low paid, especially to the young and the single homeless for whom the private rented sector has traditionally provided accommodation. Indeed, the Labour party is now the only party—perhaps apart from the Communists and all points Left — that does not accept the need for reform of the Rent Acts. Even the late Mr. Anthony Crosland, the Minister who piloted through the 1974 Act, was apparently persuaded that it would dry up the supply of rented accommodation. How right he was. We are now reaping the fruit of that.

This artificially created housing shortage has desperately damaged the mobility in the labour market on which we so desperately rely. Many of my constituents in the west midlands have told me that they have found jobs in the south and south-east. They want to take those jobs but cannot move there because there are no houses to buy that they can afford, no chance of getting a council tenancy and no private rented accommodation to be had. We have lost that crucial flexibility in the housing market that is important for flexibility in the labour market. The result is that we maintain high levels of unemployment in some parts of the country while there is a growing scarcity of labour in others. That cannot make sense.

I am sure that some bright spark on the Labour Benches —[HON. MEMBERS: "Bright?"] I agree that the material is not promising, but I am sure that a Labour Member will raise the spectre of Rachmanism. But the fact is that the Rent Act created Rachmanism. That was at its peak in the 1950s when rents were frozen—eventually for 18 years —and absolute security applied. Rachmanism survived the 1957 Act only in the remaining controlled sector. The plain fact is that if we deny landlords the right to claim possession of their property through the courts the unscrupulous landlords will turn to alsatians and the scrupulous landlords will keep their dwellings empty. It will be the homeless who will suffer.

If lettings are made on terms agreed between the parties, so that the landlord gets a reasonable return on his investment and knows that at a fixed date he can obtain possession of the property, there is absolutely no incentive to go outside the law, and that would be extra protection for the tenant.

Someone else will no doubt mention the 1957 Act and the fact that the decline in the private rented sector increased after that. Of course it did, because that was a time of great growth in owner occupation when there were enormous incentives on landlords to sell previously rented accommodation into owner occupation. That no longer applies to the same extent, and anyone who does not believe that the decontrol of rents will stimulate the growth of new accommodation is living in cloud-cuckoo-land.

One of the effects of rent control and security of tenure has been to push many tenants into "loophole" tenures — company lets, holiday lets and licences. That is unsatisfactory for both parties. The tenant does not know where he stands. It would be much better if he could agree a tenancy with the landlord for a fixed term at a fixed rent so that he knows where he stands for that period.

Similarly, by denying landlords an economic return on the property, rent controls have caused a large number of properties to fall into disrepair. They have discouraged landlords from improving property. By allowing them an economic return, we shall enable the tenants to benefit by encouraging landlords to improve and repair properties.

The Government took a small and timid step by introducing the shorthold tenure. They spoilt that potentially beneficial measure by including it within the fair rented sector. Again, landlords were discouraged from embarking on letting new properties. We must go further than that. The Government also introduced assured tenancies, a marginal measure that could be improved and increased by extending it to rehabilitated property. That would be particularly helpful in the inner cities.

It should be recognised that the decontrol of new lettings would increase incentives on landlords to remove tenants to enable them to create other new lettings. Therefore, my Bill would substantially increase the penalties for harassment. It would also extend to licensees the Protection from Eviction Act, and that would fill an existing gap.

The Government have announced that they believe that this type of reform is essential, and the White Paper that has just been issued confirms that. However, they said that they propose to defer this essential reform until after the next election. This is a desperately needed and urgent social reform. The present system does untold damage to mobility, to the homeless, to the weak and to the vulnerable. The Government should reinstate this measure into the next Session of Parliament and make it the flagship of the next Queen's Speech. It should be given a high priority. The remedy for the present scandal of empty houses and homeless people lies within the power of this Parliament, and we should take steps to use it. I urge the Government to add rent control to the bonfire of controls that has just been announced, and the sooner the better.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North) rose——

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. Gentleman seeking to oppose?

Mr. Winnick: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

The first question to ask is why Tory Back Benchers use the ten-minute Bill procedure to argue for a change in law on the Rent Acts? After all, their Government are in office. Moreover, they are a Right-wing Tory Administration who have made a particular virtue of deregulation and privatisation. Surely the Prime Minister needs no lectures from the hon. Member for Warwickshire, North (Mr. Maude) about deregulation in the privately rented sector, yet the Cabinet has decided to shelve any such proposal during the lifetime of this Parliament—[Interruption.] The Secretary of State for the Environment has told us so, and if some Conservative Members bothered to come into the Chamber more regularly they would have heard the Secretary of State do so.

That statement caused much upset to the Minister for Housing and Construction, the hon. Member for

[Mr. Winnick]

Eastbourne (Mr. Gow), who is just as enthusiastic as the hon. Member for Warwickshire, North (Mr. Maude), but the Minister lost the battle.

Why has the Cabinet concluded that it will not act, at least during the lifetime of this Parliament, along the lines advocated in the proposed Bill? The simple explanation is that the Prime Minister and her Cabinet colleagues know how electorally unpopular it would be to accept the hon. Gentleman's suggestion. They have not forgotten the notorious Rent Act 1957. When the hon. Member for Warwickshire, North, like so many others, argues that deregulation would produce more rented accommodation, he should remember what the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) said in 1956. The right hon. Gentleman was then a junior housing Minister in a Conservative Administration, and on 21 November 1956, when he was helping to pilot through what became the Rent Act 1957, he said that the Bill

"will halt the drain upon rented accommodation, it will release additional accommodation that is under-used or wasted, it will arrest the deterioration of millions of houses for lack of maintenance, and it will give to persons who are moving or setting up home the opportunity to find accommodation in the market."

They were virtually identical to the words used by the hon. Member for Warwickshire, North today. However, things did not quite work out that way.

In June 1956 privately rented dwellings numbered nearly 6·5 million. In December 1961 that figure had decreased to 5 million. The Rent Act 1957 did not do what the hon. Gentleman says his present Bill will do. It did, however, create a tremendous amount of homelessness, misery and injustice. As a result of that Act a large number of people lost their homes. The local authorities, including the one of which I was then a member, had no alternative but to rehouse the people forced out by the 1957 Act. That Act will always be remembered for the injustice and misery it caused, and we on the Labour side have no intention of forgetting it.

Shocking abuse and injustice, which became known as Rachmanism, were the product of that Act. Rachman and his gangster colleagues acted as they did because they knew that if they could dislodge from his accommodation a tenant who had Rent Act protection that accommodation would then be available for letting at any rent that Rachman and his colleagues wanted to set. The 1957 Act became so discredited that when the Conservative party went into opposition in 1964 it could not bring itself to argue against the Labour Government's repeal of the legislation.

That Act of course was a large issue in the 1964 election campaign, and some people would argue, bearing in mind Labour's majority in that election, that Labour would not have won without the effects of that Act. That is one of the reasons why the Prime Minister is so reluctant to act. In her constituency about 20 per cent. of the electorate live in privately rented accommodation. I wonder how many people in Finchley would want the hon. Gentleman's Bill? [Interruption.]

Hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. It is for me to say "Order."

Mr. Eric Heffer (Liverpool, Walton): About time too, Mr. Speaker, with all due respect.

Mr. Winnick: We know that many Conservative Members——

Mr. Nicholas Baker (Dorset, North): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The speech by the hon. Gentleman is giving rise to some lack of attention on the part of many people in the House. That is because he does not seem to be addressing his remarks to the substance of the Bill.

Mr. Speaker: I am listening very carefully. The hon. Gentleman is in order and I think that he is about to finish.

Mr. Winnick: A number of right hon. and hon. Members clearly have property interests, though I am not suggesting that the hon. Gentleman has. They are therefore very keen to support the measure proposed by their hon. Friend.

Shorthold tenancies, about which the Government boasted at the time, have been a complete failure. So have the other provisions that the Government made for deregulation. The real need at the moment is not what the hon. Gentleman is suggesting but to provide rented accommodation in the publicly rented sector. How many people now in bed-and-breakfast accommodation and homeless or near homeless would be helped if the hon. Gentleman's suggestion were implemented? What is needed by people who are not able to obtain a mortgage is decent and adequate accommodation at a rent that they can afford.

It is a scandal that so few dwellings are now being built in the public sector. In the present year, it is estimated that no more than 30,000 new council dwellings will be built. We need more council dwellings, not another 1957 Rent Act, not another provision to enable the Rachmans of this world to make a lot of money. We require public sector and voluntary accommodation for people who desperately need housing. I hope the House will reject the Bill, and I hope also that the country will discover, as we have discovered today, that a majority of Tory Members of Parliament are willing to impose on many private tenants who now have protection all the harm, insecurity and possible homelessness that would result from the passing of this Bill.

Question put, pursuant to Standing Order No. 15 (Motions for leave to bring in Bills and nomination of Select Committees at commencement of public business):——

Rate Support Grant (England)

4.58 pm

The Minister for Local Government (Mr. Kenneth Baker): I beg to move,

That the Rate Support Grant Supplementary Report (England) (No. 3) 1982/83 (House of Commons Paper No. 504), which was laid before this House on 11th July, be approved.

It may be for the convenience of the House if we discuss at the same time the following motion:

That the Rate Support Grant Supplementary Report (England) 1985/86 (House of Commons Paper No. 478), which was laid before this House on 4th July, be approved.

This has already been an interesting day in local government terms. About an hour ago, Mr. Speaker, you announced that the Local Government Bill had received Royal Assent. This debate is not about that, but suffice it to say that many people hoped, and many more thought, that that event would never occur. Now that that Bill has become an Act, I hope that there will be co-operation by all councils to ensure a smooth transition to the new regime when the Greater London council and the six metropolitan counties come to an end at midnight on 31 March 1986.

We now have another debate on the rating system. Such debates often acquire the nature of seminars. I believe that Mr. Edward Pearce referred in the Daily Telegraph to the which characterises many parliamentary debates on rating matters. I shall try to avoid that verbal sludge.

"verbal sludge of municipal speak"

I should like to remind the House of something that Fowler said in his "Modern English Usage". I paraphrase slightly. [HON. MEMBERS: "Norman Fowler?"] No, the other Fowler. He provided a classic description of the split infinitive, which can be applied to the rate support grant system. The English speaking world may be divided into those who neither know nor care how the rate support grant system operates, those who do not know but care very much, those who know and condemn, those who know and approve, and those who know and distinguish. As Fowler said:

"Those who neither know nor care are the vast majority, and are a happy folk to be envied by the minority classes."

It is those who do not know but care very much with whom I feel the greatest affinity. The rate support grant system is fiendishly complicated, and of crucial importance to all of us, for it is responsible for distributing and redistributing vast sums of ratepayers' and taxpayers' hard-earned money.

I should like to make it clear that this debate is not about 1986-87. My right hon. Friend will make an announcement about rate limitation for next year, and the Government's provisional proposals for the 1986-87 rate support grant settlement, before the House rises for the summer recess next week.

The House has before it today two supplementary RSG reports. We have the first report for the present financial year, 1985-86 and the final report for the year 1982-83. This is, therefore, an occasion when we can review the total of local authority spending, the Government's policy on this, and the success of rate capping.

I remind the House of the long timetable that we are debating. Nearly one year ago, on 24 July, my right hon. Friend gave local authorities their provisional targets for the current year, 1985-86. Following consultation with local authority representatives last autumn, he announced on 11 December the RSG details, including the final targets and the holdback tariff. On 16 January the House approved the main RSG report for the current year.

The message is one of substantial success in the long campaign to contain the growth of local authority expenditure. The information we have so far is that 107 authorities are planning to spend £278 million in excess of the targets which the House approved in January. The overspend this time a year ago was three times greater —£848 million. Overall, authorities in England have not increased their spending in real terms in 1985-86. This has reversed a 20-year trend. In the 1960s, local authority current expenditure was rising at 3·7 per cent. per year above the rate of inflation, and in the 1970s it was rising at about 3 per cent. per year above the rate of inflation. This led Tony Crosland to go to Manchester city hall in 1976 and make his brave speech, "The Party is Over". For about 18 months the party was over, because the Chancellor of the Exchequer was nailed down by the International Monetary Fund.

When we came to office, we inherited a rising level of local authority expenditure. During the past six years that level has been contained to slightly less than 1 per cent. above the rate of inflation, and this year it will just about match the rate of inflation. In effect, local authorities this year are matching their expenditure to the annual rate of inflation. This cannot possibly be presented as creating a wasteland through savage and severe cuts in local authority expenditure.

As the overspend is down, average rate increases have been in single figures for the third successive year. The average general rate increase for 1985 was 7·4 per cent. Without rate capping, rate increases would have been far higher. If Labour councils in London had had their way, the total budgets of rate-capped London boroughs would have been at least £220 million higher. For the country as a whole, the figure is more like £330 million. This means that ratepayers in London have been saved £220 million and that ratepayers in the rest of the country have been saved £110 million.

Ratepayers in the rate-capped areas have enjoyed savings. For example, the average householder in Lambeth will pay £21 less on the local rates bill than last year and a staggering £185 less than the council would have demanded if it had not been rate capped. Twelve of the 18 rate-capped authorities have issued lower rate poundages this year than in 1984-85.

The high-spending councils have known all along—despite their rhetoric—that the expenditure levels and rate limits that we proposed required no savage cuts in jobs and services. Many of them have now said so openly and some authorities, such as the Greater London council, budgeted for a rate even below the level that we set.

Does the House recall the hysteria earlier this year and the claims that local authority expenditure would be slashed as a result of rate capping—slashed to such an extent that the very elements of civilised life would be undermined? In Islington the leader, Councillor Margaret Hodge, predicted that fixing the rate at its rate-capped level would mean an immediate loss of up to 1,000 jobs and severe cuts in services. A few days before Islington fixed its rate, the finance committee chairman, Councillor Wilson, said that it was perfectly possible to fix the legal rate without cutting jobs and services. Journalists employed in Islington's public relations department have complained strongly that they were asked to lie during a £200,000 campaign about the number of job and service cuts and that subsequent events have proved claims about cuts to be totally bogus. Public relations experts turning on their clients in this way is almost totally unprecedented and a little like the monkey biting the organ grinder.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): If the system has worked so well, will the Minister explain why an authority such as Haringey, which was rate capped, had an enormous rate rise and exceeded by more than any other authority its target and incurred a gross amount of penalty? Why does the right hon. Gentleman's system produce such amazing distortions and aberrations? If he were less selective in his quotation of authorities, the system would be seen to be far more of a hit-and-miss affair and not nearly as effective at reducing local government expenditure as he thought it would be one year ago.

Mr. Baker: The hon. Gentleman will remember that at the last moment the district auditor told us and Haringey that there was likely to be a deficit on the previous financial year. Under local government law, that has to be recovered in this financial year, so we had to adjust the rate limit level for Haringey at the last minute.

Dr. John Cunningham (Copeland): I remember it well.

Mr. Baker: Like the hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham), I, too, remember the episode well. If we had not acted, the rate level in Haringey would have been much higher. The same is true for the hon. Gentleman's London borough, which is rate capped.

All of the authorities selected for rate limitation in 1985-86 have now set a rate. The campaign that was supposed to spearhead the Labour Opposition's fight against the Government whimpered to its end on 3 July, when Lambeth became the last of the rate-capped authorities to set a rate. The collapse of the rebel councils has been a triumph for the role of common sense. It has meant that, as promised, ratepayers in these areas are being protected from excessive spending.

Mr. Colin Moynihan (Lewisham, East): Is my right hon. Friend aware that, in a borough triply rate capped through the Greater London council, the Inner London education authority and Lewisham borough council, rate capping has brought welcome and popular relief? Is he further aware that in three recent council by-elections there have been substantial swings and overwhelming victory to the Conservative party in once safe Labour wards?

Mr. Baker: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for reminding the House that protecting the ratepayer is a popular policy which has its results in the ballot box.

The process of fixing a rate this year has been marred by scenes that are quite unacceptable in our free democratic society. We have seen gangs of thugs shouting from the gallery and taking over the council chamber. Mayors have refused to call in the police to restore order. Moderate Labour councillors and Conservative councillors have been physically threatened and assaulted. Mobs outside the town hall have prevented councillors from getting into the town hall. Fortunately, that is not characteric of local government. We have had flying pickets and all of the bullying antics of Scargillism. It is the highly organised brutality of the Fascist Left, and I hope that we will hear today from the Opposition Front Bench utter and complete condemnation of these tactics. I ask the Leader of the Opposition to repudiate those tactics and the illegality in Lambeth and Liverpool.

Lambeth and Liverpool, which set a rate on 14 June——

Mr. Eric S. Heffer (Liverpool, Walton) rose——

Mr. Baker: I shall give way in a moment.

Lambeth and Liverpool, which set a rate on 14 June, may pay a heavy price for their delaying tactics. The auditor is investigating losses in those two councils because of the delays in rate setting and has issued formal notices of surcharge to the councillors responsible. In that regard, the auditor is acting in his capacity as the watchdog of public expenditure. I wish to make it clear that the district auditor is completely independent of central Government, and has been since the office was established 150 years ago. That position has been accepted by Governments of both parties.

It is nonsense for Labour Members to talk of the auditor being the lackey of the Conservative party. They know that during the past 12 months the Audit Commission has published reports which have been highly critical of Government policy. Labour Members should reflect on Tony Crosland's statement:

> "I have no power to interfere with the work of the district auditor. In no circumstances would I dream of doing so."—[Official Report, 24 March 1975; Vol. 889, c. 62.]

I echo that statement. The auditor is equally independent now. All that I can do is to call on councillors in Lambeth and Liverpool to manage their finances properly and to prevent further losses from being incurred.

Mr. Heffer: The Minister referred to Liverpool and to some authorities where there had apparently been trouble, but I am not aware of that. Will he make it absolutely clear that there was no such trouble in Liverpool, that on no occasion did the police have to be brought in, and that no gangs invaded the city council?

Secondly, the right hon. Gentleman mentioned Liverpool and Lambeth in relation to district auditors. They were not the only local authorities which failed to set a rate on a particular day. Many other local authorities also failed to set a rate. Why have Lambeth and Liverpool been picked out by district auditors, and why have other local authorities not been tackled? Is it that some people—I am not sure who, because the Government say that they have nothing to do with district auditors — are attempting to suggest that those councils are led by loonies, whereas the others are not?

Mr. Baker: Lambeth and Liverpool do not have that unique distinction. On the hon. Gentleman's first point, I agree that rate setting in Liverpool was not marred by scenes of violence. However, rate setting in other councils, including some in London, was marred by unacceptable scenes of violence in which people were physically hurt. Pressure was applied to distort the democratic process. I am sure that the Opposition Front Bench will not sanction that. Secondly, it is up to the district auditor to decide what action to take. Lambeth and Liverpool were the last two authorities to fix a rate, and the hon. Gentleman could raise that point with the district auditor or the Audit Commission.

Some right hon. and hon. Members opposed the Rates Act 1984. They preferred to avert their gaze from a minority of local authorities' reckless disregard for public spending and their ratepayers. A responsible Government, of any colour, cannot take such a detached attitude. We may regret the necessity to set ceilings on [redacted], but our responsibilities for public expenditure, and our concern to protect ratepayers, compelled us to act.

Liverpool's budget problems are of the council's making. It has ignored every opportunity to improve its grossly inefficient services and to bring down spending. It now looks to the Government for more taxpayers' money to bale it out. The council must think again. There is no question of the Government seeking to undo the rate support grant settlement approved by Parliament in January, to increase the city council's programmes at the expense of other authorities. The city council must find its own salvation. It has not helped itself by fixing a rate which it claims to be substantially less than is necessary to fund its budget. It must reduce its grossly inflated spending figure of £265 million. Each £1 million saved above the target increases its grant entitlement by £2 million. The city treasurer has already shown that £10 million can be saved; and the council must go further.

If the council cannot balance its income and spending, it remains open for it to ask the courts to set aside the rate, thereby providing the council with the opportunity to set a new one. The central message to Liverpool city council and the representatives in the House of that great city is, "Face up to reality". If the council wants to maintain services and ensure that its staff are paid, it must put its finances in order.

Mr. Robert N. Wareing (Liverpool, West Derby): As the Government are anxious to cut public expenditure, or to keep it down to what they regard as a reasonable level, does the Minister agree that if Liverpool city council were to carry out the strictures of his Department it would have to dismiss thousands of workers and cut services? Has he estimated what the increased social benefits would cost the Department of Employment and the Department of Health and Social Security? Have the Government worked out the social cost of the policy in Liverpool and elsewhere? If they have not, they are failing in their declaimed objective.

Mr. Baker: I know that the hon. Gentleman is concerned about the matter because he represents parts of the city of Liverpool. If the city council had started to put its house in order a year or 18 months ago, it would not be in its present position. In a moment I shall point out some areas in which councils can make savings without slashing services.

Mr. Heffer: This is an important matter. Yesterday, when we met the Secretary of State and the Minister, I asked the Secretary of State whether, if Liverpool city council kept to the £222 million target suggested by the Government, it would mean cuts in services and up to 6,000 workers being thrown out of employment. He admitted that it would mean reductions in staff and that people would be thrown out of work. I remind the House that the area has one of the highest levels of unemployment.

Mr. Baker: As I said earlier, if Liverpool city council had started to address itself to its substantial overspending a year or 18 months ago, it would not be in its present position of demanding more Government money. If it receives more money, it will be at the expense of other local authorities which are living within the system. As the hon. Gentleman will know, the city treasurer has already made it clear in the report that was given to the city council last week that the present rate level can support a budget of £229 million.

Last year, some 60 per cent. of local authorities planned to meet their spending targets. This year, 74 per cent. are doing so. That is good news, but, inevitably, our attention is directed to the 107 authorities which, if the House approves the 1985-86 report tonight, will be subject to holdback this year. The holdback tariff is deliberately severe. It is a necessary complement to the realistic spending targets which we were able to set, thanks to the advent of rate capping. Realistic targets had to be matched by much tougher holdback. Sadly, as before, a comparatively small number of local authorities have ignored their ratepayers' interests and set their budgets and rates deliberately to incur holdback.

The total holdback this year is £550 million. The House should sympathise especially with ratepayers in the areas of seven authorities, which between them account for £250 million of the total block grant to be held back. They are Avon, Cleveland, Derbyshire, Nottinghamshire, Liverpool, Greater Manchester and the West Midlands. Of the total sum of £550 million, £491 million will be forfeited by Labour-controlled councils—that is 90 per cent. That is a clear sign that old habits die hard.

Holdback need not have been incurred. The choice is not simply between spending and cutting. There is no doubt that savings can be made if a council is determined to make them. Brent authority, for example, which is under minority Conservative control, saved £24 million in 1984-85 and is on course to saving £32 million in 1985-86. In achieving that, no one has been made redundant. It has been achieved through more realistic rents, efficiency savings and a careful review of all staff vacancies, but the authority has still been able to allow £2 million growth for redecoration for schools, which were neglected for 10 years under the previous Labour administration. It has also increased the amount spent on social services for the psychiatrically disturbed. That shows what can be achieved in a relatively short time when Conservatives take over and begin to reverse the legacy of Labour overspending.

Sir Dudley Smith (Warwick and Leamington): The vast majority of individual ratepayers would support what my right hon. Friend is saying and his theory that local government expenditure should not exceed the rate of inflation, but should be below it. However, the great problem is that the individual ratepayer is in the minority.

Mr. Baker: My hon. Friend is right, and this will be a central feature of the review of local government finance being conducted by me and by my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State. Our society is unique in that it has only one tax at local level, whereas all other developed countries have a variety of taxes. That single local tax bears an enormous burden, and one strain on it is that only about one third of the locally registered electors pay full rates.

Mr. Simon Hughes: Does the Minister accept that, despite the efforts of Brent, that authority, with three other Tory-controlled London authorities, will lose money by way of clawback? If an authority which the Minister commends must be penalised because it cannot reduce its expenditure further, does that not prove that the system is defective?

Mr. Baker: The hon. Gentleman is right, but I should say that Brent may not suffer any holdback if it continues to make savings similar to those that it has made during the past two years. I said earlier that this holdback could be suffered by local authorities. It is up to them to incur it or to make savings and tighten their belts slightly. Brent has made remarkable savings during the past two years, and I am told that it could continue to do so.

May I draw to the attention of the House the series of reports published by the Audit Commission to show how local authorities can make significant savings without a reduction in services. They could save £150 million a year if there was a better match between the number of places and the number of pupils in secondary schools. They could provide up to 20 per cent. more social services for the elderly within existing resources, and at the same time improve the quality of service to clients. Improved efficiency in vehicle fleet management could save £130 million a year without reducing standards of service or safety. They could save £20 million on refuse collection, £200 million on purchasing and £150 million on further education.

Wandsworth has made substantial savings in refuse collection. It charges its ratepayers £8·70 a year per head to empty their dustbins, whereas the ratepayers of Lambeth, which sticks to the traditional, union-dominated system, must fork out £17·58 each a year. Wandsworth has saved £25 million as a result of privatising its services, and one can see the result. The borough rate is 30·7p, whereas neighbouring Labour-controlled Lambeth—which has a similar population and social characteristics — sets a borough rate of 107·6p. Wandsworth, whose population problems are similar to those of Lambeth, makes do with 5,700 council employees, while Lambeth requires more than 10,000.

There is scope for worthwhile savings, all of which can be achieved by applying good practice more widely. Such good practice is already a way of life in many local authorities.

Mr. Peter Pike (Burnley): The Minister compares Wandsworth with Lambeth. When I stay in London, I reside on the border of the two boroughs. What the Minister did not say was that the collection of refuse in Wandsworth is so appalling that I would rather pay a higher rate for a better service in Lambeth.

Mr. Baker: I understand that the hon. Gentleman lives in Wandsworth——

Mr. Pike: Yes.

Mr. Baker: How lucky he is. He has the benefit of low rates and good services.

As I said to the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes), savings can still be made by authorities which face holdback. It is not too late to make savings. Grant holdback on the basis of budgets in this report can be returned if spending turns out to be lower. For example, if Liverpool spent £10 million less than its present budget, it could reclaim £22 million worth of grant. I urge all authorities in this position to reconsider the matter, in their ratepayers' interests.

Why should one authority spend £126 per pupil on school cleaning when another can manage with £31? Why does one council service its vans every 600 miles when identical vans can go twice as far between services elsewhere? How can it possibly be right that some vehicles go for fewer than 10 miles between services? If one authority spends £7·30 on meals on wheels to the elderly, why does another spend only £1·30? [HON. MEMBERS: "Because the quality is lower."]. If Labour Members would read the Audit Commission's reports, which I know will be unpalatable to them, they will see that the variation in the provision of services does not reflect the variation in costs. It is in the interests of all councils—whether Labour-controlled, Conservative-controlled or hung—to find ways of saving money.

Dr. John Cunningham: The Minister talks about efficiency. The Opposition welcome all attempts by local authorities to use precious public resources effectively. Since he is quoting from the Audit Commission reports, may I draw his attention to the two major reports—one on block grant distribution and the other on capital investment under the Government's financial system? The latter states:

> "The Commission believes that the systems have contributed to wasteful investment by a combination of delays to worthwhile projects, pressure to spend before the year end, failure to plan ahead and abrupt curbs in programmes" as a result of Government policy.

The report on the block grant distribution states:

> "The uncertainties associated with the present arrangements for distributing Block Grant to local authorities are now leading to higher rates than are necessary."

Are they not damning criticisms of the Government's policy?

Mr. Baker: I am glad that the hon. Gentleman has reaffirmed that the Audit Commission is not the poodle of the Government — [HON. MEMBERS: "Answer the question."] I am about to answer the hon. Gentleman's point. I must ask him to await next week's statement on the block grant system for the future. As to capital control, we are examining, with the local authority associations, ways to improve the system, which everyone recognises is imperfect.

Dr. Cunningham: Is that it?

Mr. Baker: That is the answer.

The third supplementary report for 1982-83, which is also before the House, is intended to be the last supplementary report for that year to close the books. I should say that 1982-83 was only the second year of the block grant arrangements. There is no change in the total of block grant payable to authorities, but there are changes within the total for all authorities.

I should also refer to what has become known as the housing grant-related expenditure anomaly for that year. This matter has a comparatively long history, and I apologise for the complexity of my explanation. There was an error in the main rate support grant report for 1982 in the specification of the GREA on some items of housing expenditure. It was discussed with local authority representatives in the summer and autumn of 1982. It was agreed that the first supplementary report for 1982-83, made in December 1982, should incorporate a disregard to ensure that no local authority could incur holdback as a result of the understatement of its GREA in that year. The treatment of the anomaly has been maintained in successive supplementary reports.

[Mr. Baker]

My right hon. Friend considered carefully whether he should correct the anomaly in his final report. After listening to the representations of the local authorities, as he does on all matters — they were divided in their views, as those who follow the matter will know — he concluded that it would be unreasonable now, in the course of the year, to alter the basis set in 1982, on which local authorities have made their 1985-86 budget and rating decisions.

I now return briefly to the supplementary report of 1985-86.

Mr. Robin Maxwell-Hyslop (Tiverton): Before my right hon. Friend concludes, will he consider a very important point? Of course there was not agreement among the local authorities, because £36 million was being filched from the counties and given to other areas of the country. Of course there will not be agreement between those who benefit from an error and those who lose from it. Why was it not put right in the main GREA formula, so that the shire counties would not continue to suffer in their GREA assessment from having £36 million filched from them? It is not good enough to say that there is not agreement when some benefit from the mistake and some do not. Once a mistake is located, it must be put right immediately and not continued.

Mr. Baker: It was an error relating only to 1982-83 and has not been continued subsequently. That is an important point. It is not a cumulative error. The error, which relates only to 1982-83, can be taken into account in later years.

There is a limited pool in the grant to be distributed, and if it is to be given to some it has to be taken away from others. We thought that on balance we had come to the right conclusion in leaving it where it was. We shall listen to the arguments, but there are arguments on both sides. I note what my hon. Friend said.

In conclusion, I return briefly to the main report that is before us. I am sure that Labour Members will represent the holdback schedule as harsh and draconian, and I agree that we have had to make some tough decisions, but I re-emphasis the point that I have made twice before in my speech. The decision to incur holdback is not a Government decision, but is taken by those authorities which determine to exceed the Government's expenditure guidelines. High-spending councils have only themselves to blame. I remind the House that 74 per cent. of the councils this year, compared with 60 per cent. last year, are operating within targets.

We hear a great deal about caring Labour authorities. Where is the evidence that they care for their ratepayers, when they deliberately push up rates by their flagrant over-spending? I have indicated in my speech various ways, identified by the Audit Commission, in which savings can be made, through good management and moderation.

Mr. Christopher Chope (Southampton, Itchen): My right hon. Friend made an eloquent plea to local authorities to obtain better value for money. Does he feel that the time has come when we should be thinking in terms of compulsory competitive tendering for all local authorities which are not doing so voluntarily?

Mr. Baker: My hon. Friend made a very distinguished contribution, when he was the leader of Wandsworth council, to the privatisation of local authority services. He will know that we published a consultative document, and we are receiving comments upon it. When they have been collated, we shall come forward with proposals on the subject.

One of the Audit Commission reports showed that, whereas some services which had not been privatised were as efficient as those which had been privatised, every council which had privatised its refuse collection made significant cost savings. That is very convincing evidence.

I say to the high spenders that, even at this late hour, it is not too late for them to pull back and avoid the worst consequences of holdback. If they will follow the example of the sensible Conservative-controlled councils, there are savings to be made. This is the way to demonstrate a caring attitude—not by grand political gestures, but by sensible good housekeeping. The choice is not between high spending and cuts in services. The choice is between wasteful extravagance and responsible, accountable local government.

Dr. John Cunningham (Copeland): The House waited with interest and not a little amusement—at least on the Opposition Benches—for the Minister of State's speech. We were wondering whether his task in presenting the reports and recommending them to the House would mark a new phase in the Government's presentation of their case. Indeed, that was so. For almost 20 minutes of his speech, the Minister did not address himself to the reports.

We were interested to know whether we would be told that a public expenditure increase in real terms of 9·5 per cent. since 1979 was a virtue, and whether a reduction in rate support grant of 23·4 per cent. in real terms in the same period was a vice — or was it vice-versa? The Minister did not say.

Against that background, is the real reduction in local government expenditure since 1979 of 4·6 per cent. regarded by the Government as a success? Public expenditure has gone up dramatically. Local government expenditure has gone down. Were the assembled Tory Members — although there were not too many of them here today — [Interruption.] There are more Labour Members than Tories present, and there are twice as many Tories as Labour Members in the House of Commons. We wondered whether the assembled Tory Members were here to applaud real cuts. Were they here to applaud public expenditure being massively up or rate support grant being massively down?

One thing is clear. In spite of the Chancellor of the Exchequer's Brecon hangover speech, the Prime Minister was correct about rate support grant. There is no middle way for this Government with rate support grant. There is only one way for them — down, down, down; so far down that the total accumulated loss to councils in England in rate support grant alone since 1969 as a result of the Government's cuts is a staggering £16·14 billion.

In 1985-86 alone, the total grant is £3·8 billion lower than when Labour left office in 1979, and that is at 1985-86 prices. They are, indeed, real cuts, and cuts that hurt millions of people, as councils of all political persuasions are caught in the Government's financial vice —or perhaps one should say vices.

It is interesting that, when political argument runs low, the Tory party wheels out the rusty old artillery and flint-locks of political abuse to fill the gap.

Mr. Robert Atkins (South Ribble): What is wrong with abuse?

Dr. Cunningham: The reality is that councils of all political persuasions are suffering as a result of the Government's policies. The hon. Gentleman asked what is wrong with abuse. I think that it was Samuel Butler who once said,

"I do not mind lying but I hate inaccuracy."

The Minister of State was perhaps inwardly reflecting that he might have chosen more fertile ground for his leading role from the Front Bench. His right hon. Friend the Secretary of State recently made a speech in which he looked at public expenditure to the end of the century. That is real vision, I suppose—but I wonder. I suspect from his performance today, however, that the Minister of State has much more limited horizons in view—for example, perhaps the next Government reshuffle. Government policy has been presented as a success, although outside this House — and increasingly inside it, too, for that matter — fewer people than ever believe it to be so. Whatever the presentation, the reality is that in the two reports before us the Government's failures lie nakedly exposed.

The Local Government, Planning and Land Act 1980, which was introduced by a Conservative Government, places a duty on the Secretary of State to use the best information available to him to estimate the amount of grant to which each authority is entitled and to notify it. He is supposed to consult the local authorities. Yet today the House is asked to approve supplementary report (No. 3) for 1982-83, which is intended to close the books for that financial year. Everyone knows that, because of an error in the Department of the Environment on grant-related expenditure calculations, the shire counties and districts were deprived, as the hon. Member for Tiverton (Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop) rightly said, of £36 million. The mistake came to notice some considerable time ago but Ministers have constantly and consistently refused to correct it. It is described euphemistically in paragraph 15 of the report as an "anomaly". I think that the Minister used that word himself. How many millions of pounds must be involved before an anomaly becomes an error under this Administration?

The refusal to face facts, which is typical of the Government, illustrates the hollowness of Ministers' consistent promises to help especially the shire counties. The Government's error has been hidden away despite repeated representations. Ironically, it benefits many of the London boroughs that Tories most dislike at the expense of the counties, which many of them pretend to prefer to support and represent. The hollow claims in respect of the Berkshire factor were quickly disposed of earlier in the year and the Government's GRE error demonstrates once again their inherent weakness on these issues.

Do Conservative Members really intend to vote for and approve the report when they are aware of the facts? They know that Ministers are ignoring their representations, their error and the standing agreement between the Department and local authority associations that such errors should be corrected before the books are closed on a financial year. If that is the Government's attitude—that is what it appears to be—it exemplifies that under this Government truth is the accident of error. The issue demonstrates above all the weakness of GRE as a means of determining grant. Such errors have even greater significance as GRE is used to set targets for council spending and ultimately to undermine local democracy through the Rates Act 1984, about which the Minister had much to say.

The Minister referred to violence, and the Opposition condemn all violence unequivocally. Violence has no place in a democratic community. Indeed, it is inimical to the entire democratic process. We defer to the Minister not one iota in our condemnation of unacceptable events over the past few months. But the Government cannot evade their responsibility for the social climate and for the attitudes that are often struck by the Prime Minister. Her aggression and uncaring attitude can be described only as provocative in the extreme.

Grant-related expenditure assessments are subjective and unfair, especially to metropolitan authorities as they take little account of the acute social problems existing in our urban areas. Over 70 per cent. of the members of the Association of Metropolitan Authorities, Conservative as well as Labour, are spending more than their GRE to cope with acute problems. They will be penalised even more harshly for such spending if, as has been rumoured, GRE is to become the new test that the Government will impose if targets and penalties are to be abolished.

The Audit Commission has told the Government that there is too much fine tuning by computers of inadequate basic data resulting in spurious accuracy and that the information used to calculate the needs for local authority services is open to serious question. When I intervened in the Minister's speech to put that to him, he said, "These matters are being considered". These matters have been well documented for a long time, but the Government persist in using their system, and the methodology associated with it, knowing that it is open to serious question.

It is the view of all local authority associations that the Government's system, and the GREs upon which it is based, is completely discredited. Yet if reports are to be believed, the Government are contemplating using that system when they scrap targets and penalising authorities solely on the GRE formula. We would reject such an approach, and I believe that it would be rejected overwhelmingly throughout local government.

The School of Advanced Urban Studies was commissioned by the Government to examine various matters and it concluded that GREs

"are inherently unsuitable to form the basis of legal limits on local spending."

That has implications for the implementation of the Rates Act as well as for setting targets for local authority expenditure. Even the Government, in their published document, which is in the Library, admit that GREs are intended to be an objective assessment of the need for spending based on independent indicators rather than the actual expenditure required for services. We reject the third supplementary report for 1982-83.

The supplementary report for 1985-86 raises many more serious objections. The total grant in 1985-86 was reduced by £660 million in real terms compared with the previous financial year. That meant that a significantly smaller pool was available to all councils. Although councils' budgets in total are only about 1·3 per cent. over proposed expenditure, grant penalties are the most severe yet. As the Minister has said, they total £550 million or 6·5 per cent. of total block grant. That illustrates the major

[Dr. Cunningham]

Treasury windfall gain from penalties imposed on councils by the Government's financial arrangements. In reality the penalties are twice the amount that is in dispute between the Department and the councils.

The Secretary of State has reputedly refused to limit the impact of the Government's system, as he could have done by disregarding expenditure by councils that have been elected to tackle the problems of some of the most disadvantaged communities in areas such as those of time-expired urban programme projects or joint financed schemes. This approach has been urged on him again by local authority associations only very recently, but it has again been rejected.

The Secretary of State has agreed to disregard expenditure on contributions to the Bradford fire disaster appeal. That sounds generous and it could be asked, "Who would disagree with that?" The irony is that Bradford council will lose £11·4 million in grant because of the severity of the penalty system that is being imposed upon it. It would be far more beneficial for Bradford if the Minister were to consider some of the disregards and got rid of the Government's iniquitous scheme than to agree a disregard for sums given to the disaster appeal, however worthy that appeal might be.

Penalties are likely to affect 107 councils. That is an illustration not of profligacy or irresponsibility, as the right hon. Gentleman implied, but of how unacceptable the Government's approach to local government finance is.

Mr. Robert Atkins: I have been listening to the hon. Gentleman with interest because he speaks with authority and sometimes with wisdom. Does he include in his remarks the borough of Tameside which has recently announced that it will spend about £300,000 a year of ratepayers' money exploring the voting records and other behaviour of north-west Tory Members of Parliament? Does he believe that that is a justified use of money? If it is not, should my right hon. Friend take action on it?

Dr. Cunningham: I can understand the hon. Gentleman being annoyed about such decisions. I have no difficulty with such matters because, unlike him and his right hon. Friend, I do not believe in central Government controlling local government expenditure, especially when it is raised through income. I do not believe that there is a sensible macroeconomic argument in favour of it. However, like the hon. Gentleman, I can identify items of expenditure by authorities that I might not support, but the Opposition have faith in the democratic system. We believe that in a plural democratic society the right way for the ratepayers—at Tameside or anywhere else—to resolve such problems is through the vote. The way to improve local government accountability is not to weaken local government and take away powers but to strengthen it—the obverse of what the Government have been doing for six years.

Mr. John Powley (Norwich, South): The hon. Gentleman might be surprised, but I agree with most of what he has just said. I agree with accountability and democracy. If he believes what he says about accountability, surely consideration should be given to those who foot the bill. In other words, the business and commercial ratepayer has no vote and no influence and therefore local government is not accountable to them. If he believes in democracy and accountability he must take account of the lack of accountability and democracy in the case of those who contribute more than those who vote and exercise their democratic will.

Dr. Cunningham: I am familiar with that curious argument. It has been raised many times by Conservative Members in the past two years. I am not sure what the hon. Gentleman was implying when he said that the business men have no vote. They have one vote like everyone else. We live in a system of universal suffrage. There is universal franchise. If he is suggesting that the system should be altered or tampered with, he should be explicit.

The Opposition have no intention of changing the system and we shall oppose any proposals from the Government that appear to do that—whether by giving people additional votes, imposing a tax on votes or on the right to vote through a poll tax, or by any other means. I reject the argument. I hope that I have made myself clear.

The 107 councils to which I was referring before those interventions are not deciding voluntarily, as the Minister of State implied, to spend money that they desperately need in clawback. They are not rushing into penalties willy nilly. The overwhelming majority are paying little in penalty, as he pointed out. They are not in that position out of choice. They are there despite improving their efficiency, despite using money from balances and despite rate increases, because they have decided to do their best to sustain the services and jobs—the quality as well as the range of services—wherever possible.

However, there is no disguising the fact that even many of the best managed councils have been faced with severe problems because of the cuts in rate support grant. That is most graphically spelled out by looking at an individual case. The Minister did that and I shall do the same. I should like to quote from a long letter from the Tory leader of Sefton borough council to the Secretary of State for the Environment. That gentleman pleaded for leniency for Sefton because, he said, Sefton was "staring a penalty in the face."

He continued:

"There is much work that needs to be done in Sefton."

I know that my hon. Friend the Member for Bootle (Mr. Roberts) would agree with that if he had not been unfortunately absent on House of Commons business with a Select Committee, because there are many major problems in the borough. Councillor Watson, the Tory leader of the council, continued:

"I am very concerned that Conservative Members on Sefton council feel that they have exhausted their capacity and indeed their desire to explain away rate increases . . . caused almost entirely as a result of adverse block grant movements."

That is the view of many other Tory local government leaders. He then said:

"Political support is ebbing away at an alarming rate."

There are hundreds of such examples in local government after six years of these policies. The latest evidence of the political debacle facing the Conservative party was demonstrated in this year's county council election results and, more recently, the Brecon and Radnor by-election. Not only have services been undermined and jobs squandered, but rates have been forced up as a direct result of Government policy. The right hon. Gentleman carefully quoted the average industrial and domestic rate increases for the current financial year. The Chartered Institute of Public Finance and Accountancy figures show an average domestic rate increase of 9·5 per cent. this year—shattering the Government's claims to be protecting ratepayers. Rates have now increased in real terms under this Government by more than 80 per cent. in six years. Rates fell in real terms by five per cent. under the previous Labour Government. Who governs in the ratepayers' interests?

In 1978-79, the average weekly rate payment in England and Wales, including water rate, was £3·19. After six years of those policies, it now stands at £8·27—two and a half times higher — under a Government who promised to abolish domestic rates and who pretend to protect the ratepayers.

Mr. Tony Favell (Stockport): Does the hon. Gentleman recognise that the Government have a duty not just to the ratepayer but to the taxpayer, because, after all, that is where the rate support grant comes from?

Dr. Cunningham: It is astonishing that the hon. Gentleman has not noticed, after all this time, what every Labour Member is now telling him, that it is not just the rates burden that has increased under the Government but the tax burden. The tax burden is much higher after six years of these policies than it was under the Labour Government.

There is now a certain amount of panic, no doubt with attempts by the Minister for Local Government to steady the ship. The Department of the Environment Ministers are apparently willing to contemplate a tax on the right to vote in a desperate attempt to escape responsibility for what the Government have been doing for the past six years. I reiterate that there can be no consensus for a poll tax. Will the Government, if they wish a consensus, as the Prime Minister suggested at the Scottish Tory party conference, publish a Green Paper on reform of local government finance?

The Government seem oblivious to the long-term damage that they have done to local democracy and good local government. They seem unconcerned by the diminution in the quality of the crucial services such as education, transport and housing. They seem unaware of the harm done to inner city communities, black and white, to families, children, the disabled and the elderly. As Shaw said:

> "The worst sin towards our fellow creatures is not to hate them, but to be indifferent to them: that's the essence of inhumanity."

The Government increasingly display indifference to the problems faced by millions of people.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels (Leicester, East): Can the hon. Gentleman square what he said with the experiences of the citizens of Leicester? They were told that, with rate capping, 25 per cent. of services would go, 800 jobs would be lost, community centres and swimming baths would be closed, and dustbins would not be emptied. Many tales of doom were told about what would happen. Now, under rate capping in Leicester, more jobs are being advertised, the council continues to operate, the rates are reduced and more people are coming to work in the city at a time when the council is spending £137,000 on an anti-rate capping political research unit. How can the hon. Gentleman say that the Conservative Government do not care when the business men of Leicester are taking on more people? Has not success come through the Government bringing rate capping to a city such as Leicester?

Dr. Cunningham: I am not sure whether the hon. Member was speaking in support of the policies of the Labour-controlled city council. He must be as aware as I am that the biggest single swing seen against the Conservative party in the county council elections was in Leicestershire. The hon. Gentleman would have lost his seat with such a swing in a general election. If he is interested in the reaction of voters to these policies, I suggest that he looks no further than the outcome of the county council elections in the county where his seat is located.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels: We have control.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: The hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) referred twice to the county council elections. If they were such a triumph for the Labour party, why did it end up controlling five fewer county councils at the end of the elections?

Dr. Cunningham: If the right hon. Gentleman wants me to digress into the county council elections and into the private grief of the Tory party, which was shattered in its strongholds, I can say this. The Labour party dramatically increased its share of the vote in the shires. The Tory party did not win back control of any of the 10 councils that we controlled when we went into the elections. It is true that we lost overall control of five such counties and it is true, I regret to say, that in some of them, thanks to Liberal collaboration, the Tories are administering the councils.

I regret that it is true in my council of Cumbria. I also regret that the Tories, with Liberal assistance, have started to implement cuts in budgets in Cumbria and, I understand, in Lancashire. However, the Tory party did not win control of any councils from the Labour party. If the right hon. Gentleman thinks that, he is deluding himself.

It is increasingly clear that the Government are not concerned about the people and their problems and do not feel responsible for the people and communities, and the country's problems. Therein lie the seeds of this Government's defeat. While Conservative Members may gloat about Royal Assent for the Bill to abolish the metropolitan councils and the GLC, their problems as a result of that appalling legislation are only just beginning. The Government have once again demonstrated, by draconian orders such as this, their invincible commitment to centralisation and control from Marsham street of the daily routines of each and every town hall in the country.

Once again, I say that the Government's policy is unacceptable to the Labour party. The past six years of Tory Government, and particularly the last two years of debate on local government, have convinced those Labour Members who still needed to be convinced—there were very few of them — that Ministers and officials in Whitehall simply cannot cope with the minutiae of local government, nor should they try. People elect local authorities to run local affairs and the evidence available to us from recent elections and opinion polls suggests that people favour more, not less, local independence from central Government.

For example, a report to the non-party constitutional reform centre shows that over half the people questioned in detail want some independence for their local council from central Government, and not less, but the Government have spent two precious years of parliamentary time enacting legislation — the Rates Act and the

Local Government (Interim Provisions) Act — and producing orders such as these that we are debating today that run counter to the increasingly popular will of the people.

We have necessarily spent this time pointing out the error of the Government's ways, frequently supported by the Government's Back Benchers, senior and junior, by the other Opposition parties, by the other place, by local government in all its shades, as well as by the public at large. It has been right and absolutely necessary for us to oppose that legislation, but now that the Government have apparently exhausted their miserable stock of malevolent attacks and ideas for local government we serve notice that we shall be talking about change under the the next Labour Government and about strengthening and enhancing the local democratic process.

The Labour party will be calling on all those who claim to care for the quality of the country's government to join us in debate. The debates will not be about the sterile attempts to abolish councils that support or oppose us, or about the arcane detail of financing individual services, which Ministers in the Department of the Environment are so pleased to be always nit-picking about, or about individual administrative areas. It will be about how to increase and improve democratic opportunities and performance in Britain in the future.

All this means a rethink about the role and function of local government and, for that matter, of the regional or strategic delivery and control of services, including some now run by appointed boards. It means the strengthening of local government and the enhancing of its powers and its role in the British economy. It does not mean the continual bleeding away of its freedom and strength, as has been happening since 1979, because we believe that it is only by strengthening local democracy that better performance and real accountability can come. Strengthened local government, with powers devolved from Whitehall, will make a major contribution to the vital and essential attack on unemployment in Britain, and strengthened support services and finance will be required to match up to the reality of full-time councillors.

On the other hand, the two reports are simply the latest in a long line of squalid impositions on local government, ratepayers and those who depend, often essentially, on local services. They offer a miserable prospect, and we reject them.

Mr. Gerald Bowden (Dulwich): I am delighted to be called in the debate so that I can convey the pride and pleasure that so many of my constituents feel at rate capping having taken effect in Southwark. When they find that their borough rates bill has been reduced by some 25 per cent. as a result of the Government's action, they are delighted. I offer their congratulations to the Government on that.

Southwark is a deprived area. It is an inner London area in which we know that there are great problems, but many of those problems are of the borough's own making. The hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) said that the worst sin was not to hate one's fellow men, but to be indifferent to them. Never have we seen a council which is more indifferent to the needs of people than Southwark in its present-day practice.

Southwark's greater failure is perhaps not just its indifference but its incompetence. We see its incompetence in its full flowering in its housing management. Here we have a borough with a housing stock of some 66,000 properties, but where 4,500 of those properties are left vacant and boarded up. Is that a way to care for the homeless? Is that how to show one's compassion to the homeless? That is an indictment of the way in which Southwark runs its housing.

Of those 4,500 vacant properties, some 1,500 have squatters in them. At a recent civic service the preacher drew attention to the fact that squatters were often more efficient at running Southwark housing than Southwark council itself. That was not a particularly spiritual message. Indeed, in the eyes of the leadership of Southwark council, it was regarded as distinctly heretical. However, the point was made that the squatters could manage housing for themselves in a better way than the council could.

Those vacant homes represent the loss of some £4 million to £5 million in rent. Is it the way to concern oneself with the careful management and housekeeping of the finances of the borough to forgo some £4 million to £5 million in rent on vacant voids? In addition to that, if that were not bad enough, rent arrears now amount to some £21 million, and £5·5 million of that is owed by former tenants. Is that a way to manage housing? Is that a way to exercise good housekeeping? Southwark can be indicted on that ground also.

It is against that background that we need to improve the way in which housing is managed in this borough, so that the benefit can be passed on to those in real need. The system demonstrates the indifference and incompetence of present housing management there. That is to cite but one aspect of the housing problem.

The aspiration of so many of my constituents in Dulwich has been towards home ownership. Those who have been council tenants for many years and who are now reaching retirement, having brought up their families in a family council home, and for whom the prospect of being a home owner never suggested itself as a reality in the past, have, as a result of the Housing and Building Control Act 1984, been enabled — in theory at least — to purchase their homes. However, since the Act has been in force —almost a year now—there have been few sales.

The powers that be in the town hall — the union bureaucracy—have attempted consistently to thwart the wishes, aspirations and hopes of prospective purchasers, by several different tactics. The latest and most dispiriting one for prospective purchasers is the law's delay. I speak as a quasi-lawyer. I recognise that there are sometimes necessary reasons for delay, but the way in which the legal department of Southwark council has delayed the preparation of the legal documents that are required for the transfer and conveyance of property is a scandal.

I am delighted to know that the Department of the Environment is to have meetings with the officers and members of Southwark council to see whether there is a way of speeding up the process, whether the council is so incompetent that it cannot find the appropriate form of words for its legal documentation, whether it should be helped, or whether the duty should be taken away from it. My constituents feel that the Government have offered them the opportunity, but the council has failed to see it through, and by its intransigence is attempting to thwart the tenants' applications to purchase their homes.

Mr. John Fraser (Norwood): Did the hon. Gentleman notice in the South London Press this morning that the ombudsman had upheld two complaints against the goody-goody council of Wandsworth for exactly the sort of delay that he is complaining about in Southwark?

Mr. Bowden: De minimis non curat lex. If there were only two complaints to the ombudsman in Wandsworth, that is remarkable. I shall show my colleague from Norwood the postbag that I have, which runs to several hundred letters from frustrated tenants who are trying to buy. Two seems a very small number. I would willingly settle for two in these circumstances.

Southwark council is unable to fulfil its job in its present role. The housing management problem is far too big for it. The opportunity to improve its finances and housekeeping by the sale of some of its properties, and to redress the unhealthy imbalance between local authority and private housing—there is some 70 per cent. local authority housing and 30 per cent. private housing in the borough — is not being seized. It is an unhealthy climate, in which local authority financing cannot operate effectively. We see the demands of heavy rating on the very limited number, the minority, who pay full rates—a mere 28 per cent. of the electorate.

It is against that background that my constituents welcome and applaud the fact that rate capping has been applied to Southwark. However, that is only a beginning. There is a need for greater impetus and direction in the operation of local authorities such as inner London boroughs in general, and Southwark and Lambeth in particular, to ensure that they fulfil their proper functions, exercise good housekeeping and use the resources that are available to them for the good of those whom they are there to serve. They are patently not doing that at the moment.

Mr. Robert Litherland (Manchester, Central): This debate is about local authorities endeavouring to meet their obligations under the Rates Act, along with the targets and penalties that are imposed upon them. At the same time, they are trying to meet the needs of the community and to act in the interests of their ratepayers.

My local authority of Manchester has endeavoured to protect and promote employment, and to improve and extend services for which it is responsible, in the light of the remorseless deterioration in the standard of living and conditions of Manchester residents. At the same time, the council is opposed to any large rate increases, recognising that excessive rates only add to the hardship of its residents.

A local authority such as Manchester, a major inner city area, needs only to look at the social and economic statistics of recent years to be aware of the downward spiral of urban deprivation. Manchester now has the highest level of urban deprivation outside inner London. Unemployment is higher than the national average. In 1978 the unemployment rate stood at just over 10 per cent. It is now over 23 per cent. Male unemployment in one part of my constituency is running at over 50 per cent.

About 20,000 jobs have been lost in the north-east area of Manchester since the late 1970s—4,000 in the last couple of years. While that has been going on, people in their thousands have been languishing on the housing waiting lists. More than 21,000 are now listed, and their chances of being housed grow weaker daily while the Tories are in power.

We in Manchester have over 6,000 unfit dwellings. Another 7,000 lack basic facilities and 58,000 are in need of renovation. Many of those are of the system-built rubbish variety which were foisted on local authorities by central Government. Massive finance will be required to try to save them or, better still, to demolish them. Many ministerial visitors have looked at that type of housing. They cry crocodile tears and say that they suffer from a design fault and require what they describe as a "repair element". That is nonsense, and they know in their hearts that a massive financial input from central Government will be required to put them right.

The unemployed and those in need of housing are only two of the groups affected by the rate support grant cuts. In addition, the city contains a concentration of deprived social groups, pensioners living alone — they now account for 17 per cent. of all households—and 51,300 single parents, and the number of residents claiming supplementary benefit has increased from 50,000 in 1980 to more than 81,000 in July 1984.

All those problems affect the provision of services. About 50 per cent. of schoolchildren are now receiving free school meals. Whether the services are for the unemployed, the homeless, the elderly in need of meals on wheels, the provision of home helps, day nursery places, cultural and recreational services, cleansing and environmental health, street lighting and road maintenance, all are vital and all fall within the responsibility of the local authority.

Despite that, the Government try to compare one authority with another and attempt to blanket coverage the lot. That cannot be done, because one cannot compare Manchester even with its sister city of Salford. Much less can Manchester be compared with Birmingham or, further afield, Torquay or Blackpool. Each local authority is different and has different needs.

Manchester believes in meeting those needs and in honouring its commitment to improve and expand its services. In its 1985-86 submissions for improvements in services, Manchester city council reckoned to spend an additional £33 million. That increase would have created 2,200 jobs, mainly among lower paid and manual workers. Staff would have been employed in old people's homes, in establishments caring for the mentally ill, in teaching and in the housing benefits sector. It would also have gone some way to restore some of the 6,000 city council jobs which have been lost, not to mention the many other jobs lost in the private sector.

To maintain services and jobs at existing levels, the city council will need to spend £276 million. The Government have set a target of £250 million. A £2 penalty for every £1 spent will mean the Government pocketing £53 million which should be used to provide jobs and services.

Mr. Favell: Will the hon. Gentleman explain why in Manchester, which is next door to Stockport—there is no grass between the two—and where there are twice the number of local government employees per head of population, there should be a downward spiral, whereas in Stockport the unemployment rate is down to less than 10 per cent.?

Mr. Litherland: The hon. Gentleman does not compare like with like. Manchester is a core city, with art galleries, museums and so on, all requiring money for their upkeep. When we last debated this subject I tried to explain the position to the hon. Gentleman, who invariably tries to make that comparison. We in Manchester have had a mass exodus of the more able, and those strong in wind and limb, into the suburbs, leaving in Manchester those with greater needs, including the elderly, mentally ill and young unemployed.

Our massive majority on the city council has arisen because the electors want what the council can provide, if given the chance. If the people of Manchester want the level of employment and services which the council wishes to provide, it is for them, the voters, to decide. Manchester wants to provide the services which the people want and for which they have voted.

Mr. Harry Cowans (Tyne Bridge): The hon. Member for Stockport (Mr. Favell) should accept that, by the inner city partnership, even the Government recognise the problems of cities such as Manchester and Newcastle. One problem is the tightly drawn boundaries, which condense those problems into smaller areas. In view of the lecture that he has received from my hon. Friend, the hon. Member for Stockport should accept that the difference between Labour and Conservative Members such as he is that we want to solve the problems, while they want to draw money away from local authorities. They claim that so long as the rates are low, the level of services does not matter.

Mr. Litherland: I am obliged to my hon. Friend for making the position abundantly clear. As he says, the inner city partnership recognises the differences and, as I have explained on many occasions to the hon. Member for Stockport, the type of comparison that he wants to make cannot be made.

Why do the Government and their Whitehall mercenaries think that they are better at costing and assessing the needs of local authorities, when central Government spending has increased by 100 per cent. since 1979, while local authority spending has fallen by 14 per cent. in real terms?

Rate support grant cuts in Manchester have amounted to £161 million in the last four years. All that cost must be borne by those of whom the Tories claim to be the champions, the ratepayers. Those cuts have been the primary cause of the massive rate increases that have occurred, with, in Manchester, the loss of more than 6,000 jobs.

The council has made representations to the Secretary of State to reconsider the harmful effects on Manchester and other local authorities of the Government's targets and penalties, with a plea for the restoration of the reduction in the level of grant paid to the city of Manchester. It is estimated that since 1979, against the growth in demand for services, the Government have reduced revenue support by more than £1 million a week.

Penalties and targets are applied unfairly. The result is that local government expenditure is by Government instruction. For example, under the housing benefit scheme, which was imposed on local government, authorities must meet all the residual costs, including the running of the local discretionary scheme to meet local needs. All of that expenditure is borne by local government. It should be financed by central Government. In other words, it should be taken out of the cost assessment and disregarded.

Manchester city council has produced a statement on the issues which it wants the Secretary of State to disregard. They include:

"(a) the full cost of projects assisted by Government grants or projects recognised by Government as priority initiatives including —the urban programme and UDG scheme.
—joint finance schemes with health authorities.
—European regional development fund projects.
—section 11 expenditure.
(b) the changes to advanced further education 'pooling' arrangements.
(c) the costs of operating a free school meals scheme.
(d) the cost of providing mandatory student awards".

On the subject of employment, the council said:

"Disregard should be introduced for the residual cost of YTS and other schemes together with all other expenditure designed to tackle unemployment, including grants, loans, rent guarantees, mortgages, estate development and infrastructure work for industrial development."

The council said that the cost of administering housing benefit should be disregarded. All the increased charges in the nationalised industries above the cost of inflation —for instance, water and electricity charges—should be disregarded, as should services outside local authority control, for example, magistrates court expenditure net of specific grant.

These issues should exercise the mind of the Secretary of State so that he gives Manchester and other local authorities a better deal. Until the Secretary of State understands the real difficulties facing local authorities in balancing their budgets, as they must do by law, and balancing the interests of the ratepayers against those of the community to whom they are responsible for providing services, we can expect more conflict as more councils refuse to accept cuts in jobs and services.

Next year, many local authorities will confront the Government. Next year is crunch year. The Government's policy is one not of compassion or care, but of political confrontation, which is meant to strip away every vestige of local democracy as long as local authorities oppose a centralised diktat.

The Government's attack is not just on Manchester, but is part and parcel of a national campaign directed at local government and the public sector. The aim is to starve local authorities of finance. To have a monetarist policy, one must have financial control. To obtain that control one must crush all forms of organised opposition, whether trade unions, local authorities, county councils or even opposition parties. This is the sinister path down which the Government are taking us. This is fully recognised in the speeches by the more responsible elements of the Tory party. They know that to use legislation to impose centralised control on local authorities and to ride roughshod over democratic rights is sinister and foreign to the old Conservative doctrines.

The Minister said that local government finance was fiendishly complex. The attacks on the most needy in our community have been more fiendish. The Minister asked for councils such as Liverpool to be condemned. The Government stand condemned for their confrontation of local government and their obscene policies towards it.

Mr. John Powley (Norwich, South): One quality in Parliament since the 1983 election has been the emergence of hon. Members with practical local government experience. I commend those Labour Members with experience of local government at a senior level. For the first time for many years many Conservative Members have had such experience. Whatever our political beliefs, that experience benefits the House. We may disagree about policies, but at least we are discussing them from a background of practical experience.

I shall mention my local government experience for the benefit of hon. Members. Although they may disagree with my views, I have seen service on a county council for 10 years and a district council for 12 years and was leader of a local authority. Many of my colleagues have had similar experience.

Whether in relation to local government or central Government expenditure, my basic philosophy is that we should not any more than is necessary tell other people how to spend their money. I prefer the individual to keep as much of his or her own money as possible. I prefer central Government taxation to be as reasonably low as possible, taking account of the need for certain public expenditure. The same applies to local government expenditure. Local authorities should allow the people within their areas, within the constraints of providing essential services, to keep as much of their money as possible. Some may say that that is a hackneyed Conservative policy, but it is my basic philosophy.

Some people take a different view. In central Government they think that they know best, that they should incur higher Government expenditure and tell people how their money should be spent. Many people associated with local government take the same view—that they know better how to spend the money of local ratepayers or business ratepayers. I do not subscribe to that view. I approach local government and central Government financial dealings on that basis. I am no better qualified than anyone else to spend other people's money. Invariably the individual ratepayer knows how to spend his money better than I or any other hon. Member.

Many years ago, the Labour party decided that the percentage given to a local authority in rate support grant should be decreased. That decision was correct. The Labour Government reduced the percentage——

Dr. Cunningham: As the hon. Gentleman has raised this red herring, I must tell him that, when the Labour party came to office, the level of RSG was 60·5 per cent. It increased for two years and then decreased to 61 per cent., remaining at that level for the last three years of the Labour Government. In every year that the Labour party was in office, the percentage of RSG was higher than in any one year of this Tory Administration.

Mr. Powley: A former Minister, Anthony Crosland, said, in referring to local government, that the party was over and that profligate spending would have to cease. As a follow-up Labour Ministers said that the percentage of grant given to local authorities should be reduced—they did not carry that policy all the way through—and that was a wise decision. It was wise also for the Conservative Government in 1979 to carry on that philosophy.

District and county councils and metropolitan authorities should be more responsible for the expenditure that they incur rather than put out a hand to the Government so that they might dole out the taxpayers' money to cover that expenditure. I firmly believe that he who pays the piper calls the tune. If one depends more and more on central Government for funds to run local government, central Government inevitably must have a greater say in local government expenditure.

Mr. Cowans: To hear the hon. Gentleman talk, one would think that central Government imposed nothing on local government. In fact, 148 Acts have been passed which impose financial spending on local authorities. The hon. Gentleman seems to be making a good case for his being neither in Parliament nor in local government if everybody knows better than he does.

Mr. Powley: I certainly do not pretend that I know better than anyone else. It is my philosophy that preferably individuals should have their own say, and I wish that they had more of it.

Central Government—and this has been recognised by Labour and Conservative Governments — have a responsibility for the effects of overall economic policy on the country. There is no question but that the level of rates in a local authority has a direct influence on inflation and on the well-being of the economy. Therefore, central Government must exercise that responsibility, and the Government are right to exercise control now on the general level of the economy. Indeed, the Labour Government between 1974 and 1979 exercised even more control over local government. Anybody who was in local government in that period, as I was, will know the constraints which were put on local government. The cuts in housing allocation, hospital building and many other services between 1974 and 1979 occurred because the Government had a responsibility for the economic effect of all spending, in particular local government spending.

I turn from the generality of my remarks to my area of East Anglia where there are considerable problems. I apologise for referring to the time when I was in local government, but one draws on one's own local government experience. In East Anglia, we suffered when regression analysis was put into operation. In general, it seemed that the sparse areas with increasing populations received fewer resources while those areas with declining populations, particularly the urban areas, received more resources. That appeared to be patently unfair. It had a disastrous effect in East Anglia. East Anglia is a fairly populous area — indeed it has a growing population. Here I am critical of my own Government, because, in my opinion, they have not sufficiently restored the effect of regression analysis.

In Cambridgeshire, in Suffolk, which is my old county, and in my county of Norfolk, there are three very efficient authorities which are traditionally low spending. Given the target and penalty system which has been in operation, of which I am critical, those authorities have suffered because of their efficiency and low spending. Where targets have been put into operation based on previous expenditure, which in many areas has been profligate expenditure, they have benefited. Where targets have been based on authorities whose expenditure generally has been much lower and more efficient, counties like Norfolk have suffered because of the system.

The efficiencies and economies of counties in East Anglia such as Norfolk must be taken into account more realistically to reflect the economies which they have made in the past so that they are not repeatedly penalised. There is a limit to the number of economies that can be made. Whatever criteria one takes, East Anglia has been economical. It has accepted the realities of financial discipline, and does not deserve to be penalised again for its economies while observing that the Government appear to be supporting authorities which have incurred increased expenditure and in which greater economies could have been made. I therefore make a plea for the abolition of the target and penalty system and for a greater recognition of the regression analysis as it initially operated.

In East Anglia one can also see the difference between the services of a county authority and those of a district authority. Norfolk has Norwich in its centre. Norfolk administers essential services such as education, fire and police, in all of which economies have been introduced. Norfolk does its best to privatise its services. It looks for more efficient ways of doing things and endeavours not to engage in profligate spending, which is to its credit. However, Norfolk, like many other shire counties with cities at their centre, observes a city like Norwich engaging in profligate and unnecessary spending. When my own district council of Norwich wastes money on promoting CND or other such oddities, although this is not the same scale of spending as that in which Norwich has to engage, Norfolk realises that it is being economical at the expense of another authority in its area which is profligate and wasting ratepayers' money. That is not good enough.

The Government, through their allocation system, must recognise that it is those district authorities like Norwich which engage in profligate spending which need to be penalised, at whatever level the spending happens to be, because they are getting away with it at the expense of counties like Norfolk which administer essential services.

Some way must be found in the rating system to remove business and commerce from the political element of rate fixing. I do not know the Government's view on this, but I believe that commerce and business should make a contribution to the services which an authority rightly needs and of which it rightly takes advantage such as the fire service, the police service and the security services. However, I do not believe that any business or commerce should make a contribution to the profligate spending patterns of other authorities in the area. There is no reason for business or commerce in the city of Norwich to contribute, say, to expenditure on CND, which my authority loves to support.

I believe that there are other elements to which business and commerce should not contribute, and these should be taken out of the district rate. High rates cost jobs. I know that this is disputed in some quarters, but I have no doubt that that is the case. I ran a small business in Cambridge for 24 years. I have talked to my colleagues, and I have my own experience on which to make a judgment. There is no doubt that high rates cost jobs. Local authorities must recognise — and unfortunately Norwich has a high unemployment problem — that an efficiently-run and low-rated local authority attracts business and commerce. There is no doubt in my mind but that that is the case. We want to attract business and commerce to my constituency, but that will not happen if the local authority levies too high a rate.

Rate capping has had the right effect. In the past, the ratepayers of Norwich were used to rate increases of 10 per cent., 15 per cent. or 20 per cent., but thanks to rate capping and the discipline placed on that authority, the increase can now be 4 per cent. or 5 per cent. or nothing at all. Rate capping has had the desired effect, at any rate in some areas.

In my area, the district council has moderated its expenditure. The past Lord Mayor, Councillor Leonard Stevenson, said that if the Rates Bill ever became law he would resign. That legislation has now become law and is having a good effect, rather than the disastrous effect that Councillor Stevenson predicted. However, he has not seen fit to resign, and that gives the lie to his integrity.

Norwich city council has a bad council housing record. It tried to resist the 1980 Act which gave local authority tenants the opportunity to buy their own homes if they wished to do so. A commissioner was put in to ensure that the authority complied with the law. Thankfully, it has seen some of the light in that it is now co-operating within the law and is selling local authority houses. However, Norwich's housing policy has not been good for the people of the area. The authority has been so inefficient that there are 600 empty council houses in the city. If the rent for each house is, say, £15 a week, and that is multiplied by 600, and then by 52, that will show the sums of money that are being wasted by the local authority simply by allowing 600 council houses to remain empty.

The local authority may argue that it has a very long waiting list—about 4,000 people, 3,000 of whom are single. But my own son is eligible to go on that waiting list, even though he lives at home and has no housing need. Therefore, waiting lists are not necessarily an indication of housing need within a local authority area. Any local authority can go a long way towards resolving its housing needs so long as it gets away from the idea that it can be resolved simply by building more and more council houses. That will never be the case.

Local authorities should look beyond the objective of owning as much of the property within their areas as possible. Instead, they should look to owner-occupation and to giving local people the freedom to choose. Our housing problem could then be resolved much more economically and efficiently and at less strain on ratepayers' and taxpayers' resources.

I hesitate to comment on Labour's alternatives. The Labour party does not believe in rate capping or in penalties. It believes in favourable treatment for Labour local authorities and in profligacy. Where will it all end? The Labour party knows that what it says cannot be put into operation. When it was in government it put those policies into operation and had to introduce economies.

The economies introduced by the present Government have resulted in a sounder basis on which local authorities can operate. I sincerely ask the Minister to look at the points that I have raised with regard to those local authorities that have operated economically.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): So predictable are the routines of the House that I have checked and discovered that we went through this ritual a year ago minus a day to the moment, and I was called to speak a year ago minus a day minus three minutes to the moment.

We are now at the time of year when we look back on what has happened to the Government's predictions, and today's debate takes us over the past electoral year. On this occasion, this is unusual for one reason. I have a feeling that the Government's defence of its case today is rather like the Government arguing the case for the nationalisation policies of the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn) before the European Court of Human Rights, because we are likely to hear next week that the Government do not believe in targets anyway and that they will change the system of finance. In other words, they will be putting forward a correction to a system that they can no longer support.

It will be recalled that when we met just before the summer recess last year there was on the horizon the first of the two reports of the Audit Commission. We had only the leaked document before us, and I do not blame the commission for that. I well remember the hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) and others—I think that I added to it—taunting the Secretary of State with the fact that it was likely that he would be criticised during the summer. The right hon. Gentleman made great play of the fact that the report was only a draft, but the substantive document was not all that different. It came out on 30 August and was critical of the system of setting expenditure assessments and target figures for local authorities under which if authorities overspent they would be penalised according to a rapidly escalating graph. That had bizarre implications, one of which was that some people ended up with nothing at all. It also meant that one penalised other authorities, often previously Tory-held shire counties, that were not overspending as much in the first place.

Last August, the Audit Commission, when reviewing the grant aid system for local authorities, came to the conclusion that major changes were now desirable. It found many things wrong with the system, such as unnecessary uncertainties and the fact that reserves had been built up unnecessarily. Perhaps most important of all, it came to the conclusion that:

"Because some information on local needs is often inadequate and that on local resources is out of date, serious distortions result . . . The introduction of targets partly related to past expenditure has encouraged some authorities to spend more to secure more grant, a perverse incentive which the present system was designed to avoid; and the gap between targets and grant related expenditure is generally widening."

No one suggests that the Government should not determine the amount of money available to local authorities. All Governments must retain that power. But the hon. Member for Norwich, South (Mr. Powley) will know that one of the criticisms of the present Government is that they have imposed far more rigorous restraints on local authority expenditure since 1979 than on national expenditure. That may be a criticism of their own public expenditure policy which the electorate does not seem to think is particularly appealing.

Although the two sets of figures are getting closer, it is clear that the Government have been seeking to screw down the local authorities—which deliver the front-line services—more than they have been able to screw down themselves.

Mr. Waldegrave: That is not really a fair point to make. Our 1979 manifesto, quite straightforwardly—it was repeated in our 1983 manifesto—gave a set of priorities. The priorities on which we were elected had at their centre defence, the Health Service and pensions, as protected programmes, and law and order. The principal services on which we promised growth happen to be in that category, but the principal service in which the client group has dramatically declined—education—happens to be a local authority service. That fully explains the discrepancy.

Mr. Hughes: A Labour Member has muttered to me that that is the Government's new line—that pensions and the Health Service will have more money and that everything else will suffer. I expect that in real terms that is true—[Interruption.] Of course that is true, but it is not satisfactory. Employees on my local health authority were told only the other day that 350 of them are likely to be laid off. That includes doctors, nurses, ancillary staff and specialists in Guy's hospital and in others. Clearly even that policy is not acceptable.

Last year, this debate was opened by the Secretary of State who is not here today because he is in Cabinet Committee. That, of course, is a perfectly valid reason. It may be that one of the things to be grappled with is how one replaces the present system by the system we are to hear about next week in a way which complies with the Government's general policy of continuing to screw down local government expenditure. He has had as much criticism about that over the past year from his own hon. Friends as he has had from the Opposition.

The second report of the Audit Commission issued on 2 April this year said something similar and reached the similar conclusion to the first. It was a report by an independent official on the operation of the rate support grant system. It said:

"The addition of a regime of targets and penalties unrelated to objectively assessed spending needs, but designed to restrain spending, has detracted still further from the original purposes of the system, to the point of making its sophistication worthless."

To show how worthless it is, I will take some examples.

The Minister will know that the Government's record of arguing that local expenditure should be cut and that the system is fair has failed abysmally to convince the electorate. I shall take two obvious examples. The first relates to parliamentary by-elections, of which there have been eight since the general election. The Tory vote has gone down in each of them. In six of the eight it has gone down by more than 10 per cent. The Labour party vote has gone down in four and up in four, but never by more than 10 per cent. either way. Our vote has gone up in seven, and in six of those it went up by over 10 per cent.

In county elections, local services were clearly what people were voting about. I do not want now to labour the point, but the Labour party lost five out of 10 of the authorities it held. But the Tory party, as the Minister knows, for the first time in its history lost control of the Association of County Councils, and, instead of the majority of the shire county councils being run by the Tories, the Tories are now a minority group on the ACC.

In passing, I must add that it is not true to say that we more often support the Tories in shire counties than we support the Labour party. In Cheshire and Shropshire and originally Warwickshire, we supported the Labour party. In places like Essex, Hertfordshire and Humberside, we have supported the Tories. In three places—east Sussex, Hampshire and Oxfordshire—the Labour party put the Tories in, much to the chagrin of many people. In two places the Tories put Labour in. Let it not be imagined that in this new three-way balanced political scene it is only the alliance which is willing to put in its opponents. The Labour and Tory parties are now deciding that they often would prefer to see one or the other in power rather than have us in power.

[Mr. Hughes]

Mr. Jack Straw (Blackburn): The hon. Member is talking about the great election successes of the Liberals and their junior partners the Social Democrats, whose members have been conspicuous by their absence throughout this debate. I am sure that it is embarrassing to the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes), who dislikes them perhaps even more than many of us do. Will the hon. Gentleman explain what happened to the Liberal-SDP vote in the county elections? While it is true that compared with 1983 the Conservative vote collapsed, it is also true that Labour's vote went up by almost 10 per cent. Compared with 1983, the Liberal-SDP percentage share of the vote went down a little. Why did the Liberals and the SDP do worse in the shire county elections than in the general election?

Mr. Hughes: I thought that the hon. Gentleman was about to make a 100 per cent. correct point, but he tripped at the last fence. I anticipated his questions and have the answers to hand, supplied by the research department of the Library. Yes, he is right in saying that in the shire counties the Tory vote went down from 50·2 per cent. to 38·4 per cent. He is also right in saying that the Labour party vote went up from 21·4 per cent. to 30 per cent. As he said, that is a rise of nearly 10 per cent. But he is not right in saying that our share went down, because the figure is exactly the same, at 27·9 per cent.

I will not rise to the bait of saying why there are no colleagues of mine here from the other party in the alliance, except to say that I have no doubt that they trust me to argue the case for both parties because we are agreed on the subject. An interesting development on the political scene is that the hon. Gentleman's party now argues votes and percentages and not seats. I look forward to the natural consequence of that which we will no doubt have to discuss after the next general election.

Mr. Straw: Given that the hon. Gentleman's party subscribes to proportional representation, will he explain why on the hung council in Wiltshire, when the Conservative party proposed proportional representation for committees, the SDP and the Liberals categorically refused to accept it because it would have undermined their power?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): If the hon. Gentleman follows that line, he will be getting away from the debate on the rate support grant. Let us get back to that subject.

Mr. Hughes: I will tell the hon. Gentleman later. I accept your stricture, Mr. Deputy Speaker. There is a very easy answer, but I shall deal with it in another way.

The debate has shown up the anomalies of the system by way of some very bizarre examples which I want to put in the context of the overall figures. The figures show that local authorities will overspend their targets this year by about £278 million. That is about 1·3 per cent., a relatively small amount. But it means that over £500,000 will be incurred by way of penalties lost to the local government budgets. That will affect a considerable number of local authorities. It will affect 19 out of 46 shire and metropolitan counties which will be penalised and will lose money, and 14 out of the 32 London boroughs, including, as I said to the Minister, four Tory-controlled boroughs. They would not incur the penalty if they honestly believed that they could get below the target, especially if they are seeking to uphold Tory policies on strict budgetary control.

Twenty-five out of 36 of the metropolitan districts will incur penalties, and of the other districts about 60 of all political species of authorities will be penalised because they have chosen to spend a certain amount of money. In their case, it is an overspend of about 3 per cent., but for that they will lose 12 per cent. of their block grant.

There are some very bizarre distortions. How can the Minister justify them? How can he justify a penalty of £17·7 million on an overspend of £10·1 million in Brent when surprisingly—and this redounds to the benefit of some of my constituents—in Harrow the penalty is £3 million on an overspend of £1·5 million and yet in Southwark there is less than half of that penalty, £1·4 million, on an overspend of £1·6 million? How can anyone justify a system of swings and roundabouts which penalises certain types of authority to such an enormous extent? As the Government know, it is not just the inner city authorities which suffer, although most of them suffer most. I hope that whatever system the Government come up with next week will recognise that with cuts in rate support grant, if they do not find substantial amounts of money for the inner cities in which the elderly are most concentrated and services the most run down, they will preside over a further decline in what used to be the power houses of the land.

The shire counties, too, are affected. As the hon. Member for Norwich, South pointed out again today, the present system revolves around special pleading. When the Government announced the figures last year there was a great baying from Tory Back Benchers from Warwickshire to the south-west asking the Government to let them off the hook. The Government did not oblige sufficiently and the Tories lost many seats as a result. We do not want another system geared to special pleading. We must have a system that treats everyone fairly.

Sadly, in the past year several authorities have played into the Government's hands. The hon. Member for Dulwich (Mr. Bowden) represents the southern and leafier end of my borough. Southwark is both rate capped and Labour controlled. That authority, with others, went through the process of arguing that it could not comply with the rate-capped limits and then eventually set a rate. It certainly came within the category to which the Minister referred. Intolerable scenes of violence and viciousness put horrendous pressure not just on elected members of the council but on members of the public who through much publicity had been invited to attend the rate-making meetings, of which I believe there were in the end about 10. Sadly, the Labour party in Southwark played into the Government's hands. Having cried wolf and said that it could not set a rate, the council eventually gave in. Other authorities did the same.

A leader in The Guardian a few weeks ago made the case for local authorities having more money and being able to argue the case for money with the Government without all the derogation and restrictions that now apply and without the Government being able to say that because a council cried wolf last year and then managed to make ends meet it will be penalised even more severely this year when the Government know that the authority has used up most of its reserves. The Guardian said:

"Yet in many ways the most culpable of the councillors are those who knew all along that the strategy"— the anti-rate-capping strategy—

"would fail, but who never said so in public, preferring to go along with it either for opportunist personal advancement or in order to set up a witch-hunt against more cautious and realistic Labour councillors and leaders. Into this category must be placed, for varying reasons, Mr. Ken Livingstone of the GLC, Mr. David Blunkett of Sheffield, Mrs. Margaret Hodge of Islington and Ms. Hilda Kean of Hackney."

I would add to that list Mr. Tony Ritchie of Southwark.

The Guardian continues:

"Some of these councillors have done very nicely out of this game. Some have got their parliamentary nominations. Some will soon do so. Others, notably in the London boroughs where elections are due next year, are using the betrayal to launch a purge of councillors who voted to set rates. All of this has lots to do with careerism and lots to do with internal Labour politics. But it has precious little to do with either a council's responsibility to get the best deal for its local people, or with Labour's national need to present a politically credible image to voters who have previously deserted the party at election time".

If the hon. Member for Liverpool, Walton (Mr. Heffer) catches your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, he may be able to confirm that the deputy leader of Liverpool city council and other members of that council wanted to set a rate of 20 per cent. but the city Labour party said that there must be only a 9 per cent. rate increase, resulting in enormous deficit budgeting. Liverpool clearly deserves a considerably greater grant-related expenditure assessment than it has, but it is financial suicide to bring about a reduction in grant of about four fifths by way of penalty. That is kamikaze politics. Many good, long-serving council officers have been ringing my colleagues and, no doubt, members of the Labour party in Liverpool saying that if that policy continues council officers will lose their jobs. Such a policy is folly indeed.

It is the duty of local authorities to argue against the Government but, more importantly, it is their duty to provide local services as efficiently, competently and munificently as possible. I hope that the lessons of the past year will have been learnt by both the Government and the Labour party. I hope that the Conservatives will never again lumber us with a system of targets that are clearly unattainable by most authorities, including Tory-controlled authorities. I hope, too, that the Labour party will not make a great song and dance about non-compliance purely for party political ends and cost ratepayers hundreds of thousands of pounds, only to give in eventually as it intended from the start.

On a day, which the Government will live to regret, when we have heard that the foolish and ill-conceived measure to abolish the GLC and the metropolitan counties has received Royal Assent, I have received a copy of an internal document from County hall. It is from the chair of the transport committee to Nick Lester of the Public Transport Campaign Unit. The letter, dated 28 June, refers to issue No. 2 of a newsletter on public transport in London put out by the GLC last month and entitled "LT in Exile". The letter requests "Dear Nick" to "See attached." The attached newsletter refers to a complaint that I made about the escalator at Rotherhithe tube station. The letter continues:

"Please avoid publicising Simon Hughes. In the past when he was invited to the wreath laying ceremony at 55 Broadway"— that was to do with the Government's demolition of London Transport—

"I was heavily criticised by Labour MPs and activists in the Bermondsey CLP."

The writer concludes with his usual flourish:

"Yours for Socialism, Dave".

He then adds the following postscript, just to make things clear:

"No blame. It's my fault for not proof reading it!"

I am sorry that the Labour party has to go to such lengths to avoid publicising me, but it does its own publicity no good when it helps the Government—on a policy that we should be united in opposing because the Government do not want to listen to the views of local authorities — by publicising its own folly instead of making it clear that the Government and their policies are primarily to blame. The sooner the system is changed—next week, we hope—the better.

Mr. Jack Thompson (Wansbeck): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I seek your help and guidance on an important component of today's debate. My point of order concerns the accuracy of the information given in the report. In the table on page 27 a figure of £111,556,000 is given for Northumberland. I have checked today with the treasurer's department of Northumberland county council and I am informed that that figure is about £1 million too high. The treasurer's office checked with the Department of the Environment, which has admitted that the figure is too high and that it is the Department's error. If that is so, may we question any or all of the figures in the document, as they are important in terms of our contributions to the debate?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: That is not really a matter for me. The Minister has heard what the hon. Gentleman has said and will no doubt make appropriate comments at the end of the debate.

Dr. Cunningham: Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. This may not be a matter for you, but it is an important matter for the House. We are being asked to approve the report and the figures set out in it, but the Department itself has admitted that the figure for Northumberland county council is wrong. For all we know, other figures in the report might be wrong.

The Secretary of State for the Environment sent me a letter dated 11 July 1985 about the supplementary report for 1982-83 which was presented to the House and then withdrawn because it contained an error in respect of GRE for Dudley. In that letter the Secretary of State said:

"The extent of the error is minimal, but since I intend this Report to be the final one for 1982-83 . . . I have decided that the Report should be re-made and re-laid."

The report was reprinted and relaid.

If what the Secretary of State described as "a minimal error" requires a procedure such as that, it cannot be right that the House should be asked to approve this report, which contains an error of about £1 million in respect of Northumberland county council. The fact that the error has come to light today leads us to question the validity of other figures in the report.

My hon. Friend the Member for Wansbeck (Mr. Thompson) has had the error confirmed by Northumberland county council, and the Department has agreed. Further consideration of the report should not take place and the Minister should withdraw it, have the error corrected, have other figures checked and re-present it.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: The hon. Gentleman is right about the final report for 1982-83 and the error concerning Dudley. As we had hoped that it would be the final report, we thought it right to withdraw it and table another one, which was considered by the Joint Committee on Statutory Instruments this morning. As for the 1985-86 report, if there is an error concerning Northumberland, I am glad to say that I have been advised that there is a procedure which allows it to be taken into account. The hon. Gentleman knows that there is a series of reports and there will be a second supplementary report later this year. In that case, the error, if it is an error, can be corrected. The point is that Northumberland will not suffer.

Mr. Jack Thompson: Further to the point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Today's debate is based on the figures presented to us. The £1 million in respect of Northumberland will colour my attitude.

Mr. Cowans: Further to the point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The Minister for Local Government said that he had been advised. The House is entitled to know when he was advised. One alteration to one set of figures has a knock-on effect on all the other figures. I do not know how anybody can debate the report when every figure in it will be altered by that knock-on effect as a result of this efficient Department getting it wrong by one million quid. These are the people who are talking about local authorities. Surely the Minister will have the courage to say, "I am wrong. We will adjourn the debate until we get it right." Perhaps he will acknowledge that the Department is not as efficient as the local authorities it is trying to destroy.

Mr. Simon Hughes: Further to the point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. We are being asked to agree the determination of certain figures for a list of authorities of which Northumberland is one. The Minister cannot say that he will make an adjustment, because, if a figure is wrong, it should not be in the report. Only a few weeks ago the High Court found that there had been an incorrect figure in regard to Hammersmith and Fulham and quashed it. If there is an incorrect figure in the report, it is likely that the matter will have to go back to court, because we cannot undo what we do if we approve a figure today. We could deal with Northumberland later in some way which the Minister might think of, but we should not be asked to vote when there is a risk of the court finding our action invalid.

Mr. Reg Freeson (Brent, East): Further to the point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. If the Minister is unwilling to act, we need your guidance. The Minister said that Northumberland will not suffer because the figures can be adjusted in a later submission. No doubt the same argument could be applied—it would be by him—if there were queries on other figures. We might learn of such figures later. It is good if Northumberland, or any other authority, will not suffer, but this is an important matter for the House. The House is being asked to approve a report. If it is not correct, the House cannot endorse it. It does not matter whether other queries might emerge. We cannot be asked to vote on inaccurate figures.

Dr. Cunningham: Further to the point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I have submitted that there is an error in the report. The Minister was equivocal and said that there may be an error. Our information is that there is undoubtedly at least one error in respect of Northumberland county council's GRE. My hon. Friends have said that that error has implications for other figures in the report and for other authorities. It cannot be in order for the House to be asked to vote on and to approve a report which we know contains at least one error.

Several choices are available. You could suspend the sitting, Mr. Deputy Speaker, to give Ministers time to sort this mess out and to advise the House of their intentions. The Minister could say now that he intends to withdraw the report and retable it later. I strongly submit that we cannot vote on the matter, as that would not be in order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: These are important matters and I have listened carefully, but I cannot adjudicate on the accuracy of figures presented in the report. It is not a matter for me. The arguments being used are arguments for voting against the report.

Mr. Cowans: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. This is an important matter. May we have an assurance from the Minister that all of the other figures are correct and will not be amended in any way if we continue to debate the report? So far, we have had no assurances. We know that one figure is wrong. It was discovered, but the House was not informed. Are any more wrong? Have the figures been checked? The error must colour the whole of the report. Surely the Minister will stand up and say whether his report is right or wrong.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is asking for assurances from the Minister. With great respect, it is not a matter for the Chair or a point of order.

Dr. Cunningham: Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I must press the point, because it is a matter for the House. You say that the matter is not for the Chair, but I cannot see how a submission on a point of order that the House is being asked to approve a document which is in error is not a matter for the Chair. Surely it is a matter for the order of business in the House. The Minister did not refute our submission about an error in respect of the figure for Northumberland. Indeed, he was equivocal about it. Given the array of senior officials present to advise him, I cannot believe that he does not know that there is an error in the report. I put it to both you and the Minister that the debate should be adjourned to give the Government an opportunity to consider their position in the matter, and the Minister an opportunity immediately to seek the leave of the House to make a statement about the facts and to withdraw the report, if it is in error, as I believe it is.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I support entirely what you have said. I understand that in the past the House has debated supplementary reports of this nature when mistakes have been discovered. There is a means by which, under the procedure on supplementary reports, such mistakes can be corrected. If there has been a miscalculation for Northumberland, I assure the House that it will be taken into account in the next supplementary report. I hope that the House will now be able to proceed with the debate.

Mr. Terry Fields (Liverpool, Broadgreen): Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I implore you to consider the matter far beyond parliamentary activity. As a result of decisions taken here today, Liverpool city councillors——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman must put his point of order to me.

Mr. Cowans: Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. For the protection of hon. Members, would you accept a motion, That further consideration of the report be adjourned until such a time as the Secretary of State can substantiate the correctness of the other figures?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I cannot accept such a motion. Clearly, the hon. Gentleman has been in touch with his authority, but I cannot adjudicate on the accuracy of the figures. I understand that it is possible in supplementary reports to correct figures, and I cannot accept the motion. Therefore, we should proceed with the debate and allow hon. Members to make their points.

Mr. Patrick Ground (Feltham and Heston): The hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) accepted the need for at least some national control of local government expenditure. He criticised the method being used by the Government, but did not say how he would change the system or what he would put in its place. I was disappointed that he did not acknowledge the benefits to the people of Southwark arising from the degree of national control of local government expenditure that has been derived from legislation, or some of the benefits mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Dulwich (Mr. Bowden).

One of the functions of the 1985-86 report, as set out in the first paragraph, is to make changes to the grant-related assessment of local authorities so that they are based on actual capital allocations rather than estimated allocations. Will the Minister look at the machinery for making those changes, and introduce some means of mitigating their effect when an authority is placed in an awkward position through no fault of its own?

Both the Conservative minority and the Labour majority in the Hounslow authority are disturbed about the way in which the changes have been made in the report. As I understand it, two groups of officials at the Department of the Environment deal with local authority capital expenditure. One group consists only of Department of the Environment officials and is concerned with capital expenditure as part of its work on calculating the rate support grant. The second group has contact with other Government Departments, deals with bids for local authority capital expenditure, and is responsible for allocating the sums resolved by the Government in the PESC White Paper.

In December 1984 both groups made recommendations to the Government, and the Government made two announcements within about a week of each other. The first was about the rate support grant settlement, and the second was about capital allocations. On the basis of those announcements the London borough of Hounslow and other authorities made their budgets and rates. Two months later in June Hounslow was informed that its grant was to be reduced by no less than £1·1 million because of the difference between the assumptions made in the rate support grant settlement of 11 December 1984 and the capital allocations which the Department of the Environment announced about a week later. Having made its rate on the basis of the Government announcement, the local authority is in an extremely awkward position. The sum of £1·1 million is considerable for an authority where the product of a penny rate is £490,000. The local authority could not have known between December and June that the two bodies from the Department of the Environment were making different assumptions on capital expenditure for Hounslow.

First, there is room for some improvement in communications between those two groups of officials. That would undoubtedly be helped if in future the Government made greater efforts to make the necessary decisions at the appropriate time so that the officials could operate as near as possible on the same basis. Secondly, some warning should be given to local authorities when it is discovered—it must be known within the Department — that different assumptions are being made for rate support grant calculations and capital allocations. Authorities would not then be put in such an awkward position over such a substantial sum. Thirdly, there should be a temporary safety net for authorities placed in such a position, whereby the loss of grant should be limited in any one year to the product of a penny rate. On page 8 in paragraph 20 of the Rate Support Grant Supplementary Report (England) 1982/83 it states

"The Secretary of State is concerned that these changes should not lead to severe mid-year grant losses."

In that case, he imposed a temporary safety net such as I have described.

I hope that the Secretary of State is still anxious that the changes in this report should not lead to severe mid-year grant losses. I urge him to follow the precedent set for the 1982-83 report with regard to the London borough of Hounslow, which I believe is one of the authorities worst affected by the anomaly.

7.40 pm

Mr. Eric S. Heffer (Liverpool, Walton): The Minister referred in his opening statement to the position in Liverpool, and suggested that the city council is not acting responsibly. I and my Labour colleagues from Liverpool believe that the council is acting perfectly responsibly. As I said earlier, the target for Liverpool is £220 million. If the city council kept to that target, it would be forced to lay off up to 5,000 or 6,000 workers. It would also be forced to cut local services. Liverpool city councillors, the people of Liverpool and the work force there believe that that is unacceptable.

Merseyside has one of the highest concentrated unemployment levels in the country. Most of our constituents suffer from unemployment that is unheard of south of Birmingham. In one or two constituencies, unemployment has reached between 40 and 50 per cent., and in most of them it stands at between 27 and 30 per cent. Our people are suffering terrible hardship. The majority of people who live on some estates exist on benefits of one sort or another. Those who wish to know about misery, poverty, unemployment and the conditions in which people must live under this Government should come to Liverpool to see for themselves.

During the past few years, 60 per cent. of the industrial base in Liverpool has disappeared, but not because the workers are lazy or wish to live on charity, as one hon. Member had the audacity to say the other day. On the contrary, they are hard-working people who are crying out for employment so that they can lead dignified lives. That is the background to the stand taken by Liverpool city councillors.

[Mr. Eric S. Heffer]

The villains of the piece are not the city councillors, who now face possible bankruptcy and disqualification. The villains are the Government and those who accept the policies and ideas of the Prime Minister and her Ministers.

I draw to the attention of the House the report of the Comptroller and Auditor-General, which was ordered by the House to be printed on 2 April 1985. At paragraph 4.65 on page 24, it states in relation to the rate support grant:

"Under the previous RSG system the proportion of total relevant expenditure met by grant had remained constant at 61 per cent. for a number of years up to 1980-81."

That is true.

Local authorities in areas such as Liverpool used to receive a decent rate support grant. However, the previous Liberal and Tory coalition council in Liverpool did not increase the rates following the improved rate support grant that it received from the Labour Government. It kept the rates down, and boasted about the fact throughout the city. It did not improve services, which meant that when the Labour party took power last year and wished to improve the services it immediately ran into difficulties with the Government's penalties. Labour councillors are called villains, but the real villains are Ministers and the previous Liberal-Tory administration that controlled Liverpool.

The report from the Comptroller and Auditor-General also states:

"The reduction from this figure to the latest estimate of 48·3 per cent. for 1984-85 means that the proportion left to be borne by ratepayers has risen from 39 per cent. to 51·7 per cent., an increase of almost a third or about £3 billion in cash terms for 1984-85. Over the same period the average rate poundages for domestic ratepayers rose from 100·1p to 160·1p, an increase of 60 per cent., and for non-domestic ratepayers from 117·5p to 178·7p, an increase of 52 per cent."

The report makes this important point:

"These increases can therefore be attributed more to the reduction in the proportion of Government grant than to increases in local authority spending; and unless and until the level of central government support is stabilised again it will be difficult for local electors to distinguish how far changes in rates should be attributed to the actions of the local authorities themselves, except in those few cases where the entitlement to block grant has already been wholly eliminated."

Although the Government have said for the past few years that local authorities have placed increased burdens on their ratepayers by spending too much, the report of the Comptroller and Auditor-General shows clearly that the problems have arisen because of Government policy. The Minister cannot say that that is untrue. The Government talk about the terrible wickedness of local authorities, but they are in a Catch 22 situation. They wish to improve services to the community and they must increase rates slightly to do so. Then they are accused of overspending. They are not overspending; they have simply been placed in that position by the Government.

Liverpool city councillors have been unable to set a so-called legal budget because of the Government's policies. I have been given some figures by the council. Its committees have worked out that, to maintain existing services, and taking into consideration inflation and last year's deficit of £6 million, which it must meet, it must spend £258,500,000. That means an immediate penalty on that council of £63 million. The rate requirement would be £204 million, and the rate increase in the city would be 75·7 per cent. With the additional payments that would have to be made, the increase in rates could eventually be as much as 130 per cent. Even some of the employers' representatives who came to see us recently are constantly arguing that the burden of rates is too high. In their own way, they have made representations to the Government about it.

Can we expect councillors to accept that situation? I do not think that we can, because they were elected on a programme. Two years ago they went to the people of Liverpool and promised to defend existing city council jobs and services, to create additional jobs and to improve services. They have created additional jobs in the construction industry to build houses for the people. Council houses had not been built by the local authority for years. If the councillors accepted Government policy, that activity would have to cease.

The councillors made it clear that they would build houses for rent, and end the threat of privatisation of the city council services. They originally went to the public on that programme. Last year they went to the public again on the same programme and they won. The choice before the city councillors is either to carry out their local mandate to the people of Liverpool or to be dictated to by central Government.

The Government are dictating to local authorities what they should and should not do. We have a centralised, authoritarian force developing in Britain. The councillors have said no to that. There can either be genuine local democracy or centralised control by the Government. The Government are always talking about freedom and saying that they believe in freedom of choice. What choice have the local authority and the local people in those circumstances?

On 26 June, the national executive committee of the Labour party, of which I am proud to be a member, made a lengthy statement on the crisis in local government. It said:

"Local government is now in deep crisis. The Tory Government have progressively cut the grant available to local councils."

The national executive also said:

"Local authorities everywhere are being ensnared by Tory legislation. And the Tories are now prepared to use the District Auditor to crush those local authorities determined to defend their local communities."

Liverpool councillors are faced with action by the district auditor, not at this stage on the basis of fixing a deficit budget but on the basis of delaying the setting of a rate. Many local authorities as well as Liverpool and Lambeth have delayed the setting of a rate. They could all be faced with the same action by the district auditors, but Liverpool and Lambeth have been picked out so that the Government can say that those local authorities are led by wicked, Left-wing, loony militants, and so on. That is the Government's line. They know that it is not true, but they want to do their damnedest to make the actions of the Liverpool and Lambeth councillors appear to be irresponsible when those councillors are fighting responsibly for the interests of their local people.

The national executive committee of the Labour party said that it

"supports the Labour councillors, and calls upon all sections of the Party to offer maximum support to those councillors, in Liverpool, Lambeth, Edinburgh"— the councillors in Edinburgh are faced with the same problems, arising from legislation operated against them in Scotland—

"and other authorities, in seeking to prevent the threatened disqualification and surcharge".

Yesterday the Liverpool Labour Members of Parliament met the Secretary of State. We told him that the Government should give advice to the district auditors. If the Government were intelligent and did not want a confrontation, they could advise the district auditors to have a further look at the problem and see what could be done to overcome it without confrontation.

The Liverpool city council has asked for two meetings so that it can discuss the urban aid programme and rates. I agree with the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) that we shall soon be hearing of a change in policy in regard to penalties. If there is to be such a change, let us have it now, rather than continuing to put the councillors into a difficult position. The Ministers could discuss the urban aid programme, even if at this stage they did not want to discuss rates. They could discuss in detail what could be done through the city partnership schemes and the urban aid programme to help Liverpool.

Our Liverpool councillors are the victims of legislation that has existed for far too long. When we have a Labour Government, the legislation that is putting councillors into such difficulties must be repealed once and for all. Good honest people must not be put in the position in which councillors at Clay Cross, Camden and St. Pancras found themselves in the past.

In the past, the Government have brought in retrospective legislation on various issues. If councillors are disqualified and bankrupted as a result of Government action, I hope that the next Labour Government will introduce retrospective legislation to deal with those councillors. They are not criminals or people who wish to break the law, but they are being forced to do so by Government policy.

The point has been made clearly by local authorities and by the Association of Metropolitan Authorities in the briefing that I am sure we have all received. I imagine that all hon. Members have received a copy. It states:

"The penalties are so severe that the 'marginal grant rates'"— that is the cost to the ratepayers of each additional £1 of spending—are

"£4·54 in Hounslow, £4·22 in the West Midlands, £3·36 in Birmingham and £3·04 in Liverpool."

That AMA believes that that is entirely wrong, and I agree. Even at this late hour, I hope that the Government will have second thoughts. If they do not, the full responsibility for the uneasy, unhappy and difficult summer that might lie ahead for them and our people will be fully their responsibility and will lie fully and squarely on their shoulders. The fault will lie with the Government and not with the honest, decent and courageous councillors of Liverpool who are fighting for those who elected them.

Mr. Derek Spencer (Leicester, South): If anyone is minded to accept the advice of the hon. Member for Liverpool, Walton (Mr. Heffer) and journey north to Liverpool, I invite him first to call in at Leicester, which, unlike Liverpool, is a city on the up and up. It is a city of enterprise in which industry and small businesses form a significant part of the economy.

Leicester has done well out of the Conservative Government since 1979. The rate support grant for this year amounts to over £12 million and the inner urban grant amounts to about £5 million, a total of more than £17 million. That is to be compared and contrasted with the sum that is raised locally in rates, which is £10 million.

It is clear that a large part of Leicester is not funded by Leicester: it is funded by the taxpayer. Who will speak for the taxpayer who has contributed to the rate support grant this year, which is £2·5 million more this year than last? Who will speak for the taxpayer who subscribes to the inner area grant? If that taxpayer is to have a voice, it must be one that comes from right hon. and hon. Members.

The rate-capping exercise which we have witnessed at first hand in Leicester in the past few months has produced three concrete benefits for my constituents. First, it has produced lower rates. If the local Labour party had had its way the rates bill that my constituents would have had to meet this year would have been about twice that which they were eventually set. The second advantage that my constituents will enjoy is a higher rate support grant. The third advantage is a substantial sum for the inner area programme. The amount which Leicester receives for that programme is almost a quarter of the grant-related expenditure.

When I recite these facts to less happy boroughs, they are amazed that we can have such a generous extra subscription from the taxpayer to the city. I can say of behalf of the citizens of Leicester, South that for the most part their money is put to good use in what is a city of enterprise. Indeed, it is evident that it is not a city of gloom and doom. If visitors to Leicester travel on to Liverpool and witness how things are conducted there, I think that they will be able to draw their own conclusions on where they should finally come to rest.

Mr. Powley: Does my hon. and learned Friend recall the extraordinary statements that were made by some local authorities before the Rates Bill, as it then was, became law? They were saying that the Bill, if enacted, would result in wholesale redundancies, the decimation of services and chaos in the streets. Has my hon. and learned Friend seen any evidence of such happenings in his area? The predictions have not come to pass in the area that I represent. Perhaps my hon. and learned Friend will comment upon that.

Mr. Spencer: I shall accept my hon. Friend's invitation and deal with that issue out of order. I can rely on none other than the chief of public relations of the city council, who is not a politician. He is an officer who is paid a salary from the public purse, having been hired by the Labour local authority to advance the anti-rate-capping propaganda campaign. He announced recently that the authority had got it wrong. He acknowledged that many of the claims made in the rate-capping propaganda campaign have not been borne out in the slightest. He and his colleagues were prevailed upon by their political masters to make various claims which, to use his words, "with the benefit of hindsight have not been borne out by events." I am sure that the same claims were being made throughout the country by other rate-capped boroughs. I have a copy of the propaganda literature which was circulated in Leicester and it is almost identical to that which was to be found wherever else I went. The same literature was being circulated in Leicester, Camden, Southwark and Liverpool. Its message was virtually the same as that which we received from the hon. Member for Walton. We were told:

[Mr. Spencer]

"The Government want to slash services and jobs by over a third. This means a cut of £10 million plus. Cuts of this savagery would affect the services of the city council. For example, housing — reduction in the inner city housing improvement programme. Recreation—closure of three sports halls and two swimming pools. The cancellation of the Leicestershire show and the closure of the Haymarket and the Phoenix. Withdrawal of support for Bradgate Park. Works—severe reduction in refuse collection and street cleaning. Planning — long delays in planning applications. Environmental health — abolish the service for dealing with rats and mice. Employment—abolish the Leicester promotion campaign."

If we examine the reality against the promise, what do we find? Do we find that Leicester has been converted into a stinking heap where refuse is piled up in the streets? Do we find that no work is being done on council housing? Do we find that the swimming pools are empty? Do we find that expenditure on the parks has been cut and that the grass is growing knee deep? We find not one of those symptoms. Indeed, we find, as the Labour council has been forced to admit, that all these services are going ahead in much the same way as they were before the anti-rate-capping campaign began.

There is a two-faced monster in many town halls. One face is speaking inwards telling the truth and one is speaking outwards putting forward a pack of distorted nonsense. The pack of distorted nonsense is along the lines that I have just outlined, but the reality is that the council has been able to discharge its functions without laying off one member of staff.

My hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, South (Mr. Powley) may be interested to know that far from a reduction in staff under rate capping, as my hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Bruinvels) will be able to confirm, there has been a significant increase, month by month, since rate capping came into operation. At one and the same time, we have been able to have rate capping and the city council has been able to discharge the promises to continue taking more people on to the staff that it made earlier.

We have made a start and rate capping has brought benefits to my constituents. I urge the Government not to give up now just because there has been some squealing in one or two town halls and blood on a few municipal banisters. Now is not the time for the Government to become squeamish, because the blood in Leicester was the blood of the Labour party taking to its heels and running away from its commitment to break the law. As late as 14 February, the leader of the city council said in the Labour newspapers:

"We are firmly committed as a group to non-compliance."

When it came to it, at the first whiff of gunfire the Labour party turned and fled. It fixed a rate long before the time limit had expired. It had to send to each ratepayer a certificate of compliance with the Rates Act 1984, which, in its case, was a certificate that it had egg all over its face.

The lesson of rate capping in Leicester is that, once deceptions are practised, the skein of the deception envelops those who seek to practise it.

Although it was possible to fix a rate in Leicester within the time available, with a similar background, similar propaganda and a similar commitment to non-compliance in Camden, where I served five years before the mast before I came to this place, my colleagues found that the Labour party there was not willing to set a rate.

I pay tribute to Tony Kerpel and others of my former colleagues on Camden council who had to withstand a hail of spittle, intimidation and threats at council meeting after council meeting through April, May and into June, not just at the hands of people living in Camden, but at the hands of those bussed in from Lambeth and elsewhere on a so-called battle bus. Is that the responsibility of local government about which some Opposition Members have spoken? Is that local government discharging its obligations to the people who elected those councillors to sit in the town halls on their behalf? I defy anyone to say that that is a proper discharge of is responsibilities.

It was not surprising when Councillor Phil Turner, leader of the Camden Labour party, sent a letter to Camden ratepayers on 3 April saying that the council found it impossible at that time to set a rate. If it found it impossible to set a rate then, am I now justified in saying that I find it impossible to pay it? I should be using words in the way that he sought to do if I were to seek to say that now.

Eventually, on 8 June or thereabouts, Camden council fixed a rate. On 13 June, out went another letter from Councillor Turner saying that on 8 June the council set a rate. It did, but that letter draws a veil over the way in which it was done. It was done through a combination of a few defectors from the Labour party and the Tory party discharging their duty to fix a rate. One has eventually been fixed within the legal boundary.

A loss must have been caused to Camden ratepayers by the late fixing of a rate. It has been said that it would be terrible if, in such circumstances, the district auditor were to pursue the councillors. I say that it would be a dereliction of duty if a public servant such as the district auditor did not pursue them. I, with others, intend to see that the course that I set in motion after the settlement of the dirty jobs strike in Camden on terms that were adverse to the ratepayers, which was eventually referred to the High Court by the district auditor, Mr. Pickell, turns out to be not an isolated case, because, for justice to be done to the ratepayers, matters cannot be left as they are.

If one could say that the anti-rate-capping campaign fought by some Left-wing councils, as well as heightening public perception of the importance of local government —I believe that it has—also informed it better about the true facts of local government, I should have been prepared to chip in as a ratepayer in Camden and Leicester —in the way that I have been obliged to—for that campaign. But, unfortunately, as the public relations officer in Leicester was bound to admit, it has not been information that has been fed to the public; it has been a great deal of misinformation.

Such truth as has emerged from that sorry story has emerged from Tory councillors and Tory Members of Parliament speaking at meetings and trying to put the truth in the face of a hailstorm of misrepresentation. We have done that willingly. We believe that the cause is just and we wish to see the Government go further.

8.20 pm

Mr. Guy Barnett (Greenwich): The hon. and learned Member for Leicester, South (Mr. Spencer) has misunderstood, if not misrepresented, the motives that led many Labour councillors, decent and sincere people, to do what they did in the face of the appalling dilemma with which they were confronted. They knew that they had a responsibility to some of the most vulnerable members of their communities, but they were being prevented from discharging that responsibility by the actions perpetrated by the Government.

In the last debate that we had on this subject, on the Rate Limitation (Prescribed Maximum) Order, on 25 February I accused the Secretary of State and his Ministers of injustice and vindictiveness towards the London borough of Greenwich. I made that charge on the basis of evidence that in my borough, and no doubt in many other local authorities, as is apparent from the debate, the GREA system is arbitrary in its assessment of need and unjust in its effect on grants.

Greenwich is an inner-city London borough with all the problems associated therewith — high unemployment, decaying industry, the need, and the statutory duty, to spend substantial sums of money on maintaining and improving the council's housing stock, and severe social problems. The Government have manipulated the rate support grant system in a way that is unfair to inner cities in general, and London authorities in particular.

Greenwich has been singled out for particularly harsh and unjust treatment. Since 1979, £119 million in block grant and £85 million in housing subsidy have been withheld or withdrawn. This is at a time when the council is faced with increasing demands for its services as a result of demographic and social factors and, in particular, as a result of Government policy.

For example, the increased unemployment and reduced welfare benefits mean that more people living at or below the poverty line make increased demands on council services, housing services and leisure services. Cuts in the NHS lead to a greater demand on the council's social services. The Government, while consistently increasing their expenditure, as has been pointed out, have reduced financial support for local authorities. In 1979, about half of Greenwich's spending was met from taxes. In 1984-85, it was less than a quarter. As the Audit Commission has noted, the Government, and not local authorities, have been responsible for the increase in rates in recent years. In addition, the Government withdrawal of housing subsidy has meant increased rents for tenants.

Greenwich residents are being made to pay higher rates than they should as a result of the Government diverting money paid in taxes to other purposes, rather than returning it to local authorities through the block grant system to pay for local services and to reduce rates. The loss of block grant and subsidies for Greenwich since 1979 is £204 million, and this figure is very much higher if the grant losses of the precepting authorities—the GLC and ILEA—are included. As the House knows, ILEA is the only education authority in the country that does not receive block grant.

Government policy has forced up rates in Greenwich and has restricted the ability of the council to develop essential services to meet the increased needs of Greenwich residents.

The use of GREAs to distribute block grant was introduced by the Government with the stated objective of giving local authorities enough resources to provide broadly similar standards of service while ensuring that ratepayers were being charged roughly the same rate in the pound. GREAs are claimed by Government to be a measure of the expenditure that an authority needs to spend if the same standard of service is to be provided throughout the country. This is nonsense, and I expect an announcement shortly showing the extent to which the Government know that that is nonsense.

GREAs are not a reliable basis for comparing relative spending levels of different authorities. They have become successively less comprehensible and increasingly unpredictable. Moreover, they are biased, inflexible and based on out-of-date and inadequate data. They are based on mathematical formulas that do not take into account unemployment or urban deprivation. Housing GREAs do not take into account local needs and conditions. Social services GREAs take no account of population changes or demands caused by legislation.

The GREAs for housing and social services were criticised in a recent report by the Audit Commission which stressed that inner city authorities such as Greenwich were suffering because of faulty GREA calculation by the Government. A central failing of GREA calculation, identified by the Audit Commission, is the continued use of inaccurate data. In its recent report on the block grant system, the Audit Commission quotes the old adage, "garbage in equals garbage out" and states that inadequate information in calculating GREAs leads to "serious distortions" to the grant distribution process.

Inner London boroughs are unfairly penalised by the present system, and Greenwich is treated worst of all, for in Greenwich the GREA per head of population is the lowest in inner London. I can illustrate this by reference to social services. Greenwich's social services committee commissioned Tony Travers, research fellow at the North-East London polytechnic, to undertake an independent examination of the Greenwich social services component of GREA. I shall set out his main findings.

First, Greenwich has a relatively low social services GREA compared with broadly similar authorities and, per head of population, it has been growing less rapidly than social services GREA for inner London as a whole. Secondly, Greenwich has a social services GREA that falls short of its spending by a wide margin. Its GREA is measured in a systematically unfair way. Thirdly, the Greenwich system is particularly disadvantageous compared with that of other London boroughs, which are treated badly enough anyway. This is almost certainly because the borough has, perhaps alone among the other inner city authorities, an increasing population.

In addition, the population numbers of the very young, people over pensionable age and those who are mentally ill or handicapped are relatively high in Greenwich. Social isolation, particularly among the elderly, creates a disproportionate need for social services in Greenwich. Despite this, the Greenwich social services GREA per head has risen less rapidly than elsewhere in inner London. This is only one example of the unfairness of the GREA for Greenwich. Similar examples can be found in respect of highways, housing and libraries.

On top of the block grant system is the wholly arbitrary and subjective system of targets and penalties. Greenwich has been penalised in recent years for spending above a target set by the Government. Although the High Court ruled in 1983 that Greenwich's action in spending above target to provide essential services was lawful, in 1984-85 the Government fined the Greenwich ratepayer approximately £1 for every £1 of expenditure that was 3 per cent. above the arbitrary target set by the Government. The unfairness of this is emphasised when the Government consistently add to the responsibilities of local authorities and require them to incur additional expenditure, which the Government then penalise them for incurring.

I can give some examples of this behaviour, although I make no comment about the value of the legislation. In social services, the appointment of guardians ad litem under the Children Act, implementation of the Mental Health Act 1983, the Criminal Justice Act 1982 and the Registered Homes Act 1984 all add to the statutory responsibilities of local authorities.

The same is true in housing. There has also been the transfer of responsibility for the administration of housing benefit from the Department of Health and Social Security to local authorities. There is the Local Government, Planning and Land Act 1980, which, in an effort to encourage privatisation and damage direct labour teams, has substantially increased administrative tendering costs to local authorities. New duties have been imposed on local authorities under consumer protection and environmental health legislation. I could give further examples of burdens that are placed on local authorities. Little or no recognition is given of those extra burdens in the way in which the Government treat them financially.

Therefore, at a time when the Government are requiring local authorities—and my local authority in particular—to do more, they are steadily reducing the money available. That I believe to be logically indefensible and hypocritical. It needs to be stressed that the legislation to which I referred is new legislation, imposing additional duties. Because of social changes, increasing unemployment and Government cuts in other public services, the demand for existing services has increased, yet central Government are determined to reduce money available to Greenwich to provide those essential services.

The Government have made no attempt whatever to answer the charges that I made in the House on 25 February. Either the Secretary of State does not care about the situation in Greenwich or he is too embarrassed to admit the faults in the lunatic system that he is currently operating. The Secretary of State, or the Minister for Local Government, has a responsibility sooner or later to come clean and admit that the system that he is operating is unjust to local authorities such as mine, and often highly damaging to the most vulnerable sections of the community who depend upon the delivery of services by those local authorities.

Mr. Roy Galley (Halifax): There is one important point that I should like to raise about the supplementary report for 1982-83, but in the overall context of some general remarks about local government policy.

It is now nearly 10 years since a Labour Secretary of State said to local authorities, "The party is over," and that unrestrained local authority expenditure would have to be controlled. There have been considerable advantages from Government policies in recent years in terms of better management of local authority resources. The more sensible authorities have accepted the coaxing towards that better management, whereas more rigorous measures have had to be applied to others.

I pay tribute to the management of my local authority of Calderdale for the way in which it has run our services, with no reduction, and within a tight financial budget. It has used imaginative processes to do so. It is surprising that many local councils have not turned to more vigorous attempts at improving their management techniques. Throughout the country we have seen many examples of where, on certain budgets, by the tendering exercise and by contracting out services — sometimes not even by contracting out, but by the practice of tendering—there have been savings of 10, 20, and even 30 per cent. It seems unfortunate that those exercises have not been undertaken by more local authorities. Those authorities have preferred to stick to their tired old ideology rather than release resources which could be given back to the ratepayer or provide better services for the people whom they represent.

There are many ways in which the private and voluntary sectors, in co-operation with the public sector, can work together to provide services at a reduced cost to our ratepayers. If, as has happened with the encouragement of more sensible management, certain authorities do not carry out policies that are to the advantage of their ratepayers, it must be for the Government to say that they will be compelled to apply such policies. In the absence of any evidence that some local authorities will be sensible, I hope that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will say in due course that there will be tough measures to compel local authorities to put out to tender a wide variety of services.

Mr. Bill Michie (Sheffield, Heeley): There may be some logic in what the hon. Gentleman is saying, but does he agree that the Government should insist that the public works departments, the direct labour organisations in local authorities, should be able to tender in the private sector, as well as the private sector tendering in the public sector?

Mr. Galley: I do not agree with the hon. Gentleman. That is an entirely different debate. There is no reason why the public sector should go into operation as a commercial company. It is not there to run commercial operations. It is there to give the best services that the ratepayers require at the least cost.

As my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Leicester, South (Mr. Spencer) said, the important factor is that in so many instances services have not been reduced in any way. Complaints arise from time to time about local authority budgets. It is remarkable that whenever local councillors have a pet scheme which they want to implement, somehow or other they can find the money to do so. They will take money for their pet schemes from other projects and then say that essential services cannot be provided because of Government policies.

I take as an example the way in which a series of ill-advised traffic management schemes in Halifax have led to the strangling of the town centre. Resources which should have been available for highway maintenance elsewhere have been denied. More importantly, larger sums of money have been used increasingly for overtly political expenditure by local authorities. I shall keep to West Yorkshire in my examples, as I am familiar with it. In opposing Government legislation for the abolition of metropolitan county councils, West Yorkshire county council spent nearly £600,000 of ratepayers' money, without a by your leave. That money should have been spent on providing services for the people whom the council represents, but it was used for party political propaganda. The council also recently diverted money to a campaign against the Transport Bill.

Leeds city council spent over £100,000 in opposing rate-capping legislation. There are many other smaller examples of purely party political use of ratepayers' money. Money is raised from every ratepayer for the services that ratepayers want, yet it is used for purely party political propaganda. If political parties wish to put forward a particular point of view, they should raise their own money to do so, and there should not be a precept upon the ratepayer.

There is an increasing use of public funds to encourage the Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament. There has been the appointment in Leeds of peace officers and the continuing development of councils' ludicrous nuclear-free zone policies, the production of leaflets, the financing of seminars, and the establishment of peace gardens. Throughout West Yorkshire such activities are increasingly using sums of money which should be providing proper services for the people of the area. I refer also to the "great" Liberation Festival in Bradford, when substantial funds were used to support and enhance several Socialist campaigns, such as the Troops Out movement and the El Salvador solidarity campaign.

I hope that in the next Session of Parliament my right hon. and hon. Friends will present to the House legislation banning the use of ratepayers' money for party political propaganda. There will be problems of definition, but I have no doubt that by using the Independent Broadcasting Authority's code of practice on advertising, which bans from advertising any overt political material, it will be possible to enshrine that provision in legislation.

The supplementary report for 1982-83 makes several corrections to the rate support grant settlement that had previously been agreed. I understand that one correction has not been made. It appears that the Department of the Environment made an error in 1982-83 in the allocation of the non-housing revenue GREA. That error resulted in additional payments being made to London authorities and insufficient money being made available to certain other authorities, including my metropolitan borough of Calderdale. As a result, the Calderdale authority lost £116,000.

That loss resulted, not from any over-spending or inefficiency on the part of the council, but from an error by the Department, and the report makes no attempt to correct that mistake. As the error has been known about for some time, we should be told why the position has not been corrected.

During this year's budgetary exercise the Calderdale budget was set on the basis of perceived GREA rules, and after the exercise was completed the amount available to the local authority by way of grant was about £300,000 less than had been anticipated. It is understood and accepted as part of the game that rule changes may happen after budgets have been set, although that presents difficulties for local authorities. It is hard to swallow the fact that apparently the Department of the Environment can make a mistake — a mistake to which Calderdale council had in no way contributed — and the local authority is penalised as a result. If the Department had not made that error, the council would be £116,000 better off.

My hon. Friend the Minister may say that it is a relatively trivial matter. To Calderdale, a small authority, it is not trivial. That money could have been spent wisely and, with the good management that we have in Calderdale, it would have been spent to the advantage of the local people. I urge the Minister to reconsider the matter and, if possible, give the money back to the Calderdale authority.

8.42 pm

Mr. Bill Michie (Sheffield, Heeley): Conservative Members adopt double standards. They speak of what is responsible and what is irresponsible. They refer to so-called pet schemes, which they regard as good schemes, and question whether political propaganda is paid for out of ratepayers' money, and they call that disgraceful. I remind the hon. Member for Halifax (Mr. Galley) that the chairman of the Tory party is paid by the taxpayer, because he is on the Government payroll. If that is not a scandal, I do not know what is.

Why criticise councillors over small items of expenditure when an enormous hole exists in the Government's financial strategy? Since 1981-82, local government has suffered tremendous interference from central Government, all in the cause of reducing expenditure because the nation cannot afford it, we are told. Grant reductions have been the main cause of the rate situation that now exists in our cities. Since 1981-82, Sheffield's grant reduction has reached a staggering £240 million.

However efficient one may be in management terms and however much imagination one may have, when that sort of money has been lost, it is difficult to make ends meet. I am sure that any other authority, Tory or Labour, would feel the same when faced with a loss of that magnitude.

The excuse given by the Government is always the same. They say, "We are not against democracy. We must take this action because the nation cannot afford the expenditure." They are saying, in effect, that the nation cannot afford local democracy. As I listened to the hon. Member for Halifax, I thought of the way in which certain authorities can always find money for pet schemes — £2,000 for something here and £20,000 for something there. However small or large one regards such sums, one cannot overlook the Government's biggest pet scheme, a scheme about which nobody was consulted, namely, the new runway on the Falklands. That cost four times the whole of the grant-related expenditure taken away from local authorities since 1981. That runway was built, the Government say, for the defence of democracy, yet we cannot have money for local democracy.

Mr. Galley: How can the hon. Gentleman suggest — as there was a general election in 1983 at which the electorate endorsed the Goverment's Falklands policy — that it was not known that our policy towards the Falklands would be carried out?

Mr. Michie: Will the hon. Gentleman explain how it comes about that every local authority that has been rate-capped was elected last year on a mandate or manifesto? He cannot have it both ways. The Government cannot declare one policy for democracy and deny it to local authorities.

To enable Sheffield to adopt any form of local democracy, we are having to spend about £3 to achieve £1 of value. That may not make sense, but it is not the fault of the local authority. No account has been taken of the real effect on services. It is easy to do an accountancy exercise and come up with attractive figures, but no revelation has been made of the real effect of the cuts that have been imposed on the less well-off, the immobile, the single-parent families, the homeless, the aged and the unemployed. Many local authorities do not believe that it is a waste of money to spend it on services to help old people to get about and to help single parent families make a decent life for themselves and their children.

Sheffield is an aging city. In 1976, there were 9,000 live births, but by 1981 there were fewer than 6,000. At the other end of the spectrum, at a point after 1986 there will be 110,000 pensioners in the city, almost 20 per cent. of the population. Within that 20 per cent., the number of over-75s will increase by 20 per cent. to a record 42,000, and, of those, the number aged over 85 will increase by 75 per cent. to 10,000.

Such figures cannot be ignored. They will not go away simply because money is short. The elderly are living longer, and while I accept that some of them do not need help, nobody can dispute the fact that such rapidly rising figures must have implications for the social services.

The city also has growing numbers of people out of work. Today, 15·2 per cent. of people are unemployed in the city overall, and in the inner city areas, on large council estates—the same applies to other major cities that are rate-capped—the levels of unemployment are double that. The chairman of the Sheffield budget sub-committee, when trying to describe the hardship that is being caused to the electorate of Sheffield because of the council's difficulty in maintaining services, said:

"It is easier for a Rolls-Royce to pass through the eye of a needle than for a Cabinet Minister to enter in imagination the experience of the unemployed."

It is not surprising that, with such high levels of unemployment and poverty in Sheffield and other local authority areas, councillors are becoming frustrated in attempting to carry out their duties. We cannot expect them to fulfil their responsibilities by pretending that these things are not happening to thousands of our fellow citizens. These are the realities of life that they face every day in town halls, in their jobs—if they still have jobs —in their surgeries and at meetings which they attend almost daily. All our great conurbations are affected in the same way.

If the Minister is convinced that the cuts, penalties and rate-capping activities have been painless, I challenge him to agree to conduct an independent inquiry into the needs of thousands of people living in rate-capped areas. I am confident of the result of such an inquiry, if it were truly independent. It would reveal incredible suffering for the less able, the less articulate and the most vulnerable. It would also reveal a sad erosion of the quality of the lives of the majority of people in our towns and cities.

8.49 pm

Mr. Peter Bruinvels (Leicester, East): This is an important debate in which I should have thought that the Conservative and Labour Members representing Leicester would have participated. Having heard the hon. and learned Member for Leicester, West (Mr. Janner) on a number of occasions on the radio assuring the Leicester people that he would be in the House to oppose rate capping, his absence is surprising.

Mr. Straw: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Bruinvels: The concern of myself and my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Leicester, South (Mr. Spencer) is apparent. We are concerned that rate capping, which——

Mr. Straw: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Will you confirm that it is a convention of the House that a Member who is absent should be informed before he is attacked? Is it possible for you to ask the hon. Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Bruinvels) whether he has informed my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Leicester, West (Mr. Janner)?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): The hon. Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Bruinvels) must answer for himself. It is the usual courtesy for an hon. Member who intends criticising another to notify that hon. Member in advance.

Mr. Bruinvels: I am concerned about the allegations about rate capping and what it will do for the people of Leicester and the city council.

Mr. Jeff Rooker (Birmingham, Perry Barr): The hon. Gentleman did not tell my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Leicester, West (Mr. Janner).

Mr. Bruinvels: Any letter that I have sent to the hon. and learned Member for Leicester, West is a private matter between myself and my conscience.

On 25 February we heard that all was doom and despondency for Leicester, that rate capping would be terrible, that jobs would go out the window and that many services would be lost for ever. I am happy to report from my visit to Leicester at the weekend, where I live, that Leicester is still doing well. The jobs are still there, advertisements for jobs are appearing, none of the services has been cut and many job notices are appearing in the Labour council's propaganda magazine "Leicester Link".

Councillors are elected to keep rates down, not to increase public expenditure. We can argue about the percentages in any local vote. Because 30 per cent. of the Leicester electorate voted, one cannot say that an overwhelming majority wanted increased expenditure on public services. Many of those who voted in the city and county elections did not pay rates. Those who pay the rates, especially business men, do not have a vote. Why not? Rates in Leicester have been too high and the business men have been driven out of Leicester. They are now coming back because rates are decreasing with the arrival of rate capping. That makes a lot of sense.

It is amazing to see advertisements in the London Underground, saying "Come to Leicester where the rates have been reduced." The Leicester people should be grateful to the Conservative Government for bringing in the rate-capping legislation. The Leicester city council budget has been set; the Government grant has been agreed; the rate revenue of £10 million has been worked out; and the reserves are there. The 2p in the pound that will be saved this year will bring much prosperity to Leicester and its people.

The red covered "Leicester Link", which is the Labour council's typical monthly paper, admits:

"The total rate . . . is down by just under twopence in the pound on last year.

Leicester City Council reluctantly fixed a rate at its March meeting".

"Reluctantly"? The council was going to fix the rate from the first moment. It was not going to fight, because a number of councillors did not want to be in trouble. They wanted to stand for Parliament in other parts of the country. The councillors did not put their money where their mouths were. It was clear that this was a great whipped-up fear to get the Leicester citizens rushing around, pinning stickers on their buses and lapels and saying, "We shall fight rate capping the whole way." Yet the council did not even lead from the front. It manipulated some of the Leicester people by frightening them about losing their jobs and threatening to close the lovely golf course at Humberstone Heights. I do not play golf, but many people were playing golf on that course at the weekend. That is typical of Labour — it never goes through with its promises.

The scare campaign had some effects. About £65,000 was spent on the campaign and £135,000 is budgeted for this year. The rates legislation saved jobs and many more people are returning to the city.

Robin Treacher, the head of public relations for the city council, said that the council had spent a large sum printing leaflets and had got it wrong. Just like the Islington NUJ, it is a typical case of where the public relations people have been taken advantage of. They had to provide something in which they did not believe. They did as much as they could, scaring some of my constituents and those of my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Leicester, South. I am glad that the Labour councillors could not match that. That was an abuse of the system.

Leicester deserved to be rate capped, and I was delighted that that occurred. The propaganda included pamphlets entitled "Who Pulled the Plug? What Ratecapping Means for Leicester" and pamphlets in Gujarati. I shall not read the Gujarati edition. Not one of the cuts has occurred. No jobs have gone. There has been no reduction in refuse collection and street cleaning, although for some strange reason the men do not like to collect street refuse on Mondays. The inner city housing improvement programme is on target. There has been no cut in benefits—indeed, I admire what the city council has done there.

A large rally was arranged, which I was not able to attend because it was Monday 13 May and the House was sitting. Not many people went there. The Peace Action Group, which is operated through Leicester city council, had on its pamphlet the logo "Nuclear Free Festival Week". The ratepayers' money is being spent on a nuclear free festival week. What does that have to do with jobs and the people? The declaration of a "Nuclear free zone" will not stop us from being bombed. Expenditure of £12,000 warning people that they are entering a nuclear free zone did not reassure my constituents or anyone else — as usual, it made Leicester a laughing stock. The city has two active Conservative Members of Parliament, yet, because it has a Labour council, people want to attack us. We stand up for the people of Leicester.

The Leicester people feel hard done by when they see how much money the city council spends on the politicisation of jobs manipulating some of our citizens.

The unions in Leicester do not want to bring extra jobs to the city, because they are worried about equality of opportunity. They tried to stop 400 jobs from coming in through the community programme. We are fighting for those jobs for the city. We must keep up with the business of rate capping. I urge my right hon. Friend the Minister to ensure that the rates continue as they did before and that the council is checked financially. The Labour group will try to whip up feeling on this matter. Each time in the annual whip-round the Labour group says that it has been fighting all the way to protect the people. Members of that group fight to protect themselves. They scare us and spend more money, yet, at the end of the day, they will not go through with their aims.

I am very keen, as is my hon. Friend the Member for Southampton, Itchen (Mr. Chope), that council services should be put out for competitive tendering. There is a lot to be done there. Leicester proved, when it had the fear of being rate capped, that it could keep within its limits. I should like us to consider what else we as a Government can do to save the citizens in all our great cities a large sum of money, whether it be on vehicle maintenance, refuse collection——

Mr. Rooker: The golf course?

Mr. Bruinvels: Yes, even the golf course—anything that will bring about some savings for the private golf course. This must be welcome to anybody who wishes to see savings made for the citizens of Leicester.

I am worried about the Leicester Labour party. It has now established a research and information unit to supervise the existing public relations campus. It has been called by the civics reporter of the Leicester Mercury, Colin Vann, "the Ministry of propaganda". This research and information unit is comprised of an information officer, two information assistants and a clerical assistant. It is to spend £29,000 a year with three officer contracts to monitor not only what is happening outside but what is going on in the city council. It is to look at the work of the Labour councillors because obviously it is felt that some of them are not Left wing enough! I do not know about that, but I think that it is incredible. Does it not have its own whip to look after the Labour councillors? We have a whip on the Conservative side of the council. Why does it need this monitoring unit?

Mr. Rooker: To check on your questions.

Mr. Bruinvels: It wants to increase public awareness. We all know what is going on in the city of Leicester through the daily Leicester Mercury. We all know what the council is doing because it is advertising this in the Leicester Link. Why is this unit needed? Is that not the kind of thing which would save all the ratepayers of Leicester some money? But, oh no—it also wants to take over education from the county council. A city council to run education? It cannot even run its own council, so why does it want to interfere in education? I suppose that it wants to politicise that as well, and to bring politics into the school room. That is scandalous, it should not be allowed and I shall fight against it. Then there is social services. I suppose that it wants some of its own employees to get social security handouts.

It has a budget of £137,000. That is atrocious. It wants to reject attacks on local autonomy and services. It may wish to do that, but I interpret it as the foundation of extreme Socialism, and I shall have no hesitation in referring this unit directly to the Widdicombe inquiry because I think it is the kind of thing that should be examined.

Keeping the rates down is the most important thing that the Government have so far done. This is bringing real jobs into the city again and giving prosperity to a large number of businesses. If the rates are kept down and

[Mr. Bruinvels]

Leicester gets back into line, I feel certain that, when the next election comes, Leicester will be better off and better run and, I hope, Conservatives will be running the city council.

9.1 pm

Mr. Peter Pike (Burnley): In the early part of the debate, the Minister referred to the county council elections and in particular to the results of Lancashire county council. As a shire county council representative, I think that one should consider Lancashire in perspective.

The Minister should recall that when local government reorganisation took place, all the Labour strongholds on the south side of the county were put into Merseyside, Greater Manchester or Warrington, which was transferred into Cheshire. That was an attempt by the Government to try to ensure that Labour would never take control of that county council.

In 1977, Labour had only 12 seats on the council, in 1981 we moved into a majority, and even this year's results were extremely good for the Labour party. We now have 48 seats, and remain the largest party on the county council.

The Minister referred to the Crosland speech in 1976, as did the hon. Member for Halifax (Mr. Galley). The situation in 1976, when councils were being asked to exercise restraint, was very different from the position which we now face. At that stage, there was no penalty and no rate capping. There was some fat which councils could cut then but, cuts having been made continuously since then, that is no longer so. Any further cuts in local government bite on essential services. As finance chairman, I was called to London at that time to meet Anthony Crosland at party headquarters. We co-operated at that stage. It is important to remember that at that time councils had the right to fix their own rates, a right which has now been removed from them.

My hon. Friend the Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) referred to the reform of local government. The one thing that the legislation that has recently completed its passage through Parliament will give the future Labour Government the opportunity to do is reform the whole of local government. The legislation makes it a priority to deal not only with the metropolitan counties but with the shire counties and, as my hon. Friend said, also to give democratic control over hospitals, water and many other services. I look forward to the day when, as Secretary of State, my hon. Friend introduces a Bill that will take us forward in that direction.

My hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Central (Mr. Litherland) referred to disregards with particular reference to the urban programme. I fully support his comments. We are told repeatedly that the Department of the Environment is considering this issue. But I believe that all expenditure — be it programme, designated authority, partnership or traditional urban—arising from the urban programme should be disregarded.

My hon. Friend also referred to housing benefit, and one must take into account the social security review which will transfer an additional 10 per cent. burden that will have to be met from local government funds.

The Green Paper says that GREs will be adjusted, and it is reasonable to assume that if the Government are to save money—one accepts that that is the purpose of the exercise—the adjustment will not be a full one and that once again the burden will have to be borne by local government.

Paragraph 1*(e)* of the RSG supplementary report for 1985-86 indicates a total overspend of £278 million. I should stress that that is the Government's view, because I do not believe that it is an overspend. but that is 1·27 per cent. above the figure which the Government believe should be spent. That figure has attracted a block grant penalty loss of £550 million, which is equivalent not to 1·27 per cent. but to 6·5 per cent. That is a further blow to local government, local democracy, local services and local ratepayers.

In 1984-85, when the Government determined the overspend to be £841 million, the penalty was £452 million. This increase in the penalty rate is the severest yet and is almost double the overspend. This cut in block grant is returned directly to the Exchequer, and to meet that expenditure the burden must be put on to ratepayers, otherwise essential services will have to be cut yet again and there will have to be further job losses.

Most shire counties have targets below the GRE figure for 1985-86, but this type of penalty has forced them to keep their figures below GRE. That makes a nonsense of the Government's own GRE system.

I have always believed that at some stage the Government would make the GRE the key target figure. If the rumours are correct, that seems to be the path that the Government will now follow. We shall hear the announcement next week. If that is so, while it will benefit many shire counties, including Lancashire, which spends below GRE — given that the penalty to spend at that figure would be too high—it will penalise councils such as Burnley in my borough.

Burnley's cash target is 50 per cent. above its GRE, and it is one of the 13 councils that have a cash target so much above GRE. If the Government are to contain expenditure within the GRE figure, it stands to reason that authorities spending over it will be more heavily penalised. I accept that the rate of grant above GRE is progressively lower, but as the scheme continues I have no doubt that the position will worsen. That will place Burnley and many other authorities in serious difficulties, and it will result in more cuts, more job losses and an inability to deal with problems such as housing, the elderly and all the others with which local government is trying to deal.

I have always believed that Government have a right to fix the total amount of expenditure that councils should be able to spend, but at present that amount is far too low. Local government and Parliament have the right to argue about that amount, but, even more important, local government should be given the freedom to spend the money that it believes is necessary to maintain services.

If the GRE system is to be strengthened and improved, it must be more clearly understood. At present, it is neither understood nor fair. Several times before my election to the House but as leader of the council, and since my election as a Member of Parliament I have met civil servants on the issue. They failed to explain how they arrived at the figures. People in local government do not accept that the system is either fair or right and there must be key changes.

My hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Barnett) referred to a number of factors, and certainly a key one for a non-metropolitan district is the housing factor E7. That is crazy and puts Burnley in an unfavourable position compared to our neighbouring authority, the borough of Blackburn. I cannot see why there should be such a difference. One great problem of the late penalty set out in the third report is that councils have to take it into account after the end of the financial year and after they have fixed their budgets. In Burnley's case that means the council has to find an additional £80,000 for this year. That is the equivalent of 1p on the rates.

It is time the Government devised a much fairer system for local government and allowed democratically-elected local representatives to deal with the problems and services in their areas. I could say a lot more but another of my hon. Friends wishes to speak. I hope that the Government will make changes in the way that they tackle these problems.

9.12 pm

Mr. John Fraser (Norwood): The Minister argued in this debate that somehow rate capping and penalties increased the efficiency of councils. But the game was given away by one Conservative Back Bencher after another. They talked about the pet projects of Labour councils, but what the Government are really about is to use the House as a court of appeal from decisions of elected local councillors. It is no function of ours to decide how an elected local authority should conduct its affairs.

The Minister made a comparison between Wandsworth and Lambeth. The reason why Wandsworth has a low rate is partly because it does not incur penalties, and partly because Wandsworth, within its power, took a political decision to sack people on a very great scale, to abolish services, to cut back on services for the elderly and the young, and to cut back on housing. Those were political decisions, and there is no way a Minister is going to force Labour councils to take decisions of that sort except in the most excruciating circumstances. All this is certainly not going to increase the efficiency of any local authority.

There is no evidence to suggest that the Minister is in any way capable of getting a local authority to change the way it behaves. If that were the case, I would have people coming to me in Lambeth saying that as a result of rate capping and penalties the repair service and housing benefit administration were more efficient, and the admission of people to homes for the elderly was better. There is no evidence that the interaction of what the Government are proposing and what the local authority does leads to an improved service at a lower cost.

What we will have is an increase in inefficiency, because as one gets industrial action or reaction to the Government proposals, as councils are locked in battle with the Government, as penalties pile up and as people are sacked—which is inevitable if cuts are made—what will follow is a lower quality of service and a lower standard of efficiency. There is no link between efficiency and these proposals. It is simply that the Government want to substitute their political judgment for the judgment of elected councillors. The consequence will be a combination of cuts, chaos and confrontation at a cost to the ratepayers,

Even on the present figures of rate capping in Lambeth, on the Government approved level of expenditure of £113million we suffer a penalty of £1·6 million. That is not a penalty on councillors; it is a penalty on the ratepayers. I cannot see the logic of that sort of arrangement. The Government revised the amount of money we can spend in Lambeth to £122 million. Then we were penalised on that Government-approved level of expenditure to a total of £11 million.

The illogicality of the system is at its most acute in relation to urban aid projects. Lambeth council is picking up projects approved by central Government, and time-expired projects in the current year amount to £1·5 million. The Government's failure to review £800,000 of urban aid programme expenditure means that Lambeth will lose £660,000 in grant because it is carrying on with time-expired projects. Next year that figure could be £1·1 million. We end up with a confrontation between Government and councillors in which there can be no victor, only victims.

Taking up the suggestion made by my hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool, Walton (Mr. Heffer), I suggest that in the short time which remains the Government should tell the district auditor that the Government have already stood to benefit by £113 million in grant lost to Lambeth, that in the current year alone the Government can expect a profit of between £1·6 million and £20 million in penalty on the figures contained in the orders and that in view of that very large gain to the Government it is about time that the auditor stopped his depredations and left Lambeth council to make its own political judgment about the level of services to be provided in Lambeth without the Government interfering in this overbearing way with penalties and rate capping.

9.15 pm

Mr. Jack Straw (Blackburn): The debate has been notable for the fine speeches made by my hon. Friends the Members for Manchester, Central (Mr. Litherland), for Liverpool, Walton (Mr. Heffer), for Greenwich (Mr. Barnett), for Norwood (Mr. Fraser) and by my good friend from Lancashire, my hon. Friend the Member for Burnley (Mr. Pike). It has also been notable that at no stage has any representative of what is described as the Social Democratic party been present.

Mr. Waldegrave: As the right hon. Member for Glasgow, Hillhead (Mr. Jenkins) put in a rare appearance today, is it not disappointing that he could not stay among us a few minutes longer?

Mr. Straw: The right hon. Member for Glasgow, Hillhead (Mr. Jenkins) represents a Scottish constituency, although he may not do so for much longer, but, as ever, I share the Minister's concern.

Mr. Simon Hughes: As the hon. Gentleman knows, my colleague and hon. Friend the Member for Woolwich (Mr. Cartwright) speaks for the Social Democratic party on local government. My hon. Friend was in hospital yesterday and is recuperating today. Otherwise, he would have been here. For his sake, it is right that I should put that on the record.

Mr. Straw: I know that the hon. Member for Woolwich (Mr. Cartwright) is an assiduous attender and we send him our commiserations, but I should point out to the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) that there are other members of the Social Democratic party.

In January this year, the Minister for Local Government in what he described as his "maiden speech in a rate support grant debate"

described the system as

[Mr. Straw]

"well nigh incomprehensible and . . . understood only by the initiated."

He went on to say:

"I accept that the system is byzantine in its complexity and that it is probably fully comprehended only by those who have a taste for scholastic theology."—[Official Report, 16 January 1985; Vol. 71, c. 411.]

It is also of interest to those with a taste for error, and our debate today has been punctuated by information about the errors in the report. My hon. Friend the Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) pointed out that a major error of £30 million in the 1982-83 settlement is being institutionalised in the third supplementary report. There is a straightforward solution to errors of that kind which even the Government might accept. Even at this late stage, they should recompense the shire authorities which have been losing for so long without disadvantaging other authorities. We commend that solution to the Government. My hon. Friend the Member for Wansbeck (Mr. Thompson) also pointed out that the figure for Northumberland should be £110 million and not £111 million.

We all appreciate the complexities of the system. Indeed, some complexity is inevitable in any system of grant redistribution. Nevertheless, it is incumbent upon Ministers to ensure that the reports are as accurate as possible; and, when inaccuracies are brought to their attention, they should withdraw the reports until they have been corrected.

There is a third item, which I raise on behalf of my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks), who is chairing a meeting of the Greater London council. This is the first debate on rate support grant, abolition or rate capping that he has missed. Ministers are familiar with the argument. The information in the third supplementary report for 1982-83 is based on the first return submitted by the London borough of Newham some time ago. It submitted a revised return which was certified by its external auditor, Arthur Young. Newham believes that it will suffer severely if its grant entitlement is not based on that revised return. Although the Secretary of State has said that he hopes that the third report will be the final one, I hope that, if he is satisfied with the representations made by Newham, he will be willing to bring forward a fourth supplementary report to accommodate the difficulties that Newham has raised.

Behind what the Minister described as scholastic theology and the complexity and statistical trickery of the rate support grant system lie consequences for local authorities and the people they represent which are simple, straightforward and brutal. The report is part of the crude, politically biased mechanism by which the Government impose their will on local communities and their representatives regardless of those communities' will.

No Government have prayed democracy in aid more than this one and no Government have undermined democracy more than this one. The Government continually fail to comprehend that the essence of democracy is the right to choose, the right to say, "No", the right to disagree. In theory, people have those rights but, in practice, when the people and their representatives try to exercise them, the rights are cut away and the representatives are cut down. Great local authorities are abolished—seven are to be abolished by the Act that received the Royal Assent today—because their voters chose to elect Labour councils. There is no other reason. When the remaining local authorities try to meet the needs of their communities, they are penalised and punished for exercising their democratic rights.

Increasingly, the Government's motto is, "You can do anything you like, provided that we agree." The Minister revealed himself when he described 90 per cent. of authorities over target as Labour and said, "Old habits die hard." What arrogance. Does he not understand that the Labour party is in the habit of caring about communities and of being willing to spend money on them? We are willing to invest in those communities. We have the habit of Socialism and we shall not throw it away just because the tanks of Marsham street driven by the Minister are driven in the way of those authorities. It was revealing when the Minister dismissed the will of those Labour-controlled authorities and their electors by saying that old habits die hard.

Under the first supplementary report for 1985-86, the severest ever penalties are imposed on local authorities —apparently 90 per cent. of them are Labour controlled —which exceed their targets. For every £1 of alleged overspend, £2 is taken away in penalties. To pay for an alleged overspend of £278 million, the Treasury takes back £550 million. So grotesque has the system become that the Treasury now has a vested interest in its continuance. Whatever Department of the Environment Ministers may say, the Treasury wants authorities to spend over their targets, for overspending reduces the public sector borrowing requirement — and it is at the shrine of a diminishing PSBR that the mad monetarists still in charge of the Government worship.

We object root and branch to the target and block grant system which penalises individual authorities for choosing a level at which they should spend. The system is made all the more outrageous by the Government's chosen methods. As I reminded the House, at least the Minister has acknowledged that the system is Byzantine and incomprehensible. The Secretary of State, who, as ever, disagrees with his Minister, told the Committee only last year that the system, which the Minister describes as Byzantine and incomprehensible, provides robust and objective tests. Would that the Secretary of State were telling the truth about the system. There is nothing objective either about targets or GREA. Time and again the system's objectivity has been bent in pursuit of partisan political goals.

Some of my hon. Friends may know of a cosmetic range called Max Factor. It was even the subject of some smutty rhymes when I was at school. The Government use a cosmetic to disguise their true intentions, which is called the E7 factor. The report, at paragraphs 18 and 19, waxes eloquent about the E7 factor in language which I am sure its authors scarcely comprehended. My colleagues can take it from me that the gobbledegook disguises a simple and straightforward fraud on Labour-controlled and higher-spending authorities.

In the Housing Act 1980 local authorities were for the first time allowed to make profits from council tenants. Conservative non-metropolitan districts have taken advantage of that with alacrity. Some authorities, such as Epping Forest, South Oxfordshire, Tandridge and Wansdyke, use profits from their council tenants to pay for between one fifth and one third of expenditure from the general rate fund. Therefore, council tenants pay rents both for their houses, and for the bin and environmental services of all the ratepayers in their area. In effect, council tenants are subsidising richer owner-occupiers.

The position is even worse. To ensure that the Tory shire districts get the best from the rate support grant system, and that they escape penalty, the E7 factor assumes that none of those authorities makes any profit from its housing rent for the purpose of giving it rate support grant. Ratepayers in those areas are, therefore, subsidised twice. Should there be any danger of the Tory shire district reaching its target, the council can increase its rents still further, because expenditure from additional profits does not count against targets. It is an utter scandal. It is not surprising that when a minute marked "Confidential E7 development work" about items that might be politically embarrassing, which was sent from the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State to an official in the Department, was leaked, the Government's embarrassment was extensive.

Today both the Minister and the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State said that 74 per cent. of authorities had been able to live within their targets. However, they have ignored the fact that the rules are designed to enable Tory shire districts to escape. If we weight the authorities by spending, a quite different picture emerges. Conservative authorities such as Essex, Harrow, Enfield and Hillingdon would suffer the consequences of penalties on their expenditure. If the Minister wishes to listen to me, I can answer the question that he has just put to his hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary, as I lip read. Fifty-nine of the 116 major spending authorities—the London boroughs, metropolitan districts and shire counties—are subject to penalty and target. That is a measure of the harm and hurt of the Government system.

The system is so ludicrous that even the Government know that it is likely to collapse under its own weight. The system, which was designed to increase the popularity of the Government, has proved disastrously unpopular, as they discovered in the shire county elections two months ago, and subsequently in their first loss of control of the Association of County Councils. The hapless Minister and the Under-Secretary of State have been set to work to find the Holy Grail and to redeem the tawdry pledge made 10 years ago by the Prime Minister that she would abolish domestic rates.

Tonight, the Minister has been uncharacteristically coy about this work. I note that I have had no reply to a letter that I sent to the Prime Minister almost a fortnight ago seeking answers to simple questions about the studies. I wanted to know when it would be published, whether there would be a Green Paper, and whether it would contain lists of winners and losers. Perhaps at the last minute, as with the social security reviews, the Government will get cold feet and suppress the facts upon which the decisions could be made. Perhaps we shall have to wait until the Conservative party conference for all this information. Whoever will be the new Secretary of State for the Environment—the fact that there will be a new one is certain—will be honing his speech which he will give to the masses there assembled. Will it be the Minister for Local Government? Is he taking a holiday in September? Will he leave his telephone number with No. 10 just in case?

All that is for the future. What of next year? The Secretary of State has repeatedly expressed his desire to sweep away the target system, and the leaks suggest that that may be announced next week. But I warn my hon. Friends and local authorities not to rejoice prematurely. We must all beware Ministers bearing gifts. Unless the Chancellor and the Secretary of State have suddenly abandoned the habits of a political lifetime, most local authorities will be thrown out of the frying pan into a raging fire. If in place of target and penalty we shall have GREA and penalty, the results for all but the shire counties will be significantly worse. The grant-related expenditure assessments of most London boroughs and metropolitan districts are lower than their targets. Therefore, the consequences of basing penalty on GREAs rather than on targets would be even worse.

Moreover, to use GREAs in this way would be a categorical breach of the undertakings given to the House when the GREA system was established in the 1980 Act. The previous Secretary of State for the Environment, now the Secretary of State for Employment, said on 1 April 1980:

"It is not suggested that it"—

the needs assessment—

"prescribes a specific level to which an authority ought to spend . . . I want to make it clear that that was not the purpose. We are seeking to find the fairest way to distribute public money to local authorities."—[Official Report, Standing Committee D, 1 April 1980, c. 941.]

The Secretary of State had said earlier:

"My Department will not be in the business of saying how much each authority should spend, where it should or should not make cuts or on what it should spend money. Local authorities are autonomous. They fix their rate systems."—[Official Report, Standing Committee D, 27 March 1980, c. 840-41.]

On the basis of those undertakings, the House accepted the principle of GREA in 1980.

The main question that we must ask is: what has been achieved by all the mess, misery and chaos of the past six years? It has certainly not helped the Government's popularity nor, sadly, the Secretary of State's career. In what way has it improved the welfare of the nation, our economy or even unemployment, for which the Government now profess concern? The answer is that no benefit has been achieved. Ministers weep crocodile tears about domestic and business ratepayers, but they know that rates have increased by 80 per cent. above the rate of inflation because of their cuts in rate support grant. In government, Labour's policies produced lower rates, and would have continued to do so had we remained in government. In so far as business rates have increased, the Government know that there is not a shred of evidence to support their claim that rates increases have caused the loss of jobs.

It was, after all, this Government who ordered the £50,000 study from the University of Cambridge on the effects of rates upon the location of employment. It was that report which confirmed not just what we have been saying but what many reputable independent firms of surveyors have been saying — that there is no relationship between rate levels and the loss of jobs.

The Government can, of course, dredge up the comments of Conservative business men who say that rates are a burden, but they have had the report for six months and produced not a paragraph of proper refutation of its conclusions.

The report concluded that there was a failure to detect a locational effect of rates, which probably indicates that no such effect exists. The report went on to say that "in contrast to the negative conclusion concerning rates, the study draws attention to different factors that have a large and measurable effect upon location, in particular manufacturing and employment trends, the mix of industries, the size of factories and the extent to which an area is urbanised".

The report not only said that but went on to say that Labour authorities—the authorities spending more and therefore rating more—might be the ones that were creating jobs. The report went on to say:

"If high rates are used to finance high local authority spending, it is likely that a local authority's own workforce will be larger than it would otherwise have been. If this is the case, a high level of rates will be associated with a high level of local employment. This is the opposite of the conventional argument that high rates are harmful for local employment".

The conclusion of the report is that it is Labour councils which have been protecting jobs and the Conservative Government who have been destroying them. [Interruption.] I am sorry to discomfort Conservative Members with the truth, but they should read the report. I know that they do not ever wish to have facts to illuminate their prejudices, but if they want to know the truth about rates and jobs they should read the Department's own report.

Until two weeks ago the Government could at least claim the merit of consistency. They could claim that they have been saying again and again that they were against public spending; that it was bad for Britain and had to be cut. But even that alibi, that excuse, has now gone. It has been shot away by the Chancellor of the Exchequer in his panic speech in Oxford after the trauma of Brecon. He now tells us, after all this, that the Government are in favour of public spending. I quote from the report in the Conservative Party News Service, where the Chancellor is recorded as saying:

"Our public spending record is a good one. It is the middle way".

He went on to say:

"we do spend more where it is needed. On doctors. On nurses. On each pupil at school".

It is true that the public sector as a whole, the local authorities, are now spending more on each pupil at school than in 1979, but that is no thanks to this Government. Had this Government had their way, and had their expenditure plans worked out as they intended, expenditure per pupil would have dropped by £55 per head in real terms between 1980 and 1985. It has risen by £115 per head only because local authorities, led by good Labour groups, have put the needs of the children of their areas above the harsh and brutal spending plans of the Government.

For that record of increasing spending on each pupil at school, the Chancellor of the Exchequer—the man who now claims credit for the improvement—has sought to brow-beat authorities with every weapon at his disposal to get them to reduce their spending. What audacity; what hypocrisy.

At today's prices, expenditure per pupil was planned by this Government to fall from £1,130 in 1980-81 to £1,085 in 1984-85; in fact, it has increased from £1,050 to £1,065. If that increase in expenditure on pupils at school is a good thing, and if the Government now claim credit for such an increase, why have the Government repeatedly, and by these orders tonight, sought to pile penalty after penalty on authorities which have been seeking to do no more than that which the Government now proclaim? An answer from the Government is required.

We have a Government who are bereft of ideology, principle and purpose. The orders achieve nothing but vindictiveness upon local authorities and hurt for the communities that they serve. They are worthy of the Ministers responsible for them, and we shall oppose them.

9.40 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. William Waldegrave): It is pleasant to return to a rate support grant order debate. For some reason, I have missed one or two. Nothing seems to have changed very much in my absence, and certainly not the speeches of the hon. Members for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) and for Blackburn (Mr. Straw). At the end of his remarks, the hon. Member for Blackburn entered into his PESC speech, his public expenditure speech. Perhaps there will be a reshuffle of those on the Opposition Front Bench in due course.

One notable absence is that of the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks), who is chairing his great council almost for the last time. My right hon. and hon. Friends and I have missed his moderate and quiet analyses, his tact in dealing with the issues before us and his courtesy to all and sundry. The only differences in the speeches of the hon. Members for Copeland and for Blackburn since I last heard them is that their tongues sink rather deeper into their cheeks each time they make them.

We have had the speeches about the end of civilisation, democracy and local government as we know it. We had a classic version from the hon. Member for Greenwich (Mr. Barnett). The problem for Labour Members is that democracy refuses to come to an end, as does local government, and the world goes quietly on. In the prediction game, the predictions made by Conservative Members seem, on the whole, to come rather more nearly true.

In one of these debates a couple of years ago the hon. Member for Blackburn said that rates would increase in Kensington and Chelsea by 40 per cent. In fact, they increased by 9 per cent., and this year they have been reduced by 9 per cent. The actual results this year seem to be rather closer to what the Government said would happen than the predictions of the hon. Members for Copeland and Blackburn and their right hon. and hon. Friends. We have heard their dire predictions about collapses of local authorities and the rating system, but 74 per cent. of all local authorities were able to meet their targets and 88 per cent. of them came within 2 per cent. of their targets. Only 14 authorities exceeded their targets by more than 5 per cent.

That is not too bad and the outturn was not too far from what we predicted. The net result is that total local authority spending has been held steady in real terms. The very long-term trend to which my right hon. Friend the Minister for Local Government referred, which we have slowed since 1979, has now been stopped.

In a philosophical soliloquy the hon. Member for Blackburn asked, "What has it all been for?" The answer is that we have done that for which we were elected. We have succeeded in slowing down and stopping the overall growth in local authority expenditure.

Mr. Straw rose——

Mr. Waldegrave: No, I shall not give way. The hon. Gentleman has only recently concluded his speech and he did not leave me quite as much time as we agreed upon. I shall press on. The purpose of the exercise has been expenditure restraint.

We have had some splendid speeches from my hon. Friends. I have in mind my hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, South (Mr. Powley), my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Leicester, South (Mr. Spencer) and my hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Bruinvels). My hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, South said once again, and rightly, that the penalties on high-spending authorities are all part of the process of putting pressure where it should be, which is on the high spenders, the profligate authorities, so that more responsible authorities can be treated more fairly. That is what the orders are all about and that is the purpose of our restraint on local authority spending. I am grateful for the support of my hon. Friends.

I sympathised with several of the arguments of the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes), one of which was for stability. The objective of all my right hon. and hon. Friends and myself is to make all the improvements that must be introduced into the system. The Audit Commission's report has been quoted at us and I accept its criticisms on the capital control side and on the complexities of the system. I accept that stability must be one of our objectives.

The other side of the coin has been presented throughout the debate. It has been said that we must have specific changes to the local authority system that will provide perfection. That argument was not advanced by the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey, who stood four square with the view that it would be better for the procedures to be slightly simpler and for there to be an element of rough justice if we could achieve more stability. That is a fair criticism of the present system.

In directing themselves to the 1982-83 final report, the hon. Member for Copeland and my hon. Friends the Members for Tiverton (Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop) and for Halifax (Mr. Galley) all referred to "the mistake". I shall not shelter behind the word "anomaly". In the difficult decisions that my right hon. Friends have to make, that is a classic example of the tension that exists when trying to perfect the system at the cost of importing further instability. When that mistake was discovered and discussed with local authorities way back in 1982-83, after we had made the point that there would be a disregard in that year — the hon. Member for Blackburn will remember that there was a GRE exemption that year and that it therefore mattered how GRE related to targets— there was no continuing pressure from local authorities to make changes.

It is fair to say that the Association of Metropolitan Authorities and some authorities have been urging us to correct that mistake. That can be done only at the cost of importing further instability into the system elsewhere. Today we are being urged to make changes and shift money in mid-year. That would be difficult for local authorities. We must find a balance. That was a difficult decision for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, and that is why he came down on the side that he did. It was a reasonable decision.

The hon. Member for Blackburn made a point about Newham on behalf of his hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-West. As the hon. Gentleman is aware, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has a statutory duty to use the best information available to him. When two outturn figures are given to him, he has a difficult judgment to make. I shall draw my right hon. Friend's attention to what the hon. Gentleman said and he will reconsider the matter. I do not give a commitment that he will change his decision.

On the 1985-86 report, my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Feltham and Heston (Mr. Ground) asked about the Hounslow change. That was one of the improvements that caused the instability. It is a factor that must be remembered when people are urging us further to refine the GRE factors. There was a change which had an effect on some authorities, including Hounslow.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has carefully considered Hounslow's request. The 1982-83 precedent is not a fair one to use. The matter about which my hon. Friend asked is not a mistake; it is a change derived from the improvement. It would not be right to "safety net" the changes as was done with the earlier anomalies.

I am not convinced by my hon. Friend's arguments. When we are urged by delegations – I see a great many of them — to make further changes and exact adjustments to the system, that always results in an unexpected change elsewhere. That is one of the arguments for not making too many changes from year to year. I know that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State appreciates that fact.

We have begun to slow down the growth of local authority expenditure which has been continuing year in, year out for 30 years. It was, on average, 3·5 per cent. higher than inflation throughout the 1960s. We began to slow it down after 1979. Until this year, we had a real average increase of about 1 per cent. That is still formidable. We were teased by the hon. Member for Copeland for not having done more. We were asked whether we were proud of our record in controlling spending. I do not think that we are. We should have liked to have done more. That is what we were elected for. This year, we have stabilised it.

Attention has now turned — it should have turned earlier to some extent — to how to obtain value for money out of the existing spending. There are no slashing cuts in overall resources. There must be an inexorable search for value for money so as to deliver services from stable resources.

The Audit Commission's report has been mentioned today. I have heard some astonishing things said about the auditor by people who, with respect, should know better. I was astonished, for example, to hear the hon. Member for Norwood (Mr. Fraser) say that my right hon. Friends should tell the auditor this or that. He may have been pulling our leg, because he is aware that my right hon. Friends cannot legally tell the auditor, X, Y or Z. He is independent, and it would be a fundamental infringement of one of the points of his constitution, which is so often prayed in aid in those matters, if we were to interfere with the auditor's independence. I am sure that the hon. Member did not mean that. If he wants to withdraw it, I shall be happy to give way to him.

Mr. John Fraser: I am not suggesting anything about the auditor's statutory functions. However, it is open to the Government to represent to him that a massive profit has been made by the Treasury out of these machinations, and that should be taken into account when he makes his final decision.

Mr. Waldegrave: The auditor has a statutory duty as to what to do if he believes that there has been illegal behaviour in a local authority. If we were to start making the political points that the hon. Gentleman suggests that we should make, I hope that the auditor would not open our letters but simply return them to us.

I am sorry that I was not here to hear the speech of the hon. Member for Liverpool, Walton (Mr. Heffer), but my right hon. Friend the Minister for Local Government has reported on it to me. I gather that the hon. Gentleman also wanted us to repeal the legislation in which the statutory independence of the auditor is enshrined. That is a serious suggestion. I hope that that is not the policy of the Labour party. If it is, it is a new policy. The late lamented Mr. Anthony Crosland was among the foremost in defending the independence of the auditor. If I have misrepresented the hon. Gentleman, I shall give way.

Mr. Heffer: I did not say anything of the kind. The hon. Gentleman had better read what I said. Do not local authorities have statutory obligations? Do they not have to carry out certain functions based upon legislation? They are choosing not to carry out the law because of the Government's policy.

Mr. Waldegrave: I have not heard any suggestion from the hon. Gentleman's local council that it has gone to court to say, for example, that the targets have prevented it from carrying out its statutory duty. There is a clear statutory duty on the auditor to pursue any allegation of illegal behaviour, and there is nothing that my right hon. Friends can, should or will do to interfere.

The Audit Commission has made recommendations to the local authorities about value for money. Often value for money can be achieved to increase the services elsewhere or to give money back to the ratepayer. It is up to the judgment of the local authority to decide which of those courses to follow.

My right hon. Friend the Minister for Local Government asked for the view of Labour Members as to why there are such huge differences in spending—for example, £126 per pupil on school cleaning in one authority and £31 in another. This cannot be because there is that much more cleaning to do. The Audit Commission does not believe that. There is the example of vans that are serviced every 10 miles. Nobody can pretend that that is anything other than bad management.

One authority is able to fill all but 0·5 per cent. of its housing stock, whereas other authorities have 5 per cent. of their housing stock vacant. This is bad management and a waste of resources. Any elected official is a trustee of other people's resources, and it is a serious matter if he is not using properly the money that is entrusted to him.

In its recent report on further and higher education colleges, the Audit Commission estimates total possible savings without damaging services at between £125 million and £150 million a year. That money could pay for 75,000 more students, or could be given back to help local industry. The Audit Commission found some lecturers teaching only 10 hours a week. In one college, it estimated that slack management cost £235,000 a year. Bad debt management cost £70,000 in another.

However, there are other colleges that are doing well and it is right to congratulate them. The good colleges are not necessarily in Conservative authorities. I can quote a good college in a Labour district, Wakefield district college. It is a model of what can done with such a college. It is open for 48 weeks in a year while most are open for only 36 weeks. Courses are tightly managed, achieving excellent exam results while pushing pupil-teacher ratios of 8:1 which is more generous than for a full research university, to 14:1 which is more as it should be. The college has a 96 per cent. retention ratio on its courses. What is wrong with that? We must ask why, if Wakefield can do that, others cannot.

Mr. Barnett rose——

Mr. Waldegrave: I have only a few more minutes, and the hon. Gentleman made a long speech, so I shall not give way.

The hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) quoted from The Guardian. I read The Guardian, too. In today's edition of The Guardian Maureen O'Connor says that Newham's 3,000 surplus secondary school places are not only bad for the school, because they are distorting the size of the school, but cost the borough about £1 million a year, just in wasted resources. I know that I have the hon. Members for Copeland and for Blackburn with me on this point. The hon. Member for Blackburn has a long and honourable record on value for money. He was quoted in the Daily Telegraph of 6 June 1984 as having said the following at a Chartered Institute of Public Finance and Accountancy conference in Brighton:

> "There is a private joke in the Labour party that the two main obstacles to socialism are Margaret Thatcher and the Camden Housing Department, to which I might add the Islington Building Works Department, certainly when I was its Chairman."

That is very engaging and open. The hon. Gentleman continues:

> "All of us have had some personal experience of a public service which has been rude, or inefficient, or incompetent which has appeared in short to be serving itself rather than the public.
> If the public sector as a whole had apparently been less self-serving, less complacent and more efficient, then the climate for cuts and privatisation would have been altogether far less favourable."

That is a very honest and straightforward thing to say. Let me press the hon. Gentleman a little bit further.

I calculate that the Audit Commission shows that there could be savings of about £1 billion a year, and it has looked at only one quarter of local spending so far. Regardless of whether that should go back to the ratepayer or the business man — that is the political divide between us—nobody in the Opposition will try to argue that those savings are not there for the making, because they are, and they should be, and it is a disgrace that they are not.

Mr. George Walden (Buckingham): Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Waldegrave: With respect, I must complete my speech.

We have heard the usual accounts of the Liverpool problems. The Labour council seems to be sleepwalking towards disaster. I understand that as a result of Mr. Scargill sending for the leader of the Labour party last week, the unfortunate hon. Members for Copeland and for Blackburn are now being sent off in their turn to talk to Mr. Hatton and his cronies in Liverpool. They may take some advisers with them—I recommend that they take the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field), who knows how to deal with Militant, or perhaps the hon. Member for Knowsley, North (Mr. Kilroy-Silk), who hopes that he knows how to deal with Militant. Perhaps with the two of them as bodyguards they will get on.

I hope that the hon. Member for Blackburn will share with Liverpool councillors his experience as chairman of the Islington building works department, so that he can explain about searching for value for money. Let me repeat the figure. For every £10 million of saving there would be £22 million more grant available to Liverpool. It is within the council's capacity to find its own salvation. I should like to explore further——

Mr. Heffer: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Waldegrave: I must complete my speech. I want to explore one further area——

Mr. Heffer rose——

Mr. Waldegrave: I shall not give way to the hon. Gentleman.

I want to explore with Opposition spokesmen one further area of potential agreement. I do not expect the hon. Member for Blackburn to support the Rates Act. He was bitterly opposed to the 19 per cent. rate cut that we delivered for the ratepayers of Greenwich, the 25 per cent. cut for Southwark and the 32 per cent. cut for Leicester. My hon. Friend the Member for Dulwich (Mr. Bowden), my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Leicester, South and my hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, East gave robust and welcome support to the benefits that have been achieved for their ratepayers.

However, I think that we may agree with the hon. Member for Blackburn in our views of the utterly disgraceful campaign waged by some Labour rate-capped councils. The hon. Gentleman was the victim of some of it. He was ridiculed by one of Ms. Margaret Hodge's propaganda sheets. He was a threat to local democracy because he had used local politics as a stepping stone to this place. Some people must look with amusement at the way in which some leaders of the London Labour party are scrabbling their way into this place, doing exactly the sort of thing that they criticised the hon. Gentleman for doing.

In the campaign not only were there absurd claims and not only was the hon. Member for Blackburn called a threat to democracy. The campaign was not just seeking to prevent the House from having the benefit of the many people who have served in local democracy, many of whom we have heard today, including my right hon. Friend the Minister for Local Government, who was a local councillor. It was that the whole campaign, which was certainly a fiasco, was not entirely a comic fiasco. Nobody will challenge me in saying that it was a fiasco. Certainly the SDP will not challenge me, for Councillor Anne Sofer wrote yesterday:

"the great anti-abolition and anti-rate capping campaigns now echo sadly like tunes from last year's pop festival—the first played out and the second an expensive flop. What the London public sees now, when it looks at the London Labour party, is a bunch of squabbling incompetents".

That is the SDP's view.

I end with a more objective source. Stewart Lansley, a former Labour councillor, is now above politics—he has become a researcher for LWT—although, perhaps for old times' sake, he still contributes to New Socialist, a small circulation magazine. He writes:

"far from creating a crisis for the Government, Labour has manufactured a crisis of its own."

He went on:

"The responsibility for the . . . Labour . . . party's failure to measure up to the challenge lies not merely with local leaders but with the party leadership and the national executive. Neil Kinnock offered no leadership, and no strategy, save capitulation."

That is only the Leader of the Opposition's local government policy, not even his defence policy.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved,

That the Rate Support Grant Supplementary Report (England) (No. 3) 1982 83 (House of Commons Paper No. 504), which was laid before this House on 11th July, be approved.

Motion made, and Question put,

That the Rate Support Grant Supplementary Report (England) 1985 86 (House of Commons Paper No. 478), which was laid before this House on 4th July, be approved.—[Mr. Kenneth Baker.]

Rate Support Grant (Wales)

10.13 pm

The Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Nicholas Edwards): I beg to move,

That the Welsh Rate Support Grant Supplementary (No. 2) Report 1983-84 (House of Commons Paper No. 448), which was laid before this House on 4th July, be approved.

I hope that it will be convenient if at the same time we discuss the Welsh Rate Support Grant Supplementary Report 1985-86 (House of Commons Paper No. 449).

Mr. Ray Powell (Ogmore): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. We have all received copies from the Vote Office of the reports on which the Secretary of State for Wales is just about to speak, and I seek your guidance. Earlier this evening, when we were debating the report on which we have just voted, a point of order was raised about discrepancies amounting to some £1 million. That affects the figures on page 27 of that report and all local authorities in England. Indeed, only 12 months ago the Secretary of State for Wales had to admit to the House that many mistakes were contained in the report that was then debated. The treasurers of all the Welsh local authorities have estimated future rates assessments on the figures that have been published in the two booklets that were available to the House on 4 and 9 July. Can you assure us that the Secretary of State will give a personal assurance, before any statement is made, that all the figures contained in those documents are absolutely and perfectly correct? It would be pointless for the House to debate this issue unless we can have that clear assurance.

The treasurer of the Ogwr borough has sent me a list of detailed percentages and estimated rate grants since 1981-82. He has also highlighted the difficulty faced by all the councillors in that borough—half of whom I represent—in trying to fix a rate assessment to the figure to which the Secretary of State has instructed them to adhere.

In order to ensure that in no way will they be subjected to an order by the Secretary of State if they overspend, can we have an assurance that the figures given to those treasurers are perfectly and absolutely correct? Unless we can have such an assurance, I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that you will agree that unfortunately the House will be unable to continue with this debate.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. It may help the House if I say that I express regret that the report as laid—the Welsh Rate Support Grant Supplementary (No. 2) Report 1983-84—contains some small printing errors that were corrected by the issue of a printed slip that was placed with the reports in the Vote Office. As I think the hon. Member for Ogmore (Mr. Powell) knows, I wrote to all Welsh Members on 15 July drawing attention to these corrections. The same corrections are also being drawn to the attention of the local authorities in Wales. I am sorry that these printing errors have occurred, but we have corrected them in advance. I have already looked in the reports lying on the Table, and see that the errata slips are correctly with them. I therefore hope that there will be no inconvenience to the House.

Mr. Ray Powell: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. Surely that admission alone proves conclusively that it is not possible to debate this issue. The two reports are confusing in themselves, but we must then find two small slips and try to adjust the figures. What on earth is the Secretary of State trying to do to people in Wales?

Mr. Ted Rowlands (Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney): How many millions of slips have gone out?

Mr. Powell: As my hon. Friend the Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands) has said, how many millions of slips have gone out? Many people in Wales are concerned about these orders. What effect will the mistakes by the Welsh Office have on the people of Wales? These mistakes were made 12 months ago, and one would have thought the Government could have righted the wrongs and given us a true and proper statement.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): Order. That is not a point of order for me. It is a matter for the Government, not for the Chair.

Mr. Donald Coleman (Neath): The Secretary of State for Wales said he had sent these slips to Welsh Members. But this order concerns not only Welsh Members; English and Scottish Members will be voting on it. What information have they been given?

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: I was careful to say that correction slips had been placed with the orders in the Vote Office, and that I had checked that the orders lying on the table had correction slips with them. I was most careful to ensure that all hon. Members and not just Welsh Members would have the correction slips available.

Mr. Barry Jones (Alyn and Deeside): The right hon. Gentleman does not seem to be able to answer my hon. Friend the Member for Ogmore (Mr. Powell). I understand that the figures are not exactly trifling. The errors total £45 million and £3·4 million.

Mr. Edwards: These reports put into effect a number of adjustments to the rate support grants payable to local authorities in Wales, the details of which I will come to in a moment. The reports have a wider significance because they help to highlight the part that most local councils in Wales are playing in achieving a more effective use of resources and the better balance between private and public sector resources that is fundamental to the task of regenerating the Welsh economy. In the present year, 1985-86, local authorities have come near to achieving the targets I have set for local government spending, with responsible rating decisions by most of them. This is welcome news to ratepayers and to all those who wish to see Wales become an even more attractive location for commerce and industry.

Mr. Ray Powell: I should like to come back to the target figure. Can we have the Secretary of State's assurance that the target figures he has talked about and which have been issued to local authorities are correct.

Mr. Edwards: I can tell the hon. Gentleman that the errors which have been identified are not in the order, which deals with the targets for the current year, but in the final winding up order. We have drawn them to the attention of the House and they are not difficult to comprehend. As I said, I have taken the trouble to write to the hon. Member for Alyn and Deeside (Mr. Jones) and I have sent correction slips to Welsh Members and placed slips in the House before the debate.

Mr. Alan Williams (Swansea, West): Will the Secretary of State answer my hon. Friend? Is he giving us a categorical assurance that all the other figures are absolutely correct and that he stands by them?

Mr. Edwards: I am coming to the House on the basis that the figures are correct. If any Member of the House were to guarantee that nowhere was there a semi-colon out of place, he would be very rash indeed. I can certainly give the assurance that these documents have been very carefully checked, some typographical errors having been discovered. On that basis I am presenting them to the House and hope they will be approved.

The record of Welsh local government in meeting the targets speaks for itself. In the first year of the separate Welsh arrangements, 1981-82, total expenditure was about £48 million or 4·4 per cent. above target. In current expenditure terms, the excess was £41 million or 4 per cent. In the present year budgeted total expenditure exceeds my target by only £4·6 million or 0·3 per cent. with a current expenditure excess of £14 million or 1 per cent. I have every hope that by next year that final 1 per cent. will have been eliminated and that local authority current expenditure in Wales will have returned in real terms to the level at which it was when we took office in 1979. It is worth emphasising that that is my objective —to bring local authority spending back to the level at which it was when we took office.

I acknowledge that halting the upward spiral of local authority current spending has not been achieved without a great deal of effort on the part of local government. Councils have been obliged to make a careful re-assessment of priorities and to pursue greater efficiency, and I thank them for their efforts. More important than any thanks or commendations from me, however, there have been some very important consequential benefits.

First, rates in Wales have risen on average by less than the rise in inflation since 1981-82. Secondly, despite the reduced rate of growth in current spending local authorities have been able broadly to maintain, and in some cases to improve, the level of key services. Expenditure on the police has increased by 18 per cent. more than the rise in costs in the economy as a whole during the period 1979-80 to 1985-86. Spending on personal social services has grown by 9 per cent. with significant increases in the number of social workers and home helps. Residential provision has expanded and I have been able to introduce an initiative for the mentally handicapped which is initially 100 per cent. grant aided. Current spending on the urban programme has more than doubled in cost terms and an even greater growth has been achieved on the capital account. We have heard loud complaints about insufficient resources being available for education, but education spending has increased, despite the large fall in pupil numbers. Last, but not least, the achievement of local authorities in limiting their current spending has enabled me to release considerable additional resources for capital spending. Since 1981-82, when I assumed direct responsibility for rate support grant and capital allocations in Wales, gross capital spending by local authorities has risen by 46 per cent. or twice as fast as inflation.

The Welsh Rate Support Grant Supplementary (No. 2) Report 1983-84 finalises the rate support grant for that year. The first supplementary report for 1983-84, approved by the House in July 1983, withheld £12·6 million grant in respect of a gross spending excess at budget stage of £22·7 million. Outturn figures now show that the gross excess, after disregards, has been reduced to £17·5 million. This enables me to reduce the amount of grant withheld by £2·6 million to £10 million. I welcome the fact that two county and five district councils have successfully brought their budgeted spending down to target and now, in common with the large majority of other councils, avoid any grant penalties at all. The £3·5 million in grant previously withheld from those authorities will be restored to them by means of this supplementary report. Sadly, three authorities — Clwyd, Mid-Glamorgan and Ogwr — have actually increased expenditure between budget and outturn, resulted in additional holdback of £421,000, £844,000 and £446,000 respectively. Grant penalties for those authorities are accordingly increased.

At this point I must refer to the report in last Thursday's Western Mail which alleged that the grant adjustments made by this report to reflect the actual level of interest rates in 1983-84 came as a "bombshell" to local authorities. I find that allegation astonishing. By a long-standing convention, agreed with the local authority associations, interest rates have always been adjusted in final RSG reports. Adjustments in grant for this reason were made in 1981-82 and in 1982-83, and I find it unbelievable that local authorities were unaware that interest rates were falling in 1983-84 and that this would mean that spending would fall as well as their entitlement to grant. The suggestion is absurd.

I see that, in the debate on the corresponding motion on 18 July last year, reported in Hansard Vol. 64, c. 416, I told the House that exactly the same thing had happened in 1982-83. I also told the House that the adjustment can work both ways. Indeed, I strongly suspect that for 1984-85 the outcome will be an increase in grant. Every local authority knows perfectly well that, under successive Governments, adjustments of this kind have been made so that grant relates to actual expenditure. Adjustments of grant for this reason were made by the Labour Government in each of the years when they were last in office. Against that background it really would be a bombshell if any local authority treasurer did not know or failed to plan accordingly.

Mr. Allan Rogers (Rhondda): The Secretary of State said that grant has been adjusted to changes in interest rates. Can he explain the changes between 1981 and 1984 and say how much they have affected RSG for Welsh local authorities?

Mr. Edwards: The results of the changes are set out in the report. This is one of the consequences with which we are dealing. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will wait until I give the total figures. If he has any questions about individual local authorities, perhaps I can deal with them when, with the leave of the House, I reply to the debate.

The article went on to suggest that the interest rate adjustment was the more painful because of higher spending on house renovation grants in 1983-84. However, the writer seemed to have overlooked the crucial fact that the Welsh Office provided 90 per cent. of the cash for financing these grants and that, in addition, the balance qualified for RSG support. The fact that only three districts have exceeded their target for 1983-84 reinforces the point that the improvement grant factor has been grossly overplayed.

The net effect of these technical changes — I am giving the figures for which the hon. Member for Rhondda

[Mr. Edwards]

(Mr. Rogers) asked—made by the report is to reduce relevant expenditure by £6 million. The block grant element is reduced by £2·9 million—0·4 per cent.—but specific grants are increased by £3·4 million, resulting in a £0·5 million increase in aggregate Exchequer grant. Aggregate Exchequer grant is about 4 per cent. higher than in 1982-83.

Copies of the report have been sent to each local authority in Wales with details of their revised grant entitlement. Adjustments to the payment of grants will, of course, be consequential upon the House approving the report.

Mr. Allan Rogers: I did not ask the Secretary of State about the outturn figures and the total of grant available adjusted according to interest rates, but what the interest rates were. I understand that interest rates have increased and that therefore the total of grant going to local authorities should have gone up accordingly. Can the Secretary of State not give a simple answer to a simple question? How have interest rates varied during the past four years?

Mr. Edwards: We are dealing with a particular year in which interest rates fell. As a result, local government expenditure fell, and as a result of that, authorities are not entitled to as much grant. Last year in the same debate the hon. Member for Rhondda (Mr. Rogers) asked whether, if interest rates rose, a similar adjustment would be made upwards, and I said that it would. If he had listened earlier, he would have heard me repeat that advice in this speech. We make an estimate of what interest rates are likely to be in the year, and, like all our predecessors of both parties, when we know the actual interest rate totals at the end of the period, we make the corresponding adjustment.

The supplementary report for 1985-86 is based on local authorities' budgets. The main report for the year, which was approved by the House on 16 January 1985, set out the basis on which grant would be withheld from authorities planning to spend in excess of their expenditure targets. Of 45 county and district councils in Wales, no fewer than 40 — six county councils and 34 district councils — are planning to spend at or below target. Overall, total spending is only £4·6 million or 0·3 per cent. above the aggregate target. At budget stage, that is a remarkably good performance by Welsh local authorities, and I am delighted to place on record my appreciation of their co-operation in seeking to restrain public spending.

The five authorities — two county councils, Dyfed and Mid Glamorgan, and three district councils, Merthyr Tydfil, Wrexham Maelor and Ynys Môn—planning to spend above target have a total gross overspend of £4·6 million. That is a large figure for such a small number of authorities, and I have no hesitation in putting into effect the holdback formula agreed by the House in January. Under the terms set out in the main report that amounts to £5·5 million. That is a direct and avoidable cost, which those authorities have asked their ratepayers to bear.

I hope that the authorities concerned will review their spending decisions carefully in the light of this supplementary report, as it is still open to them to adjust their spending between now and the end of the financial year. By living within the targets that I have set, they can rid themselves of the unnecessary burden of grant holdback. Experience in 1983-84 shows that it is perfectly possible to get down to target by outturn, if the will is there.

Dr. John Marek (Wrexham): The Secretary of State put forward his view about Wrexham Maelor. In reality, the Wrexham Maelor borough council does not want to cut services to its citizens, which is why it has chosen its present course of action.

Mr. Edwards: I hope that Wrexham's ratepayers note that they are having a heavy unnecessary additional burden placed on them. It is one of only three Welsh district authorities which apparently must spend more than the targets. I do not believe that the great majority of district councils in Wales are uncaring or irresponsible about the needs of their local communities, and yet they have been able to live within the reasonable targets that I have set.

The marked reduction in overspending is welcome news for industry and commerce in Wales, and for the ratepayers of those authorities which are heeding our expenditure guidelines. Welsh local authorities are close to achieving the overall goal which I have set. I look forward with confidence to its achievement, with the benefits it will bring to taxpayer and ratepayer alike.

I commend the two reports to the House.

Mr. Barry Jones (Alyn and Deeside): It is fair to say that the Secretary of State's slip is showing tonight. I remind him of the incorrect figures of about £45 million for education and about £3·4 million elsewhere. It is wrong that so many of his senior officials shoud be involved in this retrograde and wretched system of targets and penalties. He should know that his officials could be far better employed than having to run this unpopular and unsuccessful system.

The right hon. Gentleman did not say that the scale of his penalties was draconian. I must protest about them, because in 1985-86, as a percentage of gross expenditure excess, these penalties now stand at 120 per cent. This is a crippling penalty to impose on Welsh local authorities. It was incredible to hear the Secretary of State boast that his objective was to return to 1979 levels of local government expenditure, when we know from debates and questions in the House that unemployment has increased by 125 per cent. since he became Secretary of State for Wales. The right hon. Gentleman should have said that he would give us more money, so that our local authorities could cope with the challenges which have been created by the failure of the Government's policies.

It should be said as loudly as possible throughout Wales that the Welsh rate support grant, as a percentage of expenditure, has been reduced from 72·5 per cent. in 1982-83 to 67 per cent. under the right hon. Gentleman's regime, about which he boasts. He has set our local authorities, which have major unemployment problems, a most difficult task.

The supplementary report for 1985-86 empowers the Secretary of State to put into effect the proposals set out in the original report, which involve the implementation of target and penalty regimes. As for our eight county councils, this means that, because of an expenditure excess of just more than £4 million, there will be a witholding of grant of nearly £4·7 million. The same applies to Wales' 37 district councils. They budgeted to spend £450,000 less than the Government's estimate of their total expenditure, but they will suffer a grant holdback of £855,000.

The supposed transgressors are Merthyr Tydfil, Wrexham Maelor and Ynys Môn. To put those figures into context, I remind the House that in the main report——

Mr. Ray Powell: My hon. Friend is right to say that Ynys Môn will be subject to holdback. Will he comment on the fact that that local authority is represented by a Conservative Member of Parliament, who used to be the Parliamentary Private Secretary to the Secretary of State? I wonder whether the hon. Member for Ynys Môn (Mr. Best) will comment later on the effect of this proposal on his local authority?

Mr. Jones: I understand the thrust of my hon. Friend's intervention. Perhaps the hon. Member for Ynys Môn (Mr. Best) will catch your eye later, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and can justify the penalisation of his local authority. We look forward to hearing his response to this unjust treatment of the island of Anglesey.

The Welsh local authorities will exceed the Secretary of State's expenditure estimate by only 0·3 per cent., but they will incur penalties of £5·5 million. We believe that the entire process is unfair. First, total expenditure is so close to the Government's original guidance figures that there is a reasonable case for suggesting that the Secretary of State should abandon his thumbscrew, financial torture penalties. If he will not go so far as to abandon the penalties, will he not say that the system is a farce or a black comedy, and even if he will not admit that his system is a ridiculous waste of his hard-pressed Department's time, the fact that the total grant holdback substantially exceeds the total expenditure excess is indefensible. Ministers have said that Wales' authorities have done well in operating the Government's guidelines, yet they persist in exacting savage penalties from vulnerable, hard-pressed local authorities which are trying to cope with the aftermath of the Government's failed economic policies.

Mr. Peter Hubbard-Miles (Bridgend): Is the hon. Gentleman aware that in Mid-Glamorgan the Audit Commission has recently identified savings of nearly £2 million which are achievable in just two areas of local government, school meals and further education, and that such savings would be more than the grant holdback?

Mr. Jones: I find it incredible that the hon. Gentleman, a Member from the area of the Mid-Glamorgan county authority, should sneakily be attacking his own county, when he should be demanding of his right hon. Friend more and more money to help the most socially deprived local authority in Britain. It is a disgraceful posture for the hon. Gentleman to adopt, and he should be ashamed of himself.

The reports are a cruel nonsense. The system is discredited tonight by the mistake for which the right hon. Gentleman had to make a wretched apology. It is a Gilbert and Sullivan situation: the crime is small and the punishment is severe. The Minister has declared financial war on Merthyr Tydfil. Long-term unemployment in Merthyr is 47 per cent. of all unemployment. Male unemployment in that beleaguered community stands at 23·7 per cent.

My hon. Friend the Member for Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney (Mr. Rowlands) has taken me to his constituency. I have seen the dereliction and the problems in housing and the need for reclamation of industrial land. It is incredible that this Secretary of State should want to penalise one of the ablest of local authorities, with one of the biggest sets of problems in the Principality.

The right hon. Gentleman forgets that, in the fair island of Anglesey, Holyhead has 3,670 workless people. The male unemployment rate there is 23·9 per cent. and the female unemployment rate is 17·7 per cent. Yet he wishes to attack Ynys Môn and penalise it heavily. It looks as though he will have the willing aid of the hon. Member for Ynys Môn. We shall watch with interest to see how he votes tonight. [Interruption.] Yes, he has fled the Benches because he is too embarrassed by the reality of the situation.

The right hon. Gentleman wishes to penalise Wrexham harshly. I remind him that unemployment in that constituency stands at 19 per cent.

I also remind the right hon. Gentleman that the Dyfed dole queue exceeds 18,000 and that in Mid-Glamorgan it is 34,000, the highest in Wales. Mid-Glamorgan is the seat of some of Europe's most serious social and economic problems, and without any doubt it is the source of Britain's worst housing problems. Yet the Secretary of State has sanctioned grant holdback of £3·1 million from his own county, Dyfed. The people of Dyfed believe that the right hon. Gentleman's policies are operating an unjust and very spiteful system.

It is true that in the second report for 1983-84 the grant holdback penalties of £10 million are less than predicted in the first supplementary report for that year. Of the Welsh districts, 37 exceeded the Government's estimate by only 0·1 per cent. Yet three districts — Merthyr, Ogwr and Wrexham Maelor—suffered penalties nearly two and three quarter times the total expenditure excess. That illustrates the stupidity and the iniquity of the system.

The Secretary of State did not dwell on it for long, but the Government have reduced relevant expenditure and grant. The Welsh districts' block grant before holdback penalties has effectively been reduced by 3·75 per cent. Some of our districts have had huge reductions. Afan, under the heading of reduced relevant expenditure and grant, has suffered a reduction of 18 per cent., which amounts to about £380,000. Torfaen has had a reduction of 9·8 per cent. while the reductions for Swansea and Alyn and Deeside have been 7·4 per cent. and 5·4 per cent. respectively. For Alyn and Deeside — my own constituency—to lose £140,000 is a hammer blow. The authority is endeavouring to modernise homes, to attract new industries and to cope with a male unemployment rate of one in five. We think that the Government have kicked us in the teeth.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Jones: If the right hon. Gentleman is prepared to acknowledge that he has kicked us in the teeth, yes.

Mr. Edwards: The reductions which the hon. Gentleman has quoted, including Alyn and Deeside, are about 90 per cent. due to the reduction in interest rates. The authorities have had to pay lower interest rates and have had lower expenditure. Therefore, they are entitled to a lower level of grant. For that reason, we have made the same adjustment as that which was made in every year of the previous Labour Government.

Mr. Jones: The right hon. Gentleman should spend more time with the Association of District Councils in Wales, which will not find that explanation sufficient. It is angry. For the district councils which lose relevant expenditure and grant—27 of the 37 lose—it is not good enough to be so informed in the report about 18 months after the closing of their books. The district authorities believe that this is an instance of the Government being guilty of a special sort of incompetence.

Mr. Allan Rogers: The Secretary of State has given a specific figure for the reduction in rate support grant to Alyn and Deeside, but he has still not said by how much interest rates have fallen over the period for which he has calulated the outturn. If he is saying that all the outturns in Wales and the reductions in grant to local authorities are the result of the reduction in interest rates, is he saying that there have been no penalties or cuts in Wales?

Mr. Jones: My hon. Friend has pinned down the right hon. Gentleman, from whom we have had no assurances and no clear explanation in response to my hon. Friend's cogent argument. As I was about to say before I was so cogently interupted, rate support grant for Wales has been reduced by £5·5 million before holdback since the main order. Is it not the case that nearly all of the reduction —about £5·4 million—has been borne by the Welsh districts.

I deal next with the position of the counties in the 1983-84 report. Clwyd, Mid-Glamorgan and West Glamorgan have been slammed viciously for overspending. I should tell the House that their budgets involve hundreds of millions of pounds. However, the grant holdbacks total over £9 million. The counties are struggling desperately to cope with the coal and steel closures. The Mid-Glamorgan authority must now endure a series of agonising coalmine closures in valley communities, where the prospects of locating new industries must be almost nil in today's climate. I ask the Secretary of State and his junior Ministers to visit Mardy and Maesteg, which are the scenes of imminent pit contractions and closures. If they do, they will realise that it is monstrous to penalise by over £4 million Mid-Glamorgan, where unemployment, ill health and unfit housing exist to an alarming degree, and, arguably, to a degree not experienced anywhere else in the United Kingdom.

West Glamorgan and Clwyd, the other errant counties, are still reeling from the 1980 steel closures.

Mr. Coleman: My hon. Friend referred to the penalties imposed on local authorities and related them to unemployment. Does he think that next year West Glamorgan and the borough of Neath, which face about 1,000 job losses, will be penalised because the local authority may want to spend money to help unemployment?

Mr. Jones: My hon. Friend clearly fears the worst. He has received no assurances in response to his recent substantial questioning of the Secretary of State. My hon. Friend may well draw the worst conclusions in view of the Secretary of State's silence tonight and previously.

The Courtaulds closures in Clwyd have made the task of creating a new economy immensely difficult. The loss of 1,100——

Mr. Ian Grist (Cardiff, Central): The hon. Gentleman makes a fair point when he talks about the difficulties which local authorities face with the closure of steel and other plants. I am sure he will agree that any threat to close Llanwern would be a catastrophe for my constituents and the borough of Newport in the county of Gwent. In which case, why did he and so many of his colleagues support the miners' strike, which threatened the future of that plant?

Mr. Jones: At this late hour we should be spared such petty, snivelling interventions. It was a most unworthy intervention. The hon. Gentleman unwittingly makes my case. He concedes that local authorities must face the consequences of closures. Why does he not denounce his right hon. Friend, who has boasted that he wishs to get local authority expenditure back to 1979 levels, which was before the closures took place? The hon. Gentleman's intervention clearly lacked logic. There is clearly a lack of good intent in the right hon. Gentleman's strategic and tactical policy.

The loss of 1,100 Courtaulds manufacturing jobs and the P.D. Cans venture is a major blow. It is perverse of the Government to penalise my county, which has 24,000 jobless citizens, when it is striving ably to improve the social and economic infrastructure.

West Glamorgan, as my hon. Friend the Member for Neath (Mr. Coleman) stressed, suffers in parallel. Neath has lost about 1,000 jobs in two months. The BP job losses rival in seriousness the loss of the Courtaulds jobs.

I wish to raise the issue of council house sales receipts, against the background that these reports release insufficient moneys. The districts are bitter. There are 66,000 renovation grants outstanding. Their cost may exceed £231 million. Four years will be needed before we can attempt to clear the backlog. Why do the Government not release their hold on that cash? Why does Wales suffer a 15 per cent. capital receipts limit? Our valley communities, steel and quarry towns desperately need housing cash. Why can the English authorities use 20 per cent. of their receipts? Why does the right hon. Gentleman acknowledge and accept that inequity? He has never explained the discrimination. He should do that tonight if he catches your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, because my right hon. and hon. Friends are deeply worried by the Augean stable of rotten housing in the valleys, and they see no prospect from these reports of ever having the money to put it right. Our people are suffering because of the right hon. Gentleman's failure to win the battle in the Cabinet.

The blunt truth is that the Government come to the House seemingly oblivious to the message from the electors of Brecon and Radnor.

Mr. Rowlands: Are the Government aware that the Green Paper on housing grants proposes moving from grants to loans, but that a condition of that is that all outstanding applications be fulfilled and 90 per cent. grants be made? When do the Government expect to fulfil that agreement?

Mr. Jones: We will look forward with interest, if the Secretary of State catches your eye, Mr. Speaker, to hearing his answer to that important point.

The message of the electors of Brecon and Radnor should be clear to the Government. Ordinary people throughout Powys complained about the decline in the services delivered by local councils. They said that the councils were without adequate finance, and they knew that services would continue to decline in quality and extent. We noted that parents were at their wits' end because of the never-ending cuts at schools. Residents noted the squalor of the learning environment, were in despair at the dog-eared books, the increasing reliance on work sheets and the narrowing of the curriculum, and the loss of the teaching staff. They complained about all those things, and there is nothing in the report to show that the moneys to stem the adverse tide will become available.

Everybody complains about the increase in vandalism, in burglaries, in theft and fraud, but our police forces are cut or are insufficient. Although these financial reports are abstract and complex, they guarantee a continuing steep decline in the quality of life for the Welsh people. The Secretary of State operates a discredited, unjust local government regime. The Labour party is committed to local government democracy in Wales. We shall dispel the poison in the local government system. Our approach will be based on local democratic control, clear local accountability, and a local choice within a national framework. We will give greater importance to social needs, to economic problems and deprivation.

Mr. Ray Powell: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I notice that behind the Chair some advice is being given to Tory Members. Is that available to Labour Members?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: That is not a matter for the Chair.

Mr. Powell: I am asking for a ruling on that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am giving a ruling. Nothing has occurred that is out of order.

Mr. Powell: Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. May I go along to the Box and ask for the information that was given to the hon. Member for Ynys Môn (Mr. Best)?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is not for me to advise the hon. Gentleman. Nothing has occurred that is out of order.

Mr. Jones: I respect your ruling, Mr. Deputy Speaker. It became clear to my eagle-eyed Friend the Member for Ogmore (Mr. Powell) that the hon. Member for Ynys Môn was going to the Officials' Box to attempt to get answers. The hon. Gentleman knows that if he catches your eye in this debate he will have a difficult task justifying the penalties against his local authority. That is why my hon. Friend intervened.

The Labour party will make sure that the hated Rates Act and the unjust targets and penalties regime will go. The Secretary of State must abandon his penalties and targets, restore democracy to the local government scene, and acknowledge the folly of the system that he has introduced.

11.4 pm

Mr. Geraint Howells (Ceredigion and Pembroke, North): Nowhere more than in Wales have the Government's unjustified penny-pinching attitudes towards local government been resented, as recent events in Mid-Wales have amply demonstrated. Should I mention Brecon and Radnor here this evening?

Mr. Alex Carlile (Montgomery): Yes.

Mr. Richard Livsey (Brecon and Radnor): Yes.

Mr. Howells: I am delighted that the new hon. Member for Brecon and Radnor (Mr. Livsey), my hon. Friend, has been able to join my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile) and myself on these Benches. I am sure that he will stay with us for many years to come.

I have referred to Brecon and Radnor. The Secretary of State said that the rates have risen very little in Wales during the past 12 months—not higher than the rate of inflation. However, the Local Government Chronicle of 14 June 1985, refers on page 678 to "The rises in Brecknock (13·9 per cent.) and Radnor (15·4 per cent.)".

No wonder the electorate in Brecon and Radnor made sure that the Tories would be ousted in the constituency, and have elected my colleague to represent them.

People are rightly blaming the Government for inadequate and even dangerous school buildings, for the limited facilities offered our schoolchildren, and for the lack of provision of even the most basic materials in some schools in Wales. Highly placed officials in the education service have been quoted as saying how they were first motivated in their work by the desire to bring about an improvement and expansion in education, but were now having to spend their time trying to limit the damage to a whole generation of children that will result from severe cutbacks imposed on local authorities by central Government.

Mr. Alex Carlile: Is my hon. Friend aware that teachers in high schools in Wales are now in despair at the amount of time that they have to spend writing and typing out worksheets for their pupils because there is not money available to buy textbooks for those pupils? Is he further aware that that is even so with students who are studying specialist subjects for A-level?

Mr. Howells: I entirely agree with the sentiments expressed by my hon. and learned Friend. It makes us wonder whether the Secretary of State is aware of the problems in many of the high schools and whether he cares for the children who live in our communities.

Likewise, the money for road improvements is not being made available, and the tremendous backlog in housing maintenance and repair throughout Wales is rapidly becoming a national scandal. Various Ministers have been trying to stem the tide of discontent against the Government by blaming the local authorities, but that is manifestly unfair. Local authorities in Wales, as elsewhere, have been forced to budget in the most insecure conditions. They must feel at times that they are treading on quicksands. It is now surely time that the Government tried to build greater stability into the rate support grant formula to give local authorities greater certainty about their block grant entitlement. It is now 12 months since local authorities closed their accounts for 1983-84, yet we have before us a report that changes the grant entitlement for individual authorities quite significantly in some cases. For example, Ceredigion district council will lose approximately £28,000 this year in respect of 1983-84. It is obvious that since the introduction in 1981 of the present rate support grant system it has been used more and more as an instrument by which central Government are attempting to control the level of local authority spending and, by that means, undermining local democracy. Do the Government intend to perpetuate this policy?

[Mr. Howells]

In the shorter term, will the Minister assure the House that provision for education, roads and housing will not be further damaged by the Government's short-sighted policy towards the funding of local government?

I hope that the Minister will say how many employees in local government have been made redundant in the last 12 months and how many are likely to be made redundant in local government in the coming two years due to the Government's policy, which is having a disastrous effect on Wales and its people.

Mr. Keith Best (Ynys Môn): I welcome the opportunity that the hon. Member for Ogmore (Mr. Powell) took of going to the Officials' Box. Any information that might improve the quality of his speeches is a welcome addition, though as he has disappeared so rapidly from the Chamber he can only have received unwelcome news. Judging from the concentrated look of despair that he always seems to wear on his visage, the news that he received could not have been particularly apposite to the case that he might have sought to advance had he chosen to remain in his place. However, one must not be too beastly towards him.

Mr. Hubbard-Miles: Does my hon. Friend think that the news he got was that in 1983-84, when the figure was withheld, Ogwr borough council borrowed £6 million from merchant bankers, not to provide housing for the needy but to provide new council offices and a leisure centre?

Mr. Best: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for making that point, because his knowledge of these matters is profound. One reason why the hon. Member for Ogmore may have disappeared so rapidly from the Chamber is that not only his local authority but most Labour-controlled local authorities in the Principality do not have a happy story to tell about the way in which they spend their ratepayers' money.

Ynys Môn, my local authority, has been mentioned as one of those which will suffer a penalty. I wish to place on record the exact nature of that overspend. From a target of £5,149,000, the total expenditure comes out at £5,318,720, an overspend of £169,720. I hope that the Secretary of State acknowledges that that is a good attempt to stay within the target.

The Secretary of State will be the first to acknowledge that the borough of Ynys Môn has particular difficulties to confront, especially in housing, with about 900 applications for housing improvement grants waiting to be satisfied. There is little prospect of their being satisfied in the near future unless further money is made available, and my right hon. Friend knows my views on the release of further capital receipts to try to satisfy that demand. He will also be aware of the severe unemployment problem in Ynys Môn, with 22 per cent. male unemployment.

My local authority has concentrated on alleviating the unemployment problem. The establishment of an economic development unit has been the latest step in that endeavour. A local authority in an area where there is high unemployment can be expected to spend more than authorities in areas where the problem is not so severe. I hope that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will soon be able to announce what we would both like—targets will be done away with and we will return to a more sensible element of establishing local government expenditure.

Targets are only a temporary measure, as has been repeatedly acknowledged. They are an unwelcome measure, however necessary they are. I hope that the time when they can be done away with altogether is rapidly approaching. This does not detract from central Government's problem of trying to resolve the conflict between local government autonomy — every hon. Member believes that every local authority should have as much say as is commensurate with central Government's overall duty — namely control of overall identifiable public expenditure.

The manifest failure of the Opposition parties to address their minds to that central question removes all credibility from the speeches by the Opposition. Until they address their minds to how to enable central Government to control overall public expenditure, of which local government expenditure is a significant part, and give local government autonomy that is commensurate with the expression of will of the ratepayers through the ballot box, there will not be a comprehensive and cohesive Opposition policy. At least the Government have tried to resolve that difficulty in a short-term, in many ways unsatisfactory, measure by the introduction of targets. There seemed to be little alternative to that measure.

I hope that, because of the responsibility that local government has shown in the Principality—to a greater extent than in England—we are approaching a period when the Principality will return to a more sensible resolution of local government finance. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State does not need me to remind him that the local authorities' success in Wales is his success, and vice versa. Central and local government must work hand in glove, because it is to the overall benefit of the people—whether taxpayers or ratepayers — that expenditure should be kept to levels that the country can afford.

That point must not escape the notice of every hon. Member participating in this debate. Unfortunately, the hon. Member for Alyn and Deeside (Mr. Jones) and the hon. Member for Ogmore, who has rapidly departed rabbit-like, have not addressed their minds to that aspect. They do not therefore provide a credible alternative to the Government's measures.

Dr. Roger Thomas (Carmarthen): I very much regret the last couple of sentences by the hon. Member for Ynys Môn (Mr. Best). Perhaps they were uncharacteristic of him.

It is essential to allow democratically elected members to put into operation services that are compatible with local needs and interests at levels of provision thought necessary by those with local government concerns. That proviso should be accepted by all honest, decent-thinking people. Restrictions in this direction have to be resisted.

One must admit that RSGs and GREs are complex. Earlier in the debate they were regarded as being Byzantine, and that is possibly under-estimating the situation. But they are affecting more and more the lives of every elector in the electorates we serve. Political issues these days are often divided into national and domestic issues. It was said that at the recent by-election domestic issues took precedence over national issues. That is not surprising, because the community is becoming more and more sophisticated, and more and more it thinks for itself.

One of the things I have noticed is that these days the community values, to a greater extent than ever before, the wide range of services provided under the auspices of local authorities, and there is now solidifying a determination to defend those services against the onslaught of central government. Nowhere is this more clearly defined than in the defending of services provided by social service departments. Yet within county councils a continuing battle goes on to tailor restricted finances to growing demands. It is a miserable sight to behold the genuine and heart-searching efforts of elected councillors being belittled and sometimes denigrated by those pursuing political dogma.

Restricted local government financing has the most widespread repercussions and ramifications. Ministers, and particularly the Minister of State, must be sick and tired of representations which I and other hon. Members make about the effect of unemployment upon certain areas within the county of Dyfed. Nowhere is that more apparent than in the fact that Dyfed county council does not have enough money to spend on roads leading north and west from Carmarthen, north and west from the termination of the A4, in order to bring down unemployment rates in that area. We had a disaster in that area when the creamery was closed at Newcastle Emlyn. We are not prepared to accept another disaster if this process of contractorisation, or privatisation under another name, is to take place at Aberforth in the constituency of the hon. Member for Ceredigion and Pembroke, North (Mr. Howells). We warn the Government that we will not accept that.

We in Dyfed will fight the Government on these issues. The Government are penalising us now, but there will be a solid opposition in Dyfed. I appeal to the Liberal party to have some influence upon Liberal members in Dyfed county council, so that we can present a united front and face these penalties. We will be honoured and supported by farming people in Dyfed..

Mr. Dafydd Wigley (Caernarfon): Reference has been made to the Brecon and Radnor by-election, but I do not want to go on too long about that. There is a message which Conservative Members should take to heart, and it is that people put a value on services. They put a greater value on real value for money services than they do on an additional penny on the rates, provided that that penny is being spent in a way which meets their requirements. That is something the Government will forget at their peril in all parts of Wales and elsewhere when it comes to an election.

In the papers before us, we are seeing yet further penalisation of areas, particularly rural areas. We have heard about the position in Dyfed. The position in Gwynedd is not good at all. Gwynedd kept substantially below the target set by the GRE, and that was because of cuts it had to make and further cuts that are threatened in order to keep expenditure down. There is talk of axeing the teaching of musical instruments, and we are seeing the inability of Gwynedd to fulfil the infrastructure needed for the all-Wales strategy for mentally handicapped people. We are seeing a lack of finance for joint funding of schemes between the social services and the health authority. That is the price we have to pay to meet targets which are not related to the acknowledged level of need in Gwynedd as elsewhere.

We are seeing problems in counties such as Dyfed. Dyfed has a GRE-recognised need of £133·1 million, and an expenditure forecast of £132·4 million, which is less than the GRE, less than the recognised need in Dyfed. In spite of that, the target has been set at £130 million. Dyfed is £2·4 million above the target and is being penalised by £3·1 million.

That is a devastating situation for Dyfed. Interestingly enough, I believe that Dyfed is the only county council in Wales since reorganisation which has not elected an official Conservative county councillor. Is this the price to be paid? [Interruption.] I hear someone say that that is because no one will stand as a Conservative candidate. That is a fascinating reflection on the situation. I wonder whether that is why the county is being clobbered in the settlement? Or is it because Dyfed county council recently passed a vote of no confidence in the Secretary of State and called for his resignation? The people in the right hon. Gentleman's own area will have to pay for the Government's imposition on the county council and the people of south Pembroke should bear in mind that the actions of their own Member of Parliament have led to this.

Dyfed faces the possibility of having to cut 103 teaching posts, although the need for them is very great. If the Secretary of State thinks that the council can dip into its reserves, I should inform him that the reserves amount to about £900,000. If the teachers' pay increase is 5¾ per cent. instead of the 4¼ per cent. that has been budgeted, that will take a further £600,000 from the reserves and the council will have virtually nothing left. Central Government must take responsibility for the full pay settlement, because with a financial régime of this kind it would be utterly unfair to pass the burden on to local authorities which do not have the resources to meet it.

If the same pattern of increased burdens continues next year Dyfed will need a further £10 million. The ratepayers will then have to face a 30 per cent. or 40 per cent. increase in rates or the county will face bankruptcy. That is the crazy logic of a régime which penalises a county which is spending less, not more, than its GREA but which cannot meet the unrealistic targets set by the Government.

The same applies to Mid-Glamorgan, an area of tremendous social need. Again, if any part of Wales has enormous social needs it is Merthyr Tydfil, an area which I know well. In Wrexham, unemployment is constantly increasing. Then there are the problems of Ynys Môn. As we have heard, members of the Select Committee on Welsh Affairs were in Llanfair P.G. looking at what was supposed to be a prime tourist sight and seeing the grotesque need for expenditure on developing the station forecourt, car parking facilities, and so on. Yet the local authority is being penalised not for spending more than its GREA but for spending more than the iniquitous target imposed by the Government.

The present arrangements for local government expenditure in Wales do not give people the responsibility and the right to develop services in response to the needs of each locality. The sooner that system is changed, the better.

Mr. Gwilym Jones (Cardiff, North): As always, I listened with interest to what the hon. Member for Alyn and Deeside (Mr. Jones) had to say from the Opposition Front Bench, but I was even more interested in what he did not say. As a year has passed since we last had a similar debate I thought that the hon. Gentleman might have answered the following quotation which was given in last year's debate:

"the Chancellor spoke the truth in his Budget speech. His message on public expenditure was loud and clear. We cannot afford it.

I am sorry, but the fact is that nearly everyone is in favour of cuts in public expenditure as a means of helping to solve our economic problems, but very few are prepared to accept the local implications of such a policy." — [Official Report, 18 July 1984; Vol. 64, c. 431.]

In fact, that quotation is from the hon. Gentleman himself, addressing the Welsh Grand Committee on 7 May 1975.

I have nothing new from the hon. Member for Alyn and Deeside today. Instead, he gave the familiar litany of statistics and unemployment figures that are trotted out on every occasion in Welsh debates. In the Chamber, in Welsh Grand Committee debates and at Welsh Question Time, as though the hon. Gentleman wished to convince us that he revels in ever higher unemployment.

I have recently had the privilege of visiting the hon. Gentleman's part of the world. I was in his constituency with the Select Committee on Welsh Affairs last week looking into matters of tourism. The week before we were taking evidence about the closure of Courtaulds in Wrexham. I was somewhat gratified to receive the assurance of Wrexham Maelor Council that it was convinced of the need to hold back the lunatic fringe in Wales.

It is almost heartening that the Labour party has changed its view about council house sales and that tenants should not be denied their right to buy. However, councils often complain that they cannot spend their own money. Is it their own money? Surely it is their ratepayer's money. That money has been borrowed and ratepayers have repaid the capital and the interest on it. They are trying to spend the money twice instead of seeking to return that money to the ratepayers and eliminate interest charges.

We would all agree in wanting to see the backlog of renovation grants taking less than the four years described by the hon. Member for Alyn and Deeside. Such small works are important because they create work and employment. We must not neglect such opportunities. We all want effective and efficient spending. I fully support the Government's policies for council spending. While I realise that they are necessary. I look forward to when the implications for council spending are somewhat different. I hope that we can look forward to a greater freedom, particularly in renovation grants for small works.

I was pleased to hear how near local authorities are to achieving the targets set by responsible rating decisions. I noted my right hon. Friend's hope that the 1 per cent. difference between targets and expenditure will soon be eliminated. I welcome the move towards more responsible rating decisions. However, I warn my right hon. Friend that there is a cynical, cycle in Wales which is based on the frequency of two-year local government elections. Certainly in south Glamorgan the rates increase was artificially held down in election year. Many Cardiff ratepayers know that we can expect a big increase in rates next year. This will be a savage burden on the ratepayers in Cardiff, domestic and industrial, and I warn that the Minister might have to make use of his powers to cut back on excessive spending in south Glamorgan.

Mr. Roy Hughes (Newport, East): This debate is a hardy annual. The Secretary of State presents his proposals as if he were dealing with a bunch of unruly schoolchildren. He threatens to use his authoritarian powers against Welsh local authorities which have to deal with the most terrible social problems in the whole of Great Britain. It cannot be said too often that local authorities in the Principality have always acted with the utmost restraint and sense of responsibility. They deserve better treatment from the Secretary of State.

The councils believe that they could achieve greater efficiency if there were fewer controls on them. The 37 Welsh district councils in the Association of District Councils would like autonomy over their financial affairs. That request was turned down; the councils are getting nowhere in their consultations with the Secretary of State. Hard-pressed authorities such as Wrexham and Merthyr, which has terrible unemployment problems, get nothing but penalties and the money goes into the Treasury coffers.

The Secretary of State tries to make out that his proposals are fair and reasonable. Why, then, do our district councils protest that the rate support grant report will withhold £10 million of block grant from Welsh ratepayers? It is highway robbery and the Secretary of State has become the Dick Turpin of Welsh politics. Money is urgently needed for many public projects throughout Wales.

The district councils allege that the report reduces the relevant expenditure of Welsh local authorities by £6 million and reduces grants by £5·5 million. Those figures illustrate the pressure on our local authorities who have to cope with overwhelming problems.

When the Secretary of State exercises his power to redistribute grants to Welsh districts there will, of course, be winners and losers. Afan, which covers the Port Talbot area, is adversely affected. When a local authority embraces a pattern of expenditure, it is often difficult for it to cut back on projects that it has undertaken. When it attempts to rectify the situation by putting up the rates, there is invariably a public outcry. The Secretary of State is passing the buck to our local authorities. They are having to carry the can for his deficiencies and errors.

We know that the favourite target of the Secretary of State is the Mid-Glamorgan county council in perhaps the most socially deprived county in Great Britain. Umpteen reports have set out all the details of the county's terrible problems, but apparently it is to be penalised.

The story tonight is a depressing one of cuts, cutbacks and restrictions. The message from Brecon and Radnor was that people are calling for improved social services. That is a call of enlightened self-interest and the Opposition fully endorse it. A future Labour Government will restore the freedom of local government and increase the functions of our local authorities. That is the best course for Wales.

Mr. Nicholas Edwards: The hon. Member for Alyn and Deeside (Mr. Jones) said that it was unfortunate that this information came 18 months after the event and the hon. Member for Ceredigion and Pembroke, North (Mr.

Howells) asked why there had been delay. We wait until after the local authorities' accounts have been audited and we have the final figures so that we can make the final adjustments.

The hon. Member for Alyn and Deeside said that it requires a special kind of financial incompetence to produce figures at this late stage. It would require a special kind of financial incompetence for any treasurer not to be aware of the effect of grant on the changes in expenditure, especially changes resulting from interest charges.

The hon. Member for Rhondda (Mr. Rogers) asked about the change. In 1983-84, there was a fall from the assumption of 11·5 per cent. to the actual interest rate of 10·5 per cent. It is that adjustment with which we are dealing. The total resulting from that change was £6,261,000 in Wales. Of the £10 million that has been referred to, £3·8 million was accounted for by holdback. Of the £140,000 difference between the first and the second report in Alyn and Deeside, £63,000 was due to the interest rate change.

My hon. Friend the Member for Ynys Môn (Mr. Best) talked of his constituency's special problems. His local authority has increased rates faster than inflation since 1979 and has the highest manpower growth in any district council in Wales. There has been a 5 per cent. growth in full-time equivalent since 1979. Most districts find that they can provide the same services with less manpower. I wonder whether the increase in manpower is a proper use of expenditure. He was right to say that we are anxious to move away from a system of targets.

I have just completed the consultation process with local government that will lead to the statement on RSG next week. I have already told local authorities that, thanks to that consultation process and the views that they expressed, I hope to be able to get away from the target system in Wales. I believe that both sides of the House will welcome that.

The hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley) rightly emphasised that people care about services. His local authority has increased expenditure on services above the rate of inflation during the past few years. No doubt it has therefore been able to improve services. Several local authorities have been mentioned. Ogwr has got into the extraordinary state of apparently doing some creative accounting against itself, and it has paid money back into reserves and therefore incurred penalty. That seems a clumsy action which reveals a need for advice. I hope that that will be drawn to its attention.

It being one and a half hours after the commencement of proceedings on the motion, MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER put the Question, pursuant to Standing Order No. 3 (Exempted business).

Question agreed to.

Resolved,

That the Welsh Rate Support Grant Supplementary (No. 2) Report 1983-84 (House of Commons Paper No. 448), which was laid before this House on 4th July, be approved.

Motion made, and Question put,

That the Welsh Rate Support Grant Supplementary Report 1985-86 (House of Commons Paper No. 449), which was laid before this House on 9th July, be approved.—[Mr. Nicholas Edwards.]

Lloyd's

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Lennox-Boyd.]

11.55 pm

Mr. Bryan Gould (Dagenham): It is regrettably true that over the past decade or so Lloyd's, the world's premier insurer, has been wracked by a succession of scandals. No one doubts that Lloyd's is now painfully, if somewhat belatedly, grappling with those problems and is doing a great deal to put its house in order, but the consequences of those earlier failures are still emerging, and Lloyd's is inevitably caught up in the need to resolve those outstanding difficulties fairly and effectively.

The most significant of the recent troubles is that involving the PCW syndicates. The way in which Lloyd's and other authorities respond to this case raises at least two matters of substantial public interest.

First, in a case where a number of people at the heart of Lloyd's perpetrated frauds and thefts involving up to £40 million over some years, why have no charges yet been brought? After all, these matters came to light well over two years ago. Fraud cases are admittedly complicated, and the major figures have admittedly fled the jurisdiction, but that should not have prevented the bringing of prosecutions, which in itself would have done a great deal to reassure City opinion — and, indeed, opinion beyond the City — that the authorities were taking these matters seriously.

The dilatoriness of the Director of Public Prosecutions leaves a real question mark over the Government's determination to deal with City fraud. There is a sharp contrast between the huge police operation which was mounted in Oxford a year or so ago to bring to heel a handful of some of the most vulnerable people in our society—those who had allegedly been party to minor social security frauds — and the zeal shown in apprehending them, and the failure so far to take any action whatever in the courts in respect of fraud on a truly massive scale. That sharp contrast must leave the Government open to charges of double standards. They must answer the question: why is it that there appears to be one rule for those who transgress in a minor way, but apparently a quite different rule—and one which does not seem to be applied — for those involved in substantial fraud in the City?

The second major issue of public interest arising from the PCW affair is the damage which has been done to Lloyd's and to the City's reputation. It is damage which arises not just because of the original fraud and Lloyd's failure to prevent or detect it, but now also by virtue of the inadequacy of Lloyd's response to the substantial losses which have since emerged.

It might be useful if I briefly recount the history. In 1982 it became clear that two underwriters, Peter Cameron-Webb and Peter Dixon, had over a long period defrauded the names for whom they managed underwriting syndicates, and defrauded them of as much as £40 million. The chairman of the parent company of the managing agent, the brokers Minet, was involved also in the frauds to a minor degree. When this came to light, Minet was active immediately in recovering some of the money, and with another major broking firm contributed some of its own money to make good and cover the losses. The names who accepted the offer of money from Minet under the arrangement — over 99 per cent. of those involved accepted — did so on condition that they signed an agreement which prevented them from bringing any further legal proceedings against Minet or anyone else in respect of the losses. In effect, they assigned their legal rights to a company set up jointly by Minet and the other broking firm which was involved.

The Department of Trade and Industry, Lloyd's and Minet all set up inquiries into what had gone wrong; little has emerged as a consequence of the inquiries so far. All those institutions, including the Department, have purported to regard the £40 million loss which became apparent in 1982, and the arrangement which was then made to reimburse those who were defrauded, as a self-contained episode under which a line could safely be drawn. Unfortunately, that does not seem possible any longer. It has now emerged that substantial further losses have emerged. The names have been called upon in recent months to contribute over £60 million this year, and it is estimated that their total liabilities may be as much as £130 million.

It is the question of how to treat the new development which is the real issue in the debate. Lloyd's takes the view that these further and potential losses are to be regarded as ordinary trading losses, that they have nothing to do with the earlier fraud, and that the principle of unlimited liability must therefore apply to them. The Minister wrote in a recent letter that he sees no case for extending his departmental inquiry into the original fraud to cover the new situation which has been revealed. Minet, whose chairman I met a day or two ago, says that it did all that could be expected of it to resolve the problems caused by the PCW fraud and that subsequent losses are little to do with it and not its responsibility.

These attitudes cannot be supported. They are fatally undermined by what we now know about the way in which the PCW syndicates were operated and by the way in which the victims of the fraud have been dealt with. First, there is the deal which the names were told would resolve the problems and which involved their signing away any further rights that they might have. That deal is now seen to have been seriously deficient. If it were tested in the courts, it would in all probability be found to be invalid. This is because information which was available to Minet and Lloyd's at the time that the deal was signed last year, and which was material to the question of further losses, was at the very least not properly interpreted by Lloyd's and Minet, and was certainly not disclosed to the names. The deal is almost certainly vitiated by the fact of non-disclosure to the names.

Secondly, an independent inquiry carried out by Price Waterhouse, and recently handed over to the steering committee of names affected, shows that the accounts of the syndicates over a long period were "grossly manipulated" and that material facts were concealed. Those are matters for which Minet, as the parent company, and Lloyd's, as the supervising authority, must surely bear some responsibility.

Further, the money which was recovered by Minet and used by it to reimburse names for the originally disclosed losses of £40 million was obtained by the cancellation of certain reinsurance contracts. In view of the way in which other reinsurance arrangements operated, which were conducted through PCW-controlled companies and which were described by Price Waterhouse as extremely prejudicial to the interests of the names mainly affected by the losses, and because of the underlying context of the way in which the reinsurance arrangements worked, the consequence of the deal and the cancellation and return of premiums on some reinsurance contracts was to leave the names without any effective reinsurance cover. The fact that the price of accepting the deal was to leave them without that cover was not made clear to the names at that time.

The fourth point—admittedly it affects only a small group of names—is that that minority of names which insisted, despite strong pressure to dissuade them from doing so, on taking out stop-loss policies, have now discovered that those policies were placed with PCW baby syndicates and were framed in terms which makes them worthless. As ordinary Lloyd's policyholders, therefore, as well as in their capacity as investors in Lloyd's, those names who took out those policies have good reason to feel aggrieved.

Fifthly, it is clear that much of the underwriting done on behalf of the names over that period, which involved a high proportion of long-tail business, much of it to do with insuring against asbestosis claims in the United States and in respect of which the recently disclosed losses principally arise, was done in breach of Lloyd's rules and limits on the amount of underwriting to be done. That was something, again, that Lloyd's failed to detect or prevent.

The whole miasma of accounts being manipulated, of reinsurance arrangements which were fraudulent and prejudicial, of insurance policies which turned out to be worthless, of failure to disclose material facts and of breach of some of the most fundamental rules, leave the names, who are now required, according to Lloyd's to pick up the bill for losses which might amount to £130 million —all arising as the result of a succession of nefarious practices — feeling not a little hard done by. Few objective observers would not conclude that they have justice on their side.

What is more important, the combination of events makes it extremely difficult for Lloyd's to adhere to its position of disclaiming responsibility for what has happened and of maintaining, with the Department, that the losses arose from an ordinary course of trading.

The truth is surely that those further losses arose, as did the earlier ones, which are plainly attributable to fraud, from one continuous course of conduct. There were fraudulent defalcations which had the inevitable consequence that the underwriters involved in that fraud were then compelled to give top priority to maximising immediate premium income—irrespective of the nature of the business, the risk undertaken and the Lloyd's rules —with the prime and overriding objective of getting in the money so that they could conceal the fraud and escape detection for as long as possible.

It is not possible to draw a line under the £40 million loss, which is attributed to fraud, and then to say that any further losses were unrelated and that the ordinary principles of unlimited liability should apply.

Lloyd's responsibility is engaged, because throughout the period it was, and claimed to be, the regulatory and supervisory authority. It was its responsibility to ensure that the rules were enforced, that fraud was detected and that the managing agents were not just competent but honest. I make that latter point because I believe that the chairman of Lloyd's is on record as saying that the responsibility of Lloyd's is to ensure that managing agents are competent, but he stopped short of saying anything about honesty. I cannot believe, according to the principles applied by Lloyd's, that it is possible to be competent and yet to be dishonest.

Lloyd's has not so far faced its responsibilities, and the consequences of a continuing failure to do so will be extremely damaging, not least to Lloyd's. There is the prospect of protracted and expensive litigation, dragging through the courts for years to come, guaranteeing unfavourable publicity for Lloyd's throughout that period.

The whole process will certainly be repeated on a much grander scale in the American courts, as a number of American names are also involved. It remains to be seen whether in any litigation Lloyd's would attempt to avail itself of the defence available under section 14 of the Lloyd's Act 1982, which grants Lloyd's immunity against legal action. That provision may be held not to apply retrospectively to acts and omissions which arose before 1982.

If Lloyd's were to attempt to rely upon that defence it would be ironic, because it insisted on that provision when the 1982 Act was being discussed, on the ground that it was essential to provide it with a important instrument for carrying out that supervisory function. It would be ironic, to say the least, if it were now to use that provision as a shield to protect themselves against the consequences of the failure of carrying out that duty to supervise.

The City of London is going through a difficult period of rapid change. Therefore, it is important that City institutions are seen to be operating properly in the interests of investors and the wider public. Lloyd's can, if it wishes, continue to bury its head in the sand for a time, but the losers would be not only those who have been the victims of the fraud, which it was Lloyd's responsibility to prevent, but the good name of Lloyd's and the City of London.

One consequence would be the discrediting of the principle of self-regulation. Why should anyone in these circumstances be prepared to entrust to Lloyd's the privilege of self-regulation when the record shows not only its failure to prevent abuses—a failure that involves not just a few crooks at the margin but some of those at the heart of the Lloyd's establishment, which is what is such a cause for concern — but its failure to take responsibility for the fact that it has not carried out its supervisory duties effectively?

The consequence of this is that a new Labour Government would be obliged to look again at how Lloyd's is regulated, just as we would wish to see self-regulation in the City looked at again. In the new circumstances arising in the City, with such a rapid change of institutions and technology, there is likely to be a premium on the dearest and most direct form of statutory provision, without undue bureaucracy, but at least guaranteeing to investors adequate protection.

In the meantime, the Minister has a major responsibility. His Department has the overall responsibility for supervising the insurance industry. He must talk to the Lloyd's council and extend the ambit of his inquiry to cover the events that have occurred subsequently. He must knock some heads together. The future operation and good name of the City are at stake. No one suggests that Lloyd's should take the full financial burden of what is happening. Lloyd's must at the least take the responsibility of negotiating an agreement that is seen to be fair and acceptable to all the parties. The Minister's duty is to guide Lloyd's towards that point.

12.12 am

Sir Anthony Grant (Cambridgeshire, South-West): I piloted through the Lloyds Act in 1982. That Act was supported by the Opposition, most notably and competently by the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher). The Lloyd's council has exercised its powers under the new legislation responsibly. It is right to have an inquiry, but it must not be unduly delayed. The worst thing for the good name of Lloyd's, and for everybody else, would be a prosecution that failed. That would be disastrous. I am sure that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary will deal with that.

The only point that should be stressed—and I hope that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary will stress it for the good name of Lloyd's and the City—is that the scandal and dreadful plight of the syndicate names is internal. No policyholder outside has suffered the loss of a single penny.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. Alex Fletcher): I am glad that the hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) acknowledged that Lloyd's has been reviewing the rules and regulatory procedures with great energy for some time, and it is putting its house in order. However, I cannot agree to any suggestion to the effect that it is burying its head in the sand.

The hon. Gentleman referred to the Government's monitoring of Lloyd's, concentrating particularly on the developments surrounding the syndicates that are under pressure. The hon. Gentleman gave an account of the events that took place at Lloyd's, which is helpful because it saves me from doing so in the short time available, even if it was his version of events.

It is plain that the matters connected for example with the Richard Beckett Underwriting Agencies Ltd. involve a complicated chain of circumstances. However, I refer immediately to the point raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Cambridgeshire, South-West (Sir A. Grant) because it is a very important and basic point for the House to remember. The policyholders, the consumers, are not at risk in any of the matters that are causing concern in the House and elsewhere.

Mr. Gould: I think that the Minister will accept that those who took out stop-loss policies are in a special category, and are at present at risk as Lloyd's policyholders.

Mr. Fletcher: I accept that those people are in a special category.

Against that background, I should like to summarise the actions that have been taken by the Government and Lloyd's. Allegations of irregularities in the conduct of companies within the Alexander Howden Group PLC and Minet Holdings PLC Groups emerged in the autumn of 1982. Inspectors were appointed by the Department of Trade and Industry in September and November 1982, under section 165 of the Companies Act 1948, to investigate the affairs of both groups.

I should like to make it clear that the Department maintains close contact with the inspectors. Their investigations are well advanced and they are keeping in close touch with current developments, including the recent report by Price Waterhouse, which has been made available to them and the Department. The matters dealt with in the report are within the scope of the inspectors' investigation. If it were necessary to extend the inspectors' powers in any of those matters, that would be done.

I expect to receive the inspectors' reports early next year. It is my expectation that both reports will be published, with the qualification that to avoid any possible prejudice, publication would be delayed while prosecutions were under consideration or in progress.

As the hon. Gentleman acknowledged, the question of prosecution is a matter for my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney-General and the Director of Public Prosecutions, but my Department is in close touch with the DPP, and police investigations are continuing.

As a self-regulating market, Lloyd's has its own powers to deal with irregularities. In the Howden and Minet matters, the initial step was to appoint committees of inquiry comprising leading counsel and an accountant. Both inquiries have reported, the reports were made available to the Department, the Department's inspectors and the Director of Public Prosecutions. The investigations have led to disciplinary action by Lloyd's against a number of individuals.

Looking at the position generally, one sees that there have been a number of other matters where investigations have been initiated. Lloyd's keeps the Department informed of those matters, and the police or the Director of Public Prosecutions are also informed by Lloyd's where necessary.

The council of Lloyd's has taken other actions in relation to RBUA and its syndicates. There has been the decision to introduce a new agency company, headed by Sir Ian Morrow and others from outside Lloyd's. There is the new fact-finding investigation into RBUA's operations from 1983 onwards, and there is the extension of the date for members to show their ability to comply with the solvency test.

The normal date for the test cannot be extended for long, because Lloyd's has to prepare statements of the whole business of Lloyd's and other documents for submission to regulatory authorities in many parts of the world to comply with local legislation. I understand that a majority of the 375 members affected by RBUA's losses have now met the solvency test.

It appears that some of the latest problems stem from the particular sort of risks underwritten. Insurance companies around the world bear the financial scars of some business underwriten in the United States of America. The size of the wound became clearer to many during 1984. Members of Lloyd's participating in syndicates with a substantial exposure to this business are not free from the consequences.

I emphasise, therefore, that both Lloyd's and the Government took action when it became apparent that there were problems. Lloyd's has taken disciplinary action where appropriate and has launched its own inquiry into the latest difficulties of the affected syndicates, as well as taking various other measures to help the names involved.

We are keeping in close touch with Lloyd's and we promptly sent in Companies Act inspectors to the Peter Cameron Webb syndicates when it was clear that there might be fraud or malpractice. I repeat that we can extend the investigations should other matters come to light which make it necessary to do so.

The DPP is considering the evidence gathered in the course of the inspections and, as I said, police investigations are in progress. These are, however, complex areas and I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will appreciate the need for a proper case before bringing criminal charges, frustrating though that may be to those who, clearly, would like to see justice being done. While we regret the fact that some names are facing substantial losses, there is nothing to imply that a Government inquiry into Lloyd's generally is either necessary or desirable at this stage.

To put matters into perspective, it is worth making two points. First, in respect of the 1982 year of account, there were 431 syndicates trading at Lloyd's and the losses disclosed by the Beckett agency involved three of those syndicates. Secondly, the total number of members of Lloyd's in 1982 was 20,145 and in 1985 there are 26,050. The number of members affected by the Beckett agency syndicate's losses is 375.

I appreciate the concern that has been expressed in the House about the situation at Lloyd's, and of course we are all concerned about the reputation of Lloyd's which is important to the national economy and which is worldwide, although I understand, somewhat from my own experience of travelling abroad and from information I have from Lloyd's, that its business is not suffering in any way from the inevitably bad publicity that is following on these matters. It is sometimes necessary when travelling abroad to make the point that my hon. Friend mentioned, namely, that the consumer, the policyholder, is not in any way at risk as a result of the matters that have taken place at Lloyd's.

I believe that proper action is being taken by Lloyd's and by the Government and, as I said, we shall use the powers available to us if events prove that a further extension of the investigation or some other action is required by the Department. But I cannot accept the suggestion, put albeit mildly, by the hon. Gentleman that the events at Lloyd's are in any way a criticism of self-regulation. Since the new powers were made available to Lloyd's in 1982 by Parliament, Lloyd's has moved vigorously and effectively to improve its procedures, and the further need for self-regulation and the extension of powers in this sphere which I expect will from part of legislation next year, covering the whole of the financial services industry——

Mr. Gould: And Lloyd's?

Mr. Fletcher: No, because Lloyd's already has its own powers and, as I said, is exercising those extremely effectively, not least in its attempt to get to the bottom of the difficulties that are the subject of this debate.

In the legislation that I hope will come before the House next year, covering financial services generally, lessons will be learnt. Lloyd's will learn lessons from what has occurred and we in the Department and others in the city will learn lessons from these events from the point of view of rule-making and regulation, and I assure the House that we shall put those lessons to good use.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at twenty-four minutes past Twelve midnight.

Oral Answers to Questions

SCOTLAND

Football Grounds (Safety)

1. Mr. McQuarrie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what recent discussions he has had with the Scottish Football Association, and chief fire officers in Scotland, on the safety of football grounds in both senior and junior leagues; and what steps are being taken before the new football season commences in August.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Allan Stewart): I met representatives of the Scottish Football Association, the Scottish Football League, the British Transport Police and the Association of Chief Police Officers (Scotland) on 1 July to review crowd control measures. Scottish fire brigades have at my request recently visited football grounds and other stadiums in their areas. Managements are being advised of any measures needed to improve fire safety in their grounds. The committee of inquiry into crowd safety and control at sports grounds will provide interim advice about crowd safety before the opening of the new season.

Mr. McQuarrie: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his reply. I welcome the steps that the Scottish Office has taken towards improving crowd control and safety at football grounds. Can he say when the Popplewell report will be published? Can he also say whether there is the possibility of financial support being provided by the Football Trust to clubs which are not eligible for assistance from that source because they are not included on the football pools list? The smaller clubs are experiencing difficulty over their stands because of the recommendations of the fire officers.

Mr. Stewart: The interim report of the committee under Mr. Justic Popplewell's chairmanship has just been received by the Government, and we hope to publish it before the House rises for the summer recess. The non-league grounds to which my hon. Friend referred, such as Peterhead in his constituency, are covered by the fire masters' review. I am sure my hon. Friend will accept that the primary responsibility for the safety of individual facilities must lie with the operators of those grounds. However, the position of non-league clubs has been drawn to the attention of the Football Trust by the Scottish Sports Council.

Sir Hector Monro: Scotland can rightly take a great deal of credit for the steps that it has taken to improve its football grounds and to reduce alcohol abuse. However, does my hon. Friend accept that there are absolutely no grounds for complacency? Can he say what steps are being taken this summer, before the start of the football season next month, to improve grounds in the interests of sports safety?

Mr. Stewart: I agree entirely with my hon. Friend. I do not believe that there is any complacency whatsoever in Scotland. There was no complacency at the meeting that I held on 1 July. I can assure my hon. Friend that the review of safety by the Football Grounds Improvement Trust includes all league grounds in Scotland; and safety is, of course, being considered by Mr. Justice Popplewell's committee.

Mr. Ewing: I congratulate the Under-Secretary of State and the Secretary of State on winning the argument against Home Office Ministers in relation to clause 1 versus clause 10 of the Bill which is at present before another place. It would have been preposterous if the staff of British Rail had been held responsible for alcohol being carried on trains going to football matches. Can the hon. Gentleman confirm that during his recent visit Mr. Justice Popplewell praised highly the safety standards at Scottish football grounds? May I also ask him not to single out football? The hon. Member for Dumfries (Sir H. Monro) will appreciate that attendances at many rugby matches in Scotland are far higher than attendances at football matches. It is important to consider safety at all sports grounds.

Is the hon. Gentleman aware that, as a result of his request to the fire brigades and the police, there is a distinct possibility of one senior Scottish club—I shall not name it—not being able to start the new season?

Mr. Stewart: The hon. Gentleman raised the first part of his question on Second Reading of the Sporting Events (Control of Alcohol Etc.) Bill. Home Office Ministers have reached agreement with us on appropriate changes to clause 1.

The hon. Gentleman is right to say that the problem is not limited to football. That is why the Scottish fire brigades were asked to visit other stadiums.

On the hon. Gentleman's final point, following the surveys by the fire masters, concern has been expressed about four Scottish league grounds. At one club the matter has been rectified, and at another measures are in hand. At two other clubs there could be restrictions on numbers in the new season.

Employment Policy

2. Mr. Ron Brown asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if, when he next meets the Scottish Trades Union

Congress he will discuss the implications for Government policy on employment in Scotland of the recent miners' strike.

The Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. George Younger): I am always willing to discuss with the STUC the implications for Government policy of important events. The most damaging effects of the recent miners' strike have been on employment in the industry itself.

Mr. Brown: As Ian MacGregor represents man's inhumanity to man—not forgetting wives and bairns—will the Secretary of State intervene to ensure that victimised miners are returned to work? Or is the highly placed, highly salaried chairman of the NCB doing the dirty work for the Government? When I met Mr. MacGregor at Edinburgh airport on Thursday, he was not interested in fair play. Indeed, when I mentioned conciliation, he thought that that was a brand of rye whisky. Will the Secretary of State intervene and do something to resolve this almighty problem, which affects a large section of the community in Scotland?

Mr. Younger: Dismissed miners who have complaints can go to industrial tribunals. They have a perfectly good course under the normal law.

As for the other effects of the strike, I do not accept what the hon. Gentleman said about Mr. MacGregor. The severe responsibility for the effects of the strike lies firmly on the NUM, which has not only done lasting damage to the Scottish coal industry, but has destroyed a large number of jobs.

Mrs. McCurley: When my right hon. Friend meets the STUC, will he emphasise to the congress that the steel industry in Scotland would be in a much safer position and that the BSC would be in profit if it had not been for the destructive effects of the coal strike? The example which the STUC set in wanting the steelworkers to come out was highly destructive for other jobs.

Mr. Younger: I agree with my hon. Friend. There is no doubt that the splendid efforts of the steelworkers in Scotland were made considerably more difficult by the efforts of the NUM, which tried and failed to close Ravenscraig.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I appeal for brief supplementary questions.

Mr. Strang: Why is the NCB pursuing its policy of victimisation with such vengeance, particularly in Scotland? Surely the Secretary of State must recognise that innocent men and their families are being sacrificed and that this is a human rights issue. When will the right hon. Gentleman face up to that fact?

Mr. Younger: The truly innocent men, and their families, are the working miners who have been victimised shamefully. If striking miners have a case against them in law, they should come before the courts in the proper way. If they have complaints about their treatment by the NCB, they have recourse to an industrial tribunal, which is a perfectly fair process.

Mr. Henderson: Will my right hon. Friend stress to the STUC that the disastrous consequences of the strike for the potentially profitable coal faces at Frances and Seafield collieries have resulted in a considerable loss of jobs and opportunities for the Fife economy? Does that not show that strikes rarely do anyone any good, and frequently do many people a great deal of harm?

Mr. Younger: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. Those coal faces and jobs in Fife were lost by the deliberate actions of the NUM in calling a strike. I am extremely apprehensive that for many years to come there will be many effects from this disastrous strike.

Mr. Douglas: Will the Secretary of State reflect on his answers? We have moved from the strike and are anxious that the union should be allowed to represent its members on an individual basis. Will the right hon. Gentleman lend his good offices to ensure, with the STUC and the NUM, that the NCB considers each of the more than 200 cases individually? Will he further lend his good offices to ensure that good industrial relations are reinstated in the Scottish coalfield, in the interests of the coalfield, of the Scottish economy and of re-establishing a good coal industry in Scotland?

Mr. Younger: The question of relations between the NCB and its employees is one which must be pursued with the NCB. If the unions wish to do so, they can represent members who appear before industrial tribunals. The NUM has caused the real damage. It would be much better if it put its weight behind recovery in the industry.

Mr. Hirst: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the cost of an inefficient mining industry is unnecessarily high coal prices, and that that is potentially far more damaging to the many industries in Scotland which depend on energy? Does he further agree that if the NCB does not have the resources available to invest in uneconomic pits, they should be offered to private buyers? Will he say that when he next meets the STUC?

Mr. Younger: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his suggestions. A few weeks ago I had a long discussion with the STUC about the effects of the miners' strike. My hon. Friend is right to point out that if coal prices are made higher by industrial action, that must reduce the potential market for coal and jobs arising from the mining of coal. That comes back to the point that the NUM's actions have done a great deal of damage to the Scottish coalfield.

Mr. O'Neill: Will the Secretary of State cast his mind back to his meeting with the officials of the Polmaise colliery, Stirling district council and the central region, before the miners' strike started, about the potential closure of that colliery—the reason why the strike was started in the first place? Will he assure the House, as he did my constituents and local government colleagues, that he will do everything in his power to support that colliery and enable it to produce the coal that is so desperately needed in the central region? Will he assure us that the Scottish Office will back the colliery against Mr. MacGregor's wishes for closure?

Mr. Younger: The hon. Gentleman's reference to that meeting makes me feel extremely sad, as it took place shortly before the strike, and I offered to do all that I could to help. I shall always try to do anything that I can to help employment in Scotland, wherever it is. However, since then the same people whom I met and to whom I offered help were solidly on strike for almost a year and did immense damage both to their pit and to the entire industry. They cannot wipe the slate clean. The blame for the disastrous effects on the Scottish coal industry lies with Mr. Scargill and the entire NUM.

Mr. Dewar: Can the Minister confirm that, as has been stated recently by the Secretaries of State for Energy and for Employment, an individual review is being conducted by the board? If so, does he agree that the rules of natural justice should be observed and that the men concerned should have the right to a hearing and to representation? Without that, we shall never escape from the conclusion that any review is merely tokenism and a gesture to get the board out of a difficult position over a wide spectrum of Scottish opinion.

Mr. Younger: I think the hon. Gentleman knows that the Secretary of State for Energy wrote me a letter, which was publicised, in which he said that he had made it clear that the National Coal Board would be examining the cases which had been in dispute, but that that did not alter the fact that the proper course is to go before the industrial tribunals. There is a right to representation before the tribunals and the men concerned have recourse to proper procedure in that way.

Teachers Superannuation Scheme

3. Mr. McKelvey asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if the report on the quinquennial review of the Teachers Superannuation Scheme (Scotland) has been received by him; and if he will give a date when it will be laid before Parliament.

The Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. John MacKay): My right hon. Friend has not yet received the report from the Government Actuary. I am not therefore in a position to say when it will be laid before Parliament.

Mr. McKelvey: You must be outraged by that answer, Mr. Speaker. The English counterpart for this period, which is 1976 to 1981, was dealt with in December 1983, and the Scottish Office is dragging almost four years behind. I ask for an assurance that no sort of Machiavellian trick will feature in the negotiations over teachers' conditions. It is a disgrace that teachers' working conditions and pensions have not been reported on and that the current information is four years out of date. Will the Minister give an assurance that if the employers have to increase their contributions, the Scottish Office will back the additional contributions with increased budgets?

Mr. MacKay: The hon. Gentleman will know from his obviously deep knowledge of the subject that the production of the report is a matter for the independent Government Actuary. It is not a matter over which we in the Scottish Office have direct control. However, I expect to receive the report shortly.

Mr. Lamble: As a teacher's superannuation is dependent on his final year's salary, will the Minister give an assurance that he will begin a new initiative to try to resolve the present industrial dispute within Scottish schools following the decisions reached at the recent annual conference of the Educational Institute of Scotland at Inverness?

Mr. MacKay: Negotiations on teachers' pay do not fall within my responsibility when they involve superannuation matters. Such matters are for my right hon. and hon. Friends. However, my right hon. Friend is prepared to meet the teachers and the management side at any time to discuss the way forward.

Agricultural Research and Advisory Services

4. Mr. Bruce asked the Secretary of State for Scotland when he last met the Scottish National Farmers Union to discuss the impact of cuts in the agricultural research and advisory services on farms in the less favoured areas.

Mr. John MacKay: My right hon. and noble Friend the Minister of State met representatives of the Scottish National Farmers Union on 22 March 1985, when the future funding of agricultural research and development and of the advisory services was discussed. He has arranged to discuss this subject, among others, when he meets the president of the union next week.

Mr. Bruce: I am surprised that it is so long since the Government met the union, in view of the great concern among farmers in Scotland about the Government's policy. Is the Minister aware that I and my colleagues met senior representatives of the Scottish National Farmers Union this week, when they expressed deep concern about Government policy on cutting advisory services and capital grants? Nearly 90 per cent. of Scotland's farmers are in less favoured areas, and they require the Secretary of State and his Ministers to stand up and fight for them. There are problems which are peculiar to Scotland, and so far the Government's policy is causing loss of morale and deep despair. Many farmers will be forced out of business and off the hill, and that will undermine rural communities.

Mr. MacKay: My right hon. and hon. Friends meet the Scottish National Farmers Union at the times that I have stated, and they will meet representatives next week, when they will discuss these matters yet again. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State met representatives of the SNFU briefly at Ingliston, where these matters were discussed. It is worth reporting to the House, before we believe all the histrionics of the hon. Gentleman, that, even after the expenditure reductions are made, almost £29 million will be spent every year on research and development and advisory services in Scotland.

Mr. Home Robertson: Will the hon. Gentleman acknowledge the need for a comprehensive research and advisory service for Scottish agriculture in the difficult years of change that lie ahead? How can such a comprehensive research and advisory service be established if in the coming 18 months the Government go ahead with a 41 per cent. cut in the budget for this work?

Mr. MacKay: If the hon. Gentleman had listened, he would have realised that I said that, even after the reductions in expenditure, about £29 million will be spent on research and development in 1987-88. That is a considerable sum of public money which is still being spent on research and development.

Mr. Andy Stewart: Does my hon. Friend agree that the cutback may be a good measure, as imports of agricultural machinery increased by 112 per cent. during that period?

Mr. MacKay: My hon. Friend is correct to point to what has happened during the past few years. The claims of Opposition parties about the effect of research and development are exaggerated. Research is conducted in many more places than just the Government research institutes. The industry conducts research into a number of matters.

Mr. Eadie: The hon. Gentleman must be aware that his reply is causing concern to some of us. I had an Adjournment debate on this subject, because this matter affects my constituents on the Bush estate, Penicuik area. The Monister's colleague, Lord Gray, has written to me saying that the whole matter will be considered in relation to the submissions. Overwhelming Scottish opinion is that the Government's policy is wrong. Is the hon. Gentleman telling the House that the Department has reconsidered this matter since Lord Gray wrote to me?

Mr. MacKay: A consultation paper on future strategy for research and development was issued on 30 May. Consideration is being given to the comments that were received. I think that I explained the position to the hon. Gentleman in his Adjournment debate. That is still the position.

Mr. McQuarrie: I accept that £29 million will be available in 1986-87, but is my hon. Friend aware of the considerable concern that has been expressed by universities, colleges and farmers in the less favoured areas? Will my hon. Friend continue with the consultation to which he referred in a written parliamentary answer to ensure that that cut is not implemented until there is a satisfactory solution to the problem?

Mr. MacKay: We shall take account of all the observations made to us as a result of the research and development consultative paper. A similar paper on the advisory service will be published shortly. We shall take account of all those matters. I am sure that the colleges, in their observations, will be mindful of the importance of the advisory services keeping a high profile in the less favoured areas.

Mr. Wilson: Why did the hon. Gentleman tamely pass on to the Scottish advisory services the cuts that had first been produced in England? Does he realise that a high proportion of the farms in ill favoured areas will not be able to afford the fees for the advice that they need to cope with the changes that will be imposed through the common agricultural policy?

Mr. MacKay: The reductions in expenditure were not passed on from England. They were part and parcel of the negotiations with the Treasury on the total amount of spending on agriculture in England, Wales and Scotland. Even after these reductions are made, £29 million will still be spent on research and development. A total of £34 million will still be spent on research and development and the advisory services.

Mr. Ewing: Does the hon. Gentleman appreciate that £29 million is 41 per cent. less than the amount being spent at present? Has he and, more importantly, his noble Friend come to understand that the link in Scotland between research and development and the advisory services is much greater than that which prevails in England and Wales? Is he aware that the cuts in Scotland will do irreparable damage to agriculture? The Minister should withdraw these proposals.

Mr. MacKay: I cannot believe that a continuing total expenditure of £34 million for 1987-88 represents irreparable damage. We shall be considering how to make those reductions after discussions with the colleges and research institutes, after taking the advice of the Priorities Board on priorities for research and development and after listening to the observations of the National Farmers Union.

Agriculture Industry

5. Mr. Kennedy asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the current situation within Scottish agriculture.

Mr. John MacKay: Last year good weather conditions and improved efficiency contributed towards the significant recovery in Scottish farm incomes.

It is too early to predict income levels for 1985.

Mr. Kennedy: Is the Minister aware that the new capital grants scheme which has just been announced by the Government has already been described by the president of the National Farmers Union in Scotland as a further attack on United Kingdom farm competitiveness? As some of the more marginal smaller farmers in Rossshire are going to the wall, will he explain why the cuts which have been announced in the new scheme go far beyond what was anticipated or expected by Europe?

Mr. MacKay: The new scheme, which gives grant rates of 30 per cent. for the less favoured areas and 15 per cent. for other areas, provides meaningful levels of assistance which will allow adequate investment in farming.

Mr. Bill Walker: My hon. Friend will be aware that barley is important to Scottish agriculture. He will also realise that it is an essential ingredient in the manufacture of Scotch. When distilleries close, that affects the market for barley. Is my hon. Friend aware that Arthur Bell and Sons is the only company in Scotland which has been opening distilleries? Will he advise Mr. Ernest Saunders of Guinness that hon. Members on both sides of the House are interested in the current problem, which is of importance to us all?

Mr. MacKay: My hon. Friend has rather ingeniously introduced matters that are rather far from agriculture. I shall leave the matter at my boundary of responsibility by confirming that barley makes splendid whisky.

Polkemmet

6. Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what response he has sent to the West Lothian district council evidence to the Cooper committee on Polkemmet, a copy of which has been sent to him by the hon. Member for Linlithgow.

Mr. Allan Stewart: My right hon. Friend does not propose to comment on this document. The closure of collieries is a management matter for the NCB in which it would not be appropriate for Ministers to intervene.

Mr. Dalyell: Do Ministers dispute the West Lothian figures?

Mr. Stewart: As my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Energy told the hon. Gentleman on Monday, he will be responding to the council's statement and the points that the hon. Gentleman has made.

Mr. Dewar: Surely the Minister recognises that it is unsatisfactory to say that he will not respond. It sounds almost as if he is saying that he has no interest in the matter. It is an area which has already been traumatised by the British Leyland closure at Bathgate, where unemployment is appallingly high, where Polkemmet is an important source of jobs, and which is interrelated with the whole Ravenscraig issue. Does he not recognise that the Government have a duty to take an interest and to make it clear that they will help an area which is determined to help itself, as the Cooper report underlines?

Mr. Stewart: I can only repeat what I have told the House, that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Energy will be responding to the point about that document. I shall underline the Government's commitment to the Bathgate area. Good progress has been made on the Bathgate working party's various recommendations. For example, I am pleased to note that agreement has been reached on the financing of the restoration work on the Bathgate-Edinburgh rail link, which will commence shortly with a view to the line re-opening in about May 1986. The hon. Gentleman will be aware of the range of other measures that have resulted from the joint working party on Bathgate.

Trout Protection

7. Mr. Hunter asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what further consideration he has given to imposing a trout protection order on the Tay system under the Salmon and Freshwater Fisheries (Scotland) Act 1976.

Mr. John MacKay: My right hon. Friend has before him the formal proposals for a protection order, the objections and representations resulting from the advertisement of the proposals, and the views of the consultative committee on freshwater fisheries, which met recently.

Mr. Hunter: Will my hon. Friend take the opportunity to clarify the Government's attitude to the widespread concern felt about trout stock levels in the Tay, and also more generally about salmon and freshwater fish stock levels?

Mr. MacKay: I assure my hon. Friend that we are taking this order, as we do all others, seriously. As he correctly points out, there will be a danger to the future of brown trout fishing if the current rise in various unsavoury fishing practices using set lines and the like continue.

Mr. Corrie: Does my hon. Friend agree that bringing in an order in one area merely puts pressure on other areas throughout Scotland? We must be careful to ensure that we do not slowly shut off some places as a result of the dreadful pressure on areas such as the south-west of Scotland.

Mr. MacKay: My hon. Friend has made a valid point. We have some experience of it in my constituency. But, simply because of the drawback, we should not decline to implement the Labour Government's Act and put protection orders on those parts of the country which come forward with them.

I suggest to my hon. Friend that in his part of the country the angling clubs and the owners might consider getting together and putting forward protection orders of their own.

Springburn (Job Creation)

8. Mr. Martin asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what steps are being taken to attract new industries to Springburn in view of the British Rail Engineering Ltd., redundancy announcements.

Mr. Younger: A contract was recently placed for a privately funded 130,000 sq ft business park at Port Dundas, which is expected to accommodate 300 jobs. In addition, the SDA and BREL have jointly funded a study into alternative employment opportunities in Springburn.

Mr. Martin: When the Secretary of State last spoke to this House about Springburn, he said that a study would be before the House soon. Exactly when will we get the results of the study? He knows full well that it will take more than an industrial park at Port Dundas to resolve the problems of Springburn.

Mr. Younger: I entirely share the hon. Gentleman's concern that the study is urgently needed. I understand that the agency has received a draft report and expects the final version any time now. It will then move to assess the recommendations as quickly as possible.

Mr. Hirst: As I also have constituents in Bishopbriggs and Kirkintilloch who will be affected by the proposed redundancies at BREL, will my right hon. Friend make representations to my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer to consider the establishment of an enterprise zone at Springburn?

Mr. Younger: I shall consider my hon. Friend's suggestion. He may be aware that a great deal of good news has been apparent in Glasgow in recent months. Glasgow-based companies have been winning contracts or committing investment at the rate of a staggering £33 million a month. Many of the projects are designed to refurbish the city—a £5 million contract for the business park at Port Dundas, a new £2·5 million meat market, £7 million to refurbish Gartnavel hospital, a multi-channel cable system costing £15 million, new investment at Glasgow airport, a new commercial centre for Bridgeton, and a £10 million extension to a city centre hotel.

Mr. Craigen: In view of the despairingly high level of unemployment in the north of the city—and particularly of a long-term nature—will the Secretary of State give us an assurance that he will take a personal interest in trying to generate more employment in the north of the city?

Will the Secretary of State agree to look again at BREL, in view of its importance to the Springburn area?

Mr. Younger: I assure the hon. Gentleman that I will be taking a very close interest. It is for BREL to decide on its operations. As the hon. Gentleman will probably know, there has been a great deal of help for Glasgow recently. In the past six years there has been over £735 million of new investment, and 33,000 new and safeguarded jobs in the Glasgow travel-to-work area.

Royal Highland Show (Ministerial Speech)

9. Mr. Maclennan asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will place in the Library a copy of his speech delivered at the Royal Highland Show on 17 June.

Mr. John MacKay: No speech was delivered, but my right hon. Friend answered some questions asked by representatives of the press.

Mr. Maclennan: When, in those summarised remarks, the Secretary of State accepted that the Government still intended to support the farming industry, he was greeted with total incredulity. Does the Minister realise that, since the announcement of the capital grant cuts of a week ago, with reductions from 70 to 30 per cent. in the less favoured areas, in grants available for re-seeding, fencing and drainage, the Government will be regarded as completely opposed to the interests of farming in 87 per cent. of the areas covered?

Mr. MacKay: I think that I answered the hon. Gentleman's point about 30 and 15 per cent. still being fairly high levels of grant, which we believe will keep up agricultural investment. On the livestock compensatory allowances the Government spent £37·9 million; on the beef premium scheme we spent £22·4 million; on the suckler cow premium scheme £9·4 million; and on the sheep variable premium scheme £23·9 million. I suggest that the hon. Member takes a more balanced view.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Had my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State been able to make a speech at the Royal Highland Show, would he have taken the opportunity to respond to the remarks by the chairman of the Countryside Commission, who has expressed considerable concern that tax avoidance schemes are resulting in the development of large-scale commercial forestry operations in Scotland? These are threatening fishing and tourist interests, and are resulting in inflated land values which threaten the future of hill farming. As he did not have an opportunity to make such a speech, will he undertake to investigate this matter?

Mr. MacKay: I shall not attempt to say what my right hon. Friend would have said if he had made a speech. Forestry has an important role to play in the countryside. I accept that forests must be planted in such a way as to be compatible with the interests of agriculture and with the environment in general. For the long term benefit of the country and for employment, the forestry industry has an important role to play.

Drunkenness (Designated Places)

10. Mr. Hugh Brown asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many designated places under section 5 of the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act 1980 have been established; whether any current applications are being considered; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John MacKay: One, at Albyn House, Aberdeen. Applications for grant are currently being considered for designated places in Dundee, Paisley and Peterhead.

Mr. Brown: Where does the Minister place most of the blame for the delay and poor response to an idea that has been accepted by everyone in the field as being urgent, necessary and useful?

Mr. MacKay: I shall resist the temptation to place blame. As the hon. Member knows, I have encouraged the concept of these places. The Government's powers are restricted to helping voluntary organisations, and local authorities are expected to play their part in assisting schemes of direct local benefit. I hope that some of the schemes which are currently coming to us will prove to be ones we can support, and which local authorities can also play their part in supporting.

Dr. Godman: Designated places, while most welcome, tackle only a small area of alcohol abuse—public drunkenness. When will the Government consider giving a part of the massive revenues which accrue from the sale of alcohol to educational programmes, particularly those for the young?

Mr. MacKay: It is important that we convince people that drinking sensibly and in moderation is perfectly satisfactory, and that alcohol abuse can be dangerous. The Scottish health education group carries out advertising campaigns and distributes packs of various kinds to help on the issue. We also encourage schools, as part and parcel of their general health education scheme, to draw attention to that programme.

Mr. McQuarrie: My hon. Friend mentioned Peterhead. He will be aware that there is an application from Whitehill House in Peterhead which is run by a voluntary organisation. The application was made in May this year. When is my hon. Friend likely to come to a decision on that application? I hope that the answer will be favourable.

Mr. MacKay: We are looking carefully at the applications from Peterhead, Dundee and Paisley. I cannot say when I shall reach a conclusion. We shall try to do it as quickly as possible.

Mr. Craigen: The Minister said that he had three proposals before him. How many applications have there been in total from voluntary bodies and local authorities for detoxification centres? Will the Minister have another look at the three-year funding arrangements?

Mr. MacKay: I cannot answer in detail the first part of the hon. Member's question. I have no evidence that the funding arrangements are stopping the programmes from coming forward. If there were evidence that that was the case I would look at that as I have looked recently at joint funding between health boards and local authorities.

Rate Relief

11. Mr. Marshall asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what further representations he has received about the operation of the Rating (Revaluation Rebates) (Scotland) Act 1985.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Michael Ancram): I have received a small number of representations on various points. Many of these points were the subject of debates in both Houses of Parliament before the passage of the Act last month. The others, relating more to the detail of the rebate scheme, have all been the subject of discussion with officials of the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities, rating authorities and assessors.

Mr. Marshall: What has happened to the £20 million shortfall of the £50 million promised at Perth to hard-pressed ratepayers? Will the Minister reconsider the matter in the light of the statement by the Solicitor-General for Scotland, who said publicly that he is in favour, as we are, of the entire £50 million being used? Has the Minister received any representations to that effect from the Solicitor-General?

Mr. Ancram: First, there is no £20 million shortfall. The scheme was always designed to be demand-led—[Laughter.] Opposition Members may mock that, but I remember that about three months ago they were talking about figures considerably below £30 million, which is unprecedented and generous support at this time. I have discussed the matter with my hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor-General. He is content with the scheme that we shall debate tonight, and he assures me that he will join us in the Lobby.

Mr. Fairbairn: As my hon. Friend is in the almost unique position of having been promised more money by the Treasury than he needs, will he use that example to ensure that the Treasury agrees forthwith with the Secretary of State and abolishes the distinction between guidelines and assessed needs, so that the inequity suffered by those who are above the guidelines but below the assessed needs can also be abolished forthwith?

Mr. Ancram: My hon. and learned Friend has raised this matter previously. He will be aware from statements by me and by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State that this matter is being seriously considered by the Government.

Mr. Roy Jenkins: Do the Government still intend to replace the rating system during this Parliament?

Mr. Ancram: The right hon. Gentleman knows that the Government are reviewing the system of local government finance. We have made it clear that we hope to introduce proposals at about the year end. It would not be right for me to pre-empt the consideration that leads to those proposals.

Mr. Corrie: Is my hon. Friend aware that several large companies, including Roche and Shell in my area, will receive no rebate under this order? Will he ensure that their appeals are heard reasonably soon, because they face large rate increases this year?

Mr. Ancram: I appreciate the need for appeals to be heard as swiftly as possible. Obviously, that is in the interests not only of the appellants but of the assessors, and I shall try to keep an eye on the matter.

Mr. Dewar: Does the Minister stand by the statement of the Secretary of State that a manifesto pledge on rating reform will not be good enough for Scottish Conservatives at the next election? Does the Minister accept that he cannot shrug off the £20 million as though it was small change? Is it not a scandal that the Secretary of State should parade the £50 million that he extracted from the Treasury as a battle honour at the Conservative party conference, and then simply not deliver? What does the Minister mean by the phrase "demand-led"? Is he trying to say that there is no demand from Scotland's hard-pressed ratepayers for the additional £20 million which they were promised, but out of which they are now being cheated?

Mr. Ancram: The hon. Gentleman will be aware, because we have debated the matter several times, that the Government had to decide on a multiplier beyond which the effects of revaluation would be unfair on those who had to bear them. We decided to have a multiplier of three, which was below the overall effect of the Labour Government's revaluation, when no help was given to ratepayers. It is a fair figure. When I say that the system is demand-led, I mean that the amount spent under the scheme depends on the number of those eligible under that multiplier.

As to my right hon. Friend's statement, the hon. Gentleman will have heard what he said. That remains the case.

Economic Prospects

12. Mr. Hirst asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement about current economic prospects in Scotland.

Mr. Younger: Last month the Scottish CBI reported optimism in manufacturing continuing to grow, with orders and output showing strong positive trends, investment in plant and machinery showing an upturn, and employment trends strengthening.

Mr. Hirst: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for his reply and I welcome the action that the Government have taken to stimulate the creation of new jobs in Scotland. Does he agree, however, that uncertainty over the future of Ravenscraig is casting a long shadow over economic and employment prospects in Scotland? While I accept that the BSC corporate plan is not yet available, will he reassure me and the House that he and his ministerial colleagues will fight like tigers for steel jobs in Scotland?

Mr. Younger: I appreciate that there is widespread concern about the future of Ravenscraig and, when the BSC has submitted its corporate plan, I can assure my hon. Friend that Ministers will have to consider it very carefully. At present, however, there are many other good developments in the Scottish economy, including a record level of investment in new projects, which I expect to continue.

Mr. Millan: Is the Secretary of State aware that, contrary to some suggestions in the press and elsewhere, there is widespread concern in Scotland at the Guinness takeover bid for the highly successful Scottish company of Arthur Bell and Sons, and that some of the statements by Guinness are not only unpersuasive but positively misleading? Will he put his weight behind the pressure for a reference of this bid to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission?

Mr. Younger: As the right hon. Gentleman knows, this is a strictly a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, who will take note of what the right hon. Gentleman has said. I of course remain extremely interested in the subject, and I have personally seen representatives of both companies.

SOLICITOR-GENERAL FOR SCOTLAND

Terrorism

38. Mr. Bill Walker asked the Solicitor-General for Scotland if he will give details of the instructions which his Department has given to procurators fiscal in connection with the prosecution of individuals charged with acts of terrorism.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland (Mr. Peter Fraser): No, Sir.

Mr. Walker: I realise that my hon. and learned Friend cannot make a statement on specific cases, but does he agree that, had it not been for the powers which the police in Strathclyde had under the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1984, the explosives which were discovered there recently would never have been found?

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: Clearly, I cannot comment on any individual case. However, I think that my hon. Friend's more general proposition is correct. We have a very real problem with terrorism, and the powers which are now given under the Act to allow for detention for a longer period seem in many circumstances to be more than justified.

Mr. Ron Brown: Is the Solicitor-General aware that not so long ago an hon. Member was detained and roughed up by the Glasgow police—[HON. MEMBERS: "Name him."] I refer of course to myself. Will the Solicitor-General ensure that this does not happen again to other Members of Parliament or to trade unionists, because repeatedly the Prevention of Terrorism Act is used against trade unionists?

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: I certainly was not aware that the hon. Gentleman had ever been detained under the Prevention of Terrorism Act. However, if he has a complaint to make against the police he should, as a responsible Member of Parliament, make that complaint properly so that it can be investigated, so that such allegations do not remain unsubstantiated and, if necessary, can be properly tested in the courts.

Mr. Maclennan: Will the Solicitor-General resist any temptations from the extreme Right or the extreme Left to put political pressure on the procurators fiscal?

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: I am wholly at one with the hon. Gentleman in believing that the system of procurators fiscal in Scotland is a fine feature of our legal system. They stand independent and objective in the prosecution of crime in Scotland. Both my noble and learned Friend and I would be very anxious to ensure that that status is always maintained.

Mr. Fairbairn: Will my hon. and learned Friend have a word with his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland and his right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary, and urge them to urge on the Metropolitan police the discretion of the Strathclyde police? The apparent desire of the Metropolitan police to advertise their genius in London did a great deal to undermine the magnificent work of the Strathclyde police force, which would probably have resulted in more arrests and more fines in the matter which it had under review.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: I take the point that my hon. and learned Friend makes, but I cannot comment on the individual case. He will be aware that where people are awaiting trial, given the provisions of the Contempt of Court Act, it would be extremely ill-advised for anyone—police officer, Minister or anyone else—to comment on such cases lest, in one way or another, that might prejudice the right to a fair trial.

Rape

39. Dr. Godman asked the Solicitor-General for Scotland against how many people proceedings have been instituted for rape and related offences in the last three months.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: Proceedings were taken against 76 people in April, May and June.

Dr. Godman: During the course of a recent rape trial in the High Court at Paisley, the names and addresses of the the two accused were published in the Greenock Telegraph. Does the hon. and learned Gentleman agree that, in the interests of fairness, the names and addresses of the accused in rape trials should not be permitted to be published unless or until they are found guilty?

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: I have seen the press reports to which the hon. Gentleman refers, but I see no breach of the law in the way in which publication was made in the journal concerned. However, the hon. Gentleman will be aware that during our proceedings on the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) (Scotland) Bill, we considered that very matter in Committee. A new clause was moved to deal with it but, after consideration, it was withdrawn. Provision is made for the anonymity of complainers, but in Scotland, if the accused are adults, the giving of names and addresses is permitted.

Coal Mining Dispute

40. Mr. Dalyell asked the Solicitor-General for Scotland what are the most recent conveniently available statistics he has for prosecutions during the miners' dispute.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: In all, 1,012 people have been prosecuted for incidents arising out of the miners' dispute; 721 of those have been convicted; while 227 have been acquitted. There are still 64 cases pending.

Mr. Dalyell: What is the Minister's attitude towards the forthcoming Ealing meeting between Mr. McGahey and Mr. Loudon on this subject.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: As Solicitor-General for Scotland, I have no opinion on that matter. As I have said repeatedly in answers to questions on the subject, it is a matter of prosecutions before the criminal courts. Issues of industrial dispute and questions of unfair dismissal are to be resolved either as a matter of negotiation or before the tribunals that are established to determine whether there has been an unfair dismissal. It is not for me to comment on that.

Mr. Wallace: Will the hon. and learned Gentleman accept that, among those acquitted, there have been reported instances of people who have also been dismissed? Will he, with his legal background and training, explain to the Secretary of State for Energy the distinction between unfair dismissal cases, which can lead to compensation but not necessarily to reinstatement, and the conciliation procedure, which can lead to people who have been unfairly dismissed being reinstated in their jobs?

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: I appreciate the point that the hon. Gentleman makes, but he is wrong to assume that either the Secretary of State for Scotland or the Secretary of State for Energy fails to understand the issues. My right hon. Friends and I have said repeatedly that it is a matter for the National Coal Board to determine. If it has it wrong, there are tribunals that deal with matters of unfair dismissal, where remedies of one sort or another are available to those who complain.

Mr. Henderson: In view of persistent rumours that there has been harassment of miners who worked during the strike and their families, will my hon. and learned Friend say whether there have been any prosecutions of that nature since the dispute?

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: It is obviously difficult for me to identify that or to give any statistical information. However, on an anecdotal basis, I am aware that cases have come before the courts involving assaults and breach of the peace in which those who were involved have been working miners or those who have been on strike. How directly those come out of the miners' strike is an issue on which I cannot give a concluded view.

Mr. Eadie: Is the hon. and learned Gentleman aware that the NCB has written to chief constables asking that the NCB be allowed to precognosce police officers before they attend industrial tribunals? Apart from any question concerning the legality of that, does the hon. and learned Gentleman not think that it would be a waste of time as well as interference?

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: No. Generally, in Scotland, if people are to be required as witnesses before courts or tribunals, it would seem good sense that before they come into the court or the tribunal to give evidence, some sign as to what their evidence is likely to be should be given. If people are seeking to precognosce policemen, that would seem a sensible step.

Mr. Dick Douglas: The hon. and learned Gentleman will be aware that I have written to him about a specific case that is illustrative of the issue generally, the case of Mr. Allan Collins. Sheriff Reid in Dunfermline has shown his concern that the miner involved in that case should not suffer the double jeopardy of being fined by the court and being dismissed by the Coal Board. Whatever else may be at issue, the Solicitor-General has some responsibility for saying clearly to the House and the country that, in the interests of justice, miners who have expunged their responsibilities to society should not suffer the severe penalty of being dismissed by the Coal Board.

The Solicitor-General for Scotland: The hon. Gentleman used the term double jeopardy, which I might use in a rather more technical sense. I am aware of the case, and the hon. Gentleman is aware that, following the concern that the sheriff has shown, steps were taken to have that case adjourned and brought before him at a later stage. I understand that that later stage has not yet occurred. Once again, I have to say that in those circumstances it would be wholly inappropriate for me in any way to express a view on it.

Mr. Willie W. Hamilton: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Does it arise out of questions?

Mr. Hamilton: It arises directly out of questions, Mr. Speaker, and you will probably know the point that I am about to raise.

You might recall, as I do, when Prime Minister's questions came after question No. 45, and that question was often reached. Today, and this is not for the first time in Scottish questions, we reached only No. 12 by 3.20 and we had no less than 10 minutes on question No. 2 on the miners' strike, which is as important to me as to other hon. Members. However, there are more nurses in Scotland than miners, and some of us attach as much importance to nurses' conditions as we do to those of miners.

My point of order is simple. My question is No. 13, which was not reached. It relates specifically to nurses' wages and how that the interests of patients will be jeopardised because of the way in which the wage increase is to be financed. This is extremely important. I know that you, Mr. Speaker, consider questions carefully before you come to the Chamber, and I hope that next time you will assess the relative importance of questions. I hope that when next I table a question on this important matter you will take this occasion into account and take steps to see that my question is reached.

Mr. Speaker: In fairness to the hon. Gentleman, I agree that we did not make good progress. I interrupted on two occasions, and many times from a sedentary position, as both questions and answers were very long.

Teachers (Pay)

Mr. Giles Radice (Durham, North) (by private notice) asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement about the dispute on teachers' pay following the adjournment of the talks in the early hours of this morning.

3.35 pm

The Secretary of State for Education and Science (Sir Keith Joseph): I regret that there was not a settlement to the teachers' pay dispute by early this morning. I am sure that the whole House shares that regret. The Government are clear that they want the dispute settled and our schools back to normal, but not at any price.

Yesterday, the management side made clear its willingness to see a settlement involving 5 per cent. for all teachers from 1 April this year, with an underpinning figure of £480 a year. In addition, it was willing to contemplate a merger of scales 1 and 2 with effect from 1 September and a further 1 per cent. on all scale points with effect from 1 November, provided that agreement could be reached in principle with the teachers on a total structure package covering pay and conditions to be discussed with me in time for any resulting agreement to be built into next October's rate support grant decisions. That would have given teachers a money increase of a little over 5·8 per cent. this year and the base line for teacher salary negotiaions beyond November 1985 would have been increased by over 6·4 per cent.

I understand that the employers made it clear that those figures took them to, and in many cases beyond, the limit of their ability to pay. The teachers were not willing to accept. The House is aware that I wrote on 21 May to the then chairman of the management panel about pay and conditions of service. I have since repeated the Government's position. We are not willing to make additional resources available for 1985-86 or to relax expenditure targets and grant holdback arrangements for that year, but we are willing to make extra resources available for teachers' pay in 1986-87 and to help meet the cost of removing midday supervision of schools from teachers' standard duties provided — I must emphasise this — that there is satisfactory progress by October towards the Government's objectives for improving quality and standards in the education service.

I have made it plain that October is the critical period because of the timing of Government decisions on rate support grant. After yesterday's meeting, it is all the more important for local authorities and teachers, as well as the Government, that acceptable progress be made by October, thus allowing additional resources to be unlocked for the education service. As a result, local authorities would be able to offer substantially improved career and promotion prospects based on consideration of all of the relevant factors such as teachers' qualifications, skills and experience, the quality of the work done and the demands of particular teaching posts and the difficulty of filling them. Linked with that, the Government would want a clearer statement of teachers' duties. The Government are willing to consider whether midday supervision might not be outside the standard expectation and be arranged and paid for separately. I dearly invite local authority employers and teachers to make progress in those directions.

Mr. Radice: The Secretary of State has once again told the House about the contribution that he is prepared to make towards an agreement with the teachers next year, but parents want to know what, apart from general exhortation, he is doing to solve this year's dispute. I am disappointed that the Labour-led employers' imaginative new approach has not yet produced a settlement — [Laughter.] It is quite clear that Conservative Members are not interested in a settlement.

Does the Secretary of State agree that, during the 13-hour marathon session, the employers and the teachers demonstrated flexibility? Should not the Secretary of State show equal flexibility and help teachers and employers to bridge the gap that is still between them? Could he at least relax the RSG penalties? The right hon. Gentleman knows that the Labour party is doing everything in its power to bring about an agreement.

Is it not about time that the Secretary of State descended from his ivory tower and did everything in his power to solve this dispute, which is proving to be so damaging to our education?

Sir Keith Joseph: The Government will not relax the target and penalty framework. I must remind the hon. Gentleman that I have been offering on behalf of the Government the same sort of contribution towards the financing of education on the same conditions as have been repeated frequently since 21 May for well over a year. The teachers have consistently refused to discuss it. It is not I who have lacked flexibility. As for the opportunities of the hon. Gentleman and his colleagues in the Labour Party, I would remind both him and them that they have allies in the teacher associations. What is he, and what are they, doing to bring the teacher associations, in particular the National Union of Teachers and their leaders —[HON. MEMBERS: "You are the Secretary of State."] The hon. Gentleman laid himself open to this question, since he asserted that he and his party are doing their best to bring the dispute to an end. I have to remind him, and it, that they have allies among the teacher unions, in particular among the leadership of the National Union of Teachers. What are they doing to bring those individuals to their senses and face reality? The pupils must come first. I should like for once to hear the hon. Gentleman put their interests before those of the unions.

Mr. David Madel (Bedfordshire, South-West): Should not the employers make sure that each individual teacher understands precisely what the latest offer is? Then the unions, with the help of ACAS, should ballot the teachers not only on the latest offer but on the wider issue of restructuring salaries.

Sir Keith Joseph: Mr. Teacher — Mr. Speaker. [Laughter.] Your predecessor, Mr. Speaker, was a teacher, but that does not justify my slip of the tongue. My hon. Friend has made a valid point. I am not at all convinced that every individual teacher knows what is on offer from the Government. If I could find a way of making sure that all teachers did, I should pursue it. It would then be up to the teacher unions to pursue the idea of balloting, again in some cases, if they so decided.

Mr. Clement Freud (Cambridgeshire, North-East): We agree that pay and conditions must be linked, but would not the Secretary of State agree that he must show a little more flexibility? Nobody will come out of this dispute getting what he wants. Might he not think again about the 14 points in his letter of 21 May and at least agree some of the uncontentious points? It seems that the Government have two alternatives. The first is to do nothing and let the teachers and the employers stew. The other is to show a little understanding of what is going on and to depart a little from their inflexible position.

Sir Keith Joseph: The hon. Gentleman is ignoring the fact that I have offered, on behalf of the Government, additional money for teachers on condition that they co-operate in improving the effectiveness of schooling, which is, after all, for the benefit of the children.

Mr. Mark Carlisle (Warrington, South): Since it must by now be abundantly clear to everyone, first that the Government will not add further funding this year for teachers' pay, and, secondly, that the employers have gone as far as they possibly can, as they said last night, within those limits is it not now in the teachers' own interests that they should start to talk immediately about restructuring pay and conditions so as to take advantage of what the Secretary of State has said about next year? Could my right hon. Friend consider whether it would help in that direction if he indicated the sort of figures that he might have in mind, should a suitable agreement be reached?

Sir Keith Joseph: I entirely agree with my right hon. and learned Friend, but I shall be unable to give an indication of a figure for what might be available until some willingness to negotiate is shown and some progress has been made.

Mr. Martin Flannery (Sheffield, Hillsborough): Is it not a fact that the Government are grossly undervaluing teachers in the state sector and are responsible for the lack of the education that children would have received if the Government paid teachers a proper wage?

Why has the Secretary of State, at this time of all times, linked conditions of service with teachers' wages for the first time when they are saying that they should get their proper wage now and that they would be willing to discuss conditions of service and restructuring afterwards? Most people do not know that, because the press does not tell them. It is disgraceful that the alliance should have gone along with the Government in this.

Sir Keith Joseph: The Government are above all concerned with the effectiveness of schooling for the children. It is on that basis that we seek the co-operation of the teachers.

Mr. Harry Greenway (Ealing, North): Does not my right hon. Friend agree that the time has come to discuss the salaries of head teachers and deputy head teachers separately? Will he bear in mind that for one spell of 13.5 hours last week, teachers' unions and the employers were talking separately and came together for only 18 minutes of negotiation? Does not that show that the Burnham structure has decayed and should be dispensed with?

Does my right hon. Friend know that the Labour education spokesman, the hon. Member for Durham, North (Mr. Radice), shared a platform in outer London the other day with Militant Tendency and sacked miners and said that he was delighted that there were strikes in 14 schools, including two special schools? The Labour party, and especially the hon. Member for Durham, North, is damaging children. It is time that it stopped.

Sir Keith Joseph: I have to agree with my hon. Friend that the Labour party seems to choose to support teachers the whole while, in conflict with the interests of the children. I am concerned that, as far as I can gather, the differentials of head teachers seem to have come under pressure during the negotiations. I hope that the importance of adequate differentials for heads and their deputies will be borne in mind.

Mr. David Young (Bolton, South-East): Will the Secretary of State take on board the fact that if he were negotiating on behalf of a private organisation or company, he would rightly have been sacked many months ago? Will he also take on board the fact that the choice that he is giving teachers is either more flexibility from the Government or that they should leave the profession if they want an adequate standard of living?

Sir Keith Joseph: No, there is a third alternative, which is to negotiate to secure additional money from the taxpayer so that transformed career and promotion prospects may be made available to teachers.

Mr. Nigel Forman (Carshalton and Wallington): Is it not clear that my right hon. Friend's letter of 21 May offers a sensible basis for the settlement of this difficult and long-running dispute? Would not it be helpful if the proposals in that letter were made more publicly available to the people who should know about them?

Sir Keith Joseph: Yes, indeed. If I could find a way to make them more publicly available, I should wish to pursue it, but my hon. Friend must remember that, as Secretary of State, I do not employ the teachers.

Mr. Derek Foster (Bishop Auckland): If the Secretary of State will not stir a finger to achieve a settlement, will he stop denigrating the teachers and admit that, by his own action, he has forfeited their co-operation which he says is essential to what he wants to achieve?

Sir Keith Joseph: I am constantly paying tribute to the hard work, dedication and effectiveness of most teachers. I have stirred a finger to offer additional money in return for co-operation.

Mr. Radice: For next year.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett (Denton and Reddish): For next year.

Sir Keith Joseph: No, I have been offering it for the past year, in return for arrangements that would provide teachers with much better career and promotion prospects.

Mr. James Couchman (Gillingham): While I acknowledge that the entry pay for qualified teachers is not high, and that many teachers feel that they must take on administrative duties to enhance their top salary level, does my right hon. Friend agree that both parents and pupils will rightly feel dismayed at the breakdown of last night's talks, when they might otherwise have hoped that the new school year which begins in September would not be disrupted, especially pastoral and extramural studies?

Sir Keith Joseph: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend.

Mr. Guy Barnett (Greenwich): Is the Secretary of State aware that, as a consultant to the NUT, I have plenty of allies in the union, and, indeed, sufficient contact with teachers to know the measure of anger that they feel and the degree to which teachers, including some of our best teachers, are voting with their feet? How often has the right hon. Gentleman met the teachers to discover those facts for himself?

Sir Keith Joseph: I am in the habit of accepting practically every opportunity given me to meet teachers. When I visit schools I always make plain my willingness to meet deputations of the staff. The hon. Gentleman should take account of the doubts expressed by some of my hon. Friends. Do all teachers know the shape of what the Government are offering? I wonder whether they do.

Johnson Matthey Bankers

3.51 pm

The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Nigel Lawson): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a statement. I told the House on 20 June that if further investigations into the affairs of Johnson Matthey Bankers were to turn up any evidence of fraud, appropriate action would be taken. Investigations have been continuing since then. Although, strictly speaking, they have not so far established prima facie evidence of fraud, they have revealed serious and unexplained gaps in the records of Johnson Matthey Bankers, including the possibility of missing documents relating to substantial past transactions on certain accounts that are the subject of large losses.

In the light of that, Johnson Matthey Bankers has today requested the Commissioner of the City of London police to conduct a preliminary inquiry with a view to establishing whether any criminal offences may have been committed. The result of the inquiry will be reported to the Director of Public Prosecutions, who will advise what, if any, further action should be taken. The House will, of course, be kept informed.

Mr. Roy Hattersley (Birmingham, Sparkbrook): The Chancellor of the Exchequer was wholly right to inform the House of this latest development in the Johnson Matthey affair at the first opportunity, and I thank him for that. Obviously, it is not possible to speculate about the outcome of the police inquiry — [HON. MEMBERS: "But."] It is, however, essential to clarify the procedure which now follows. Will the Chancellor of the Exchequer confirm that two prosecutions may now result from the unhappy affair: first, regarding the auditors, about which he told the House a month ago, and now Johnson Matthey Bankers? What is more, because of their mutual mismanagement, the Bank of England and the Government are involved in the whole episode. It grows increasingly difficult to answer the question why Johnson Matthey Bankers was bailed out in the first place, and so quickly.

Does the Chancellor of the Exchequer agree that the fullest revelation of all the facts is essential? Will he promise that after the police inquiries there will be a general inquiry into the whole Johnson Matthey Bankers' scandal, either by a Select Committee of the House or under the Tribunals of Inquiry of (Evidence) Act 1921?

Mr. Lawson: I am grateful to the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) for his initial welcome. He referred to the two matters which are now under way as if they are somehow similar. In fact, they are very different. There is the prospect of civil action by JMB, which is now a wholly owned subsidiary of the Bank of England, against the auditors Arthur Young McClelland Moores and Co. Secondly, there is the separate preliminary police inquiry.

The right hon. Gentleman asked why Johnson Matthey Bankers was bailed out. I gave a full explanation of that when I made my statement on 20 June, and the matter was covered fully in the annual report of the Bank of England. As for what might happen in future, I think that it is better at this stage to wait and see.

Sir William Clark (Croydon, South): Is my right hon. Friend aware that his statement will be very welcome, so that the whole affair can be cleared up once and for all? Does he agree that if the Bank of England had not intervened in the Johnson Matthey affair there could have been a loss of confidence in the City, which would have been detrimental to the invisibles sector of the economy?

Mr. Lawson: My hon. Friend is right. There were obvious dangers to the London gold market especially, which was a special and important feature of the case. It is striking how open the Government have been in revealing to the House details of this matter, in sharp contrast to what happened under the previous Labour Government during the lifeboat incident.

Mr. Richard Wainwright (Colne Valley): Will the Chancellor of the Exchequer explain to the House why it is only now that he is able to tell the House that serious and unexplained gaps in the records have come to light, when various skilled teams of investigators have been engaged in the Johnson Matthey investigation over the past six months? How much longer does he think it will take possibly to produce prima facie evidence?

Mr. Lawson: The fact that the documents were missing was not established until quite recently. Since the Bank of England took over Johnson Matthey it has stopped further out-flows and has been working to establish the full extent of the bad debts, which I reported to the House on 20 June. It has been engaged also in getting Johnson Matthey Bankers back into a shipshape and saleable condition, so as to protect taxpayers' and the Bank of England's money and that of the indemnifiers. The inquiry is not the only matter in which the Bank of England has been engaged, but I am satisfied that it is diligently pursuing the inquiry with the aid of its advisers. I am sure that it is as anxious as the House to have a prosecution for fraud if any evidence of fraud should be found.

Sir Anthony Grant (Cambridgeshire, South-West): Is my right hon. Friend aware that the deplorable goings on at Johnson Matthey Bankers have caused the most acute embarrassment to many of my constituents who work successfully and honourably with the chemical division of Johnson Matthey? Will he emphasise that the two companies are quite separate, and in so doing wish every success to those who work in Johnson Matthey chemicals?

Mr. Lawson: I did so when my hon. Friend properly raised the matter on 20 June, and I gladly do so again now.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover) rose——

Hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Skinner: Is the Chancellor of the Exchequer aware that if the Attorney-General had acted on 12 November 1984 when I asked him a question about the fraud squad's investigation of this matter there is a fair chance that some of the tracks that have probably since been covered up would have been found and explored thoroughly by the fraud squad?

The right hon. Gentleman will be aware that in the Crown Agents' affair very few people were trapped at the end because there was too long a delay. In the London and Counties Security scandal, Gerald Kaplan managed to get to America because of the delay. The result is that he has got off scot free. In other words, he has obtained an amnesty. If the right hon. Gentleman compares the Johnson Matthey Bankers' affair with the Slater, Walker fiasco, and all the others that arose at about that time, he will find that most of those involved got off scot free. Against that background, is he not open to the charge that, because he has delayed matters and refused to answer my questions and those of my hon. Friends, people such as James Firth, a director, whose son was employed by one of the largest borrowers from Johnson Matthey, have been able to cover up all their tracks? The borrower is a personal friend of the Prime Minister and of the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry.

Is it not a scandal that the Chancellor has come to the House eight months after Johnson Matthey's exposure on 30 September? The result is that we will be lucky to get hold of any of the culprits, yet there are so many people to pick on. Why does the right hon. Gentleman not act against the Governor of the Bank of England? Why is the Governor not charged with the fact that he allowed so much neglect to take place? What about Michael Arnold, who worked for the auditors and apparently could not discover anything throughout 1984? One of those auditors is now in charge of looking after the NUM's funds. What a scandal this is.

Is it not a fact——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The House knows that the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) has taken a special interest in this matter, but he must not make a speech.

Mr. Skinner: Is it not a fact that, by being so laggardly, the Chancellor and the Attorney-General, with the connivance of the Prime Minister, will allow these people to get off scot free while miners have been locked up in gaol for doing absolutely nothing?

Mr. Lawson: I resent and reject the hon. Gentleman's allegations. I had hoped that he would welcome my statement.

Mr. John Maples (Lewisham, West): Does my right hon. Friend agree that one of the most difficult decisions that a central bank has to make from time to time is whether to rescue a particular financial institution? It is, by contrast, extremely easy for the Opposition to cast doubt on those decisions in ignorance of the full facts.

Mr. Lawson: My hon. Friend is correct, but, strictly speaking, that is not the issue before the House. This is a serious matter. It concerns the fact that the Bank of England, through Johnson Matthey Bankers, has reached the point where sufficient suspicion has arisen through the missing documents to lead the Bank of England to feel justified in asking the City fraud squad to make a preliminary inquiry.

Mr. Robert Sheldon (Ashton-under-Lyne): Is it not clear that the rescue of Johnson Matthey Bankers, by comparison with a large number of firms which have been allowed to go to the wall, represents an error of judgment by the Chancellor? Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that Johnson Matthey Bankers has shown itself to be the unacceptable face of capitalism, whereas the Chancellor's actions have shown themselves to be the unacceptable face of Government intervention?

Mr. Lawson: The right hon. Gentleman is wrong on both counts. First, the decision to rescue JMB was not my decision but that of the Governor of the Bank of England. Secondly, it was not an incorrect decision. In my judgment, the Governor of the Bank of England was correct in taking that decision.

Mr. Anthony Beaumont-Dark (Birmingham, Selly Oak): Does my right hon. Friend accept that most of us will think that he was right to make this statement, because the invisible earnings of the City of London are important to our balance of payments? Does my right hon. Friend accept that what has happened at Johnson Matthey is a scandal which should be investigated, wherever it goes, and whatever its results? Bearing in mind the City revolution to come, the loss of confidence in the City by events such as the Johnson Matthey incident and the fact that Lloyd's has cast a great cloud over many people's views of the City's reputation, should not the same strictures be applied to Lloyd's, as a police investigation would bear heavily upon many people involved in some of the disgraces there?

Mr. Lawson: My hon. Friend will know that investigations into Lloyd's are going on. The prosperity and future of our people are threatened by the unacceptable face of Socialism. Whereas we are acting properly against what the right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Sheldon) called the "unacceptable face of capitalism", the unacceptable face of Socialism is publicly embraced by the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Brian Sedgemore (Hackney, South and Shoreditch): Is the Chancellor aware that Mr. Michael Hepker, the chairman of a public company, Sumrie Clothes Ltd., who today left the country, has been leading the Bank of England auditors, Graham Mark and Robin Collier, up the garden path ever since the collapse of Johnson Matthey in relation to a £1·5 million loan made to Ravensbury Investments, an offshore Isle of Man company, which loan involved a whole series of frauds, including a fraud on Johnson Matthey? Will the right hon. Gentleman confirm that on 29 June 1982 Eric Ellen, the director of the International Bureau of Maritime Fraud, went to see Ian Fraser, a director of Johnson Matthey, to tell him about various proven misdemeanours in which Mr. Mahmud Sipra, who controls the El Saeed empire which led to the collapse of Johnson Matthey, had been involved? Will the right hon. Gentleman confirm that, on 12 December 1982, he telephoned Mr. Fraser to tell him that Mr. Sipra was caught up in a £3 million fraud and that it was ridiculous to continue to lend him money, only to be met with the reply by Mr. Fraser, "You chaps are all the same. You don't give anyone a chance."? Will the Chancellor give a guarantee that he will come to the House next week, when I hope to present further details of fraud at Johnson Matthey?

Mr. Lawson: If the hon. Gentleman has any relevant evidence, I hope that he will immediately make it available to the police.

Mr. Eric Cockeram (Ludlow): Will my right hon. Friend accept that his assurance that if any fraud is uncovered the matter will be brought to the attention of the Director of Public Prosecutions is little comfort, in view of the repeated lethargy of that department? I remind my right hon. Friend that fraud at Lloyd's was uncovered more than 12 months ago, yet no action has been brought by the DPP.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Wide questions promote wide answers.

Dr. Oonagh McDonald (Thurrock): Is the Chancellor aware that his statement makes nonsense of the Prime Minister's reply to me last Thursday, which was reinforced in her Monday letter to me, when she said that she saw no purpose in an inquiry into the relationship between Johnson Matthey and companies to which loans had been made? Does not everything that the Chancellor has said today underline the need for such an inquiry? What will the right hon. Gentleman do to shake the Prime Minister's complacency about Johnson Matthey?

Mr. Lawson: There is no question of complacency on the part of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, myself, any member of the Government or the Governor of the Bank of England. We have acted throughout on all the evidence that has been made available. It was impossible to act before there was any evidence. Now that further facts have come to light, the Bank of England and Johnson Matthey Bankers, without any delay, have called in the police, who will report to the Director of Public Prosecutions.

Mr. John Stokes (Halesowen and Stourbridge): Disregarding much of what the Opposition have said, is my right hon. Friend aware that the honesty and integrity of the City of London is at stake? We look to my right hon. Friend to help us in every possible way.

Mr. Lawson: I agree with my hon. Friend that the honesty and integrity of the City of London are of the first importance. As I made clear in my statement of 20 June, it would be wholly wrong to assume that the shambles, and worse, at Johnson Matthey Bankers was in any way characteristic or typical of banking in the City of London. It does no good to this country to pretend otherwise.

Mr. Laurie Pavitt (Brent, South): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that, apart from the large companies which were caught, a large number of small businesses are affected? I know of the tragedy of a small concern in Norfolk which had been built up over 30 years and which has gone to the wall. Does the Chancellor's announcement offer any hope that, after a lifetime of work, these small businesses will be rescued from bankruptcy?

Mr. Speaker: Order. That question has nothing to do with Johnson Matthey.

Viscount Cranborne (Dorset, South): Now that my right hon. Friend has set such a good example in dealing with white collar fraud, can we expect him to encourage the responsible authorities to promote similar investigations into the Lloyd's insurance market?

Mr. Speaker: Order. That question is no good, either.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): May I ask the Chancellor to give an assurance that every penny of public money expended on rescuing that bank will be returned to the public purse before the company is again privatised? May we now have a copy of the Price Waterhouse report?

Mr. Lawson: As I made clear to the hon. Gentleman earlier, the Price Waterhouse report contains details which, because of the law relating to banking confidentiality, cannot be revealed. It also bears upon the legal action which the Bank of England and Johnson Matthey Bankers contemplate against Arthur Young McClelland Moores and Co. On the hon. Gentleman's point about money being returned before privatisation, the money that will be received by the Bank of England as a result of the privatisation of Johnson Matthey Bankers will play an important part in the recovery of funds which have been expended.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): Did it come to the Chancellor's ears from around the gold market and elsewhere in the City before Christmas that there was a likelihood of fraud being involved? On what date, before or after Christmas, were Sir Robert Armstrong, the Prime Minister and the Chancellor warned of the likelihood of fraud in the Johnson Matthey Bankers case?

Mr. Lawson: I received no such warning at any time. The Bank of England discovered the documents to be missing last week.

Mr. Robert C. Brown (Newcastle upon Tyne, North): As it becomes increasingly apparant that a large sum of public money has been involved in fraud, will the Chancellor give the House an assurance that if, after the fraud squad's inquiries, the Director of Public Prosecutions reveals that the villians have fled, he will dismiss the Governor of the Bank of England, and resign?

Mr. Lawson: No, Sir.

Mr. Hattersley: Does the Chancellor agree that the exchanges of the past few minutes confirm the need for a general inquiry? At some point, must he not answer the question why, when my hon. Friends below the Gangway suspected fraud six months ago, the Bank of England suspected it only yesterday?

Mr. Lawson: The right hon. Gentleman's colleagues below the Gangway suspect fraud on every occasion, whether or not there happens to be any evidence of it.

Wages Councils

4.11 pm

Mr. John Prescott (Kingston upon Hull, East): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The substance of the statement on wages councils which is about to be given to the House was reported in The London Standard at 2 o'clock this afternoon. I wonder whether you can say what rules govern these matters, because many Opposition Members read in the evening paper what the Minister was going to say.

Mr. Speaker: The House will be aware that I have the greatest sympathy with what the hon. Member has said. If statements which are embargoed are issued to the press, they should not be printed.

The Secretary of State for Employment (Mr. Tom King) indicated dissent.

Mr. Speaker: If they are embargoed, they should not be printed before the statement is given to the House.

Mr. King: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. In case there is any misunderstanding, may I say that I share the feelings of the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) about this matter. No embargoed statement was issued to the press. The House will have to draw its own conclusions as to whether there has been a leak. I take the strongest exception to leaks from my Department. I bitterly regret the fact that this has happened.

Mr. Prescott: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. The Secretary of State has acted honourably in giving that statement. Will he look into the matter further and tell us later how the report occurred?

Mr. King: If I can, because I should dearly love to do so.

Mr. Speaker: Mr. King, to make his statement.

4.13 pm

Mr. Tom King: With permission, Mr. Speaker. I should like to make a statement concerning the Government's intentions on the future of wages councils and on international labour convention No. 26.

As the House will know, I published in March a consultation paper on the future of wages councils. That canvassed two main options: either total abolition or reform of the system — including, in particular, the limitation of their powers and duties and the removal of young people from the scope of wages councils.

In addition to the report from the Select Committee on Employment, over 700 organisations and individuals responded to the consultation paper. While the TUC and individual trade unions favoured retention, the consultations confirmed that there is a widespread dissatisfaction among employers with the present wages council system. The majority of them favoured a range of substantial reforms to meet these concerns. I promised to inform the House as soon as the Government had taken decisions on those matters, following the ending of the consultative period.

The Government's overriding concern is to promote employment and to remove any excessive burdens on employers. The present system inhibits the creation of more jobs and that is especially true in the case of young people. The present powers of wages councils also undoubtedly impose complex and unnecessary burdens on business. The Government believe that the case for radical reform is clearly made, and propose to introduce early legislation which will, first, remove all young people under 21 from any regulation by wages councils.

Hon. Members: Disgraceful.

Mr. King: Secondly, it will confine wages councils to setting only a single minimum hourly rate and a single overtime rate for those aged 21 and over.

I shall also be proposing new powers which will significantly simplify the procedures under which the Secretary of State may modify or abolish individual councils.

Following consultation, the Government have decided to deratify international labour convention No. 26 and I shall be informing the International Labour Organisation of our decision within the next few days. The window for denunciation opened on 14 June and it is necessary to give 12 months' notice before the convention ceases to apply. That will therefore mean that, subject to the progress of the necessary legislation in this House, it should be possible to bring into effect changes approved by Parliament as soon as they become law.

My right hon. and noble Friend the Minister without Portfolio, supported by my right hon. Friends and myself, published yesterday the White Paper, "Lifting the Burden". That set out clearly the Government's determination to reduce burdens on business and to seek in every way to improve the prospects for jobs. This statement today of a major package of reforms is directed to precisely those objectives, and I commend it to the House.

Mr. Prescott: It is both deplorable and ironic that two statements made to the House today should involve the ever-increasing greed of some of the City wealthy within our society and wages councils. The statement on wages councils represents an unashamed renunciation of Britain's international obligation to maintain minimum protection for the lowest paid in Britain, of whom I have employment experience.

Why does the Secretary of State disagree with the conclusions drawn by his predecessor, the right hon. Member for Waveney (Mr. Prior), who, as we are aware from a leaked Cabinet document from 1982, bitterly opposed such mean measures because they would marginally increase the number of jobs at the expense of adult workers and would be portrayed as an attack on those who are particularly vulnerable?

Does the Secretary of State accept that Britain is the only one of 92 civilised countries which is now prepared to renounce its international obligations? The Government's renunciation of the fair wages resolution in 1983, as the evidence presented to the Select Committee on Employment showed, led to a 25 per cent. reduction in wages, holidays and conditions and fewer jobs. Does he accept that some protection is necessary to guarantee minimum holiday periods and paid weekend overtime, as the all-party committee on Sunday shopping recommended that those conditions should be an essential part of any implementation of Sunday shopping? How will these proposals affect that recommendation?

In his statement, the Secretary of State claimed that his proposals would increase jobs. What evidence does he have to support that statement, as he confirmed to the Select Committee only a month ago that he had no such evidence?

As the Secretary of State must know, many of the 2·75 million people covered by the wages councils are women in very low-paid jobs, often earning sums below the supplementary benefit level. What estimate has he of the increase in the family income supplement benefits, which will grow with the downward pressure on wages that the decision is designed to achieve?

In International Youth Year, the Government's contribution is to remove legislation that is covered by international convention. It will mean less pay, shorter holidays and greater exploitation of youth labour by funnelling YTS youngsters into lower-paid industries. It will reduce the unemployment figures by replacing them with low-paid women workers, who will not be eligible to register as unemployed. It is a squalid proposal, consistent with the Government's overall policy of making the wealthy wealthier and the poor poorer, and there is no evidence that it will produce extra jobs.

Mr. King: In his opening comment, the hon. Member complained about a leak from my Department. He then boasted of another leak. I object to all leaks from my Department.

Anyone who has begun to understand the operation of the wages councils will know of the complexity of the orders. They are a major burden on employers. Many of the problems of the present system — and what are alleged to be breaches of it — arise from the sheer complexity of the orders.

We are determined to encourage employers to give the best possible opportunity to young people. We believe that the proposal will help in the employment of young people. That is why we attach importance to it.

Sir Ian Gilmour (Chesham and Amersham): Although I believe that the wages councils are marginal to the problem of unemployment, I congratulate my right hon. Friend on proceeding by way of a sensible improvement of the wages councils, rather than by way of abolition, which would have been a grave mistake.

Mr. King: I note what my right hon. Friend says and I understand his point. I believe that our package of proposals is a sensible way to proceed. We attach the highest importance to the creation of new jobs. I may disagree with my right hon. Friend as to the extent to which our proposals may help to reduce unemployment.

Mr. Ron Leighton (Newham, North-East): Is the Secretary of State aware that the removal of young people from the protection of wages councils is based on prejudice, not evidence? Youth wages have declined markedly, both relative to those of adults and absolutely, since 1979, yet youth unemployment has risen disproportionately faster.

Does the Secretary of State know that the young workers scheme—a device to lower youth wages—was singularly ineffective in providing new jobs? Does he realise that, if there is an increase in the employment of young people because of their cheapness, it will be at the expense of adults? Does he realise that that will be additional evidence to young people that the Conservative party is their enemy?

Mr. King: I do not accept the hon. Gentleman's last point.

There is clear evidence that, if the wages of young people were more sensibly related in percentage terms to the adult rate — as they are, for example, in West Germany — a number of additional jobs would be created. At the moment, it is impossible in many areas for employers to employ young people of 16 and 17 at 50 per cent. or 60 per cent. of the full adult wage rate. In West Germany, the percentage of the adult wage may be between 15 and 25. My concern is to see the creation of openings and opportunities for young people. When their wages are artificially high, it simply ensures that there are no jobs for them.

Sir William Clark (Croydon, South): Will my right hon. Friend agree that in many respects over the years the wages councils have outlived their purpose? Indeed, they have inhibited new employment and the creation of more wealth.

It is acceptable that young people under 21 should be exempt from the wages councils, but will my right hon. Friend keep under constant review the effect of the revised wages councils provisions on those over 21, and if necessary increase the age limit?

Mr. King: I give an undertaking that we shall keep these matters under review. The modification or abolition of individual wages councils is an important component in my proposals.

My hon. Friend will have noted my comment that the majority of employers within the wages council areas favour reform. Account should be taken of that fact.

Mr. David Penhaligon (Truro): Is the Secretary of State aware that, while many may recognise that there is some logic in paying the adult rate at 21 rather than at 18 or 19, the removal of all protection from those under 21 will be seen as outrageous? It will permit exploitation of one of the most vulnerable sections of our society. The whole concept of wages councils was to protect the vulnerable.

Given what is proposed by the Secretary of State, will he say why it was decided to deratify? As I understand international labour convention No. 26, the Government could probably stay within it, even given the proposed changes in the wages councils. What does the Minister see as the advantages of deratification, other than being able to abolish the lot at a later date?

Mr. King: I draw the hon. Gentleman's attention to a slightly bizarre feature of the ILO procedure. He said that the changes would "probably" come within the convention. Obviously, we have to ensure that we act entirely in accordance with our international obligation.

Under the ILO system, one has either to give notice now, while the window is open for a year, or for five years one has no opportunity to make any change whatever. In an area that is important for domestic policy-making, it is essential that we should have the opportunity to determine the policy ourselves.

The greatest area of vulnerability for those under 21 is unemployment. I am putting forward proposals to give them the best possible chance of jobs.

Sir Peter Hordern (Horsham): I congratulate my right hon. Friend on bringing forward the proposals. Do they include the agricultural wages council? What is to become of that council?

Mr. King: My hon. Friend is referring to the agricultural wages board, which is dealt with under a separate convention. My right hon. Friend the Minister for Agriculture, Fisheries and Food has already made a separate statement about that.

Mr. Frank Field (Birkenhead): Is the Secretary of State aware that thousands of my constituents will regard the Government's statement as offering them a prospect of poverty on benefit or poverty on low wages?

Will the Secretary of State come with me to Merseyside jobcentres, where he will see jobs advertised at £1·20 an hour, £1 an hour, £57·25 a week, and some at princely sums of £70 and £91 a week?

Will the Secretary of State now withdraw his policy of trying to reduce money wages, and for the first time as a Government spokesman bring proposals to the House aimed at raising real wages?

Mr. King: I was on Merseyside on Friday, as the hon. Member may know. His point refers to the present situation. I am not sure whether he is suggesting that my proposals will change it in a significant way.

Mr. George Walden (Buckingham): Is my right hon. Friend aware that many of us will support his proposals, not because they appear to be a compromise—which is no doubt how they will be represented in the press—but because they satisfy the two main concerns at the forefront of our minds, jobs for the young and protection of workers where that is most needed?

Mr. King: I believe that that is right. I believe that small businesses have the potential to be and will increasingly be the source of more jobs. The burden of cost and compliance with the regulations is a major constraint on further employment, and that is the issue to which we give the highest priority.

Mr. Don Dixon (Jarrow): Does the Secretary of State realise that his proposals will not create one job, and that many unscrupulous employers will sack those over 21 and replace them with youngsters under 21 at lower wages?

Is it not ironic that the Secretary of State for Employment should make a statement attacking those at the bottom of the wage scale when his colleague, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, has just made a statement about the fiddlers at the top?

Mr. King: I do not agree with the first comment of the hon. Member. This measure will mean the creation of more jobs. A number of cases are being reported to my Department about young people being dismissed because they have been offered jobs that they are willing to accept at wages which the employer can afford. Inspectors are then saying, "You are not allowed to accept that job." I can recount those instances to the hon. Member. That is an intolerable situation and one which this House should not countenance.

Mr. Nicholas Budgen (Wolverhampton, South-West): Is my right hon. Friend aware that all comfortable and respectable opinion will congratulate him on his statesmanlike fudge? The only people who will regret his decision are the weakest and the poorest, who will continue to be priced out of work until these councils are abolished.

Mr. King: I note the characteristic question of my hon. Friend. This will be of real help to young people in giving them a better chance of avoiding the ultimate degradation of unemployment. It will give them the chance of jobs, and I attach great importance to that.

Mr. J. D. Concannon (Mansfield): What protection can the Secretary of State offer if, as has been said, a person's 21st birthday becomes the date of his sacking? Is the only redress a young person will have on his 21st birthday the unfair dismissals legislation? If that situation comes about, will the Secretary of State review the policy he is pursuing today?

Mr. King: I do not accept the scenario painted by the right hon. Member. He knows the situation which exists now and knows very well that in this country young people's wages have got out of phase. The evidence I am about to give may be obtained from the Electrical Contractors' Association and the EETPU. An agreement there reduced the wages of first-year apprentices from £42 to £28. As a result, the number of apprentices in that industry trebled.

Mr. John Gorst (Hendon, North): I congratulate my right hon. Friend on proceeding by way of reform rather than abolition. Could he give an assurance that, if abuses or hardships are brought to his notice, he will act swiftly to deal with them?

Mr. King: As instanced by the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) there are problems in the present situation. We wish to ensure that we have a system in which employers recognise their responsibilities, and in which we create the maximum number of jobs at wages which employers can afford and which employees are willing to accept. That is our objective in tackling the problems of unemployment. We will obviously keep a close eye on the situation as it develops.

Mr. Ken Eastham (Manchester, Blackley): Is it not a fact that poverty wages have a direct effect on people's life cycle? The Minister referred to apprentices' rates of pay, but that has nothing to do with wages councils. The rates are negotiated with the trade unions. On occasion, the Minister has quoted the United States of America as not having wages councils, but is it not a fact that the United States has a minimum wage, which is higher than that recommended in the United Kingdom?

Mr. King: I used the illustration of apprentices because it is the clearest possible illustration of the principle. I know perfectly well that apprentices are not covered by wages councils. I am seeking to make the point that, when the wages of young people are fixed at an economic level, it is likely to lead to more jobs. The hon. Member referred to the problems of poverty. The question from the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) was about state support, for instance in the form of family income supplement. What we must not do is confuse the two issues.

Mr. Nicholas Lyell (Mid-Bedfordshire): Is it not clear from the comments of Opposition spokesmen, both official and alliance, that they recognise that these measures will help young people price themselves into jobs? Is it not also clear, and will my right hon. Friend confirm, that the recommendations of the Auld report on the deregulation of Sunday trading, are still available as an option?

Mr. King: The Auld report made recommendations about the retention of wages councils and about the setting of minimum wages. Those matters will need to be considered in whatever legislation comes before this House. I am surprised that the Opposition do not accept what is now widely perceived, that wage rates for young people—even though they have fallen back, as the hon. Member fairly said—are still significantly higher than, for instance, in Germany. It is interesting to note the much higher level of youth employment in Germany as a result.

Mr. Kevin Barron (Rother Valley): In answer to a question put by me on 11 June 1985, asking whether the Department was thinking of attacking the minimum wages paid to people under 21 years of age, the Under-Secretary of State, the hon. Member for Eltham (Mr. Bottomley), said no. Can the Minister tell us why his Department has changed its mind in that time, as I suggest it has? The Minister misquoted an agreement with the Electrical Contractors Association about trainees, but that has nothing to do with wages council industries. What evidence does he have that cutting this vital protection for people under 21 will help? In most of the areas we are talking about, people work for £1 an hour; we are not talking about anything lavish. What evidence can the Minister give us that he is going to do anything other than attack low wages and bring them down to YTS levels? I am sure that that is the thinking of this Government.

Mr. King: I am sorry that the hon. Member will not accept the clear illustration I gave. He probably knows, for example, that Ford apprentices in this country are paid twice as much in their first year as Ford apprentices in Germany. There are many more apprentices in Germany. The principle is that an employer fixes wage rates for starting people who in their first years of work make only a limited contribution to the performance of the business. He will not offer them employment if wage rates are fixed at a level way beyond what they are worth.

Mr. Gerald Howarth (Cannock and Burntwood): I welcome my right hon. Friend's recognition that the reform of wages councils will create more jobs. Will he not accept that the abolition of wages councils would increase job opportunities even further? Will he not therefore go further than he is going today?

Mr. King: As I said a little earlier, we took the consultations very seriously. It was significant that a sizeable majority of employers preferred reform and preferred to keep the wages councils. It is important that young people should be exempted and we are also taking these alternative powers to deal with the problems of individual councils. However, we will keep the matter under review.

Mr. Robert C. Brown (Newcastle upon Tyne, North): How can the Minister seriously suggest that those over 21 need minimum wage protection while those under 21 are to have this protection abolished by law? Is the Minister aware that, in conventions on human rights, this nation is now the pariah of the 21 nations of the Council of Europe? If we depart much further from democracy, our right to be a member of the Council of Europe will be seriously challenged.

Mr. King: I do not know what on earth the hon. Member bases his last assertion on. We are not proposing to introduce universal rights for all those over 21. We have consulted all the industries covered by wages councils, and they favour reform. There is an urgent need in the case of young people, and we intend to look individually at the other councils.

Mr. Alan Howarth (Stratford-on-Avon): I congratulate my right hon. Friend on the thoroughgoing reform which he has announced, and for refusing to be swayed by the unimaginative and heartless advocates of the Opposition. Does he agree that it is quite wrong to present an issue in terms of the withdrawal of protection for young people, when the reality is that wages councils have all too often laid down minimum rates of pay for young and inexperienced people at levels above those which employers can afford? That has been one of the causes of the present serious problem of unemployment.

Mr. King: I suspect that I am not the only Conservative Member who is nauseated by those who preach about the problems of unemployment but will not face up to some of the tough decisions that must be taken, and do not realise what is really happening. I hope that when we see the improvements that will be made by this measure, even some Opposition Members will recognise its merits.

Mr. Robert Maclennan (Caithness and Sutherland): How many of the industrialised countries with which we are in competition have found it necessary to denounce ILO convention No. 26? If we are out of line, is it because the Government's policy on minimum wages has failed, or because their policy on the employment of the young has failed?

Mr. King: As the hon. Member may know, the ratification of ILO conventions is extremely complex. Several countries ratify very few. The United States, because of its federal structure, has ratified few, if any. We have ratified rather more since we came into office, and have deratified only two. Labour Governments deratified ILO conventions. We shall consider them practically and pragmatically.

Mr. Tony Baldry (Banbury): Is my right hon. Friend aware that many will conclude that the Government have found exactly the right balance between protecting the interests of the weak and lower paid and ensuring that wages councils do not inhibit the creation of new jobs? Does he further agree that it is right to take younger people out of the remit of wages councils, since in this area they have inhibited the creation of new jobs by setting too high wages? It is right to set simple, single adult rates, because wages council orders are far too complex — often running to 30 pages — for employers or employees to understand, and are thus self-defeating. Many will conclude that, after the widest possible consultations, the Government have come to the most sensible conclusion.

Mr. King: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. I know of his close interest in the subject and the work that he has done. I hope that the drastic simplification of the operation of wages councils—previous studies of orders show how complex they have become, especially for smaller employers—will assist in the creation of new jobs.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett (Denton and Reddish): Does the Secretary of State accept that, in commending wages council legislation to the House, Winston Churchill made the fundamental point that the good employer is undercut by the bad employer and that the bad employer is undercut by the worst employer? That was why wages councils were needed. What evidence does the right hon. Gentleman have to show that Winston Churchill's recommendations were wrong? Does the Secretary of State want youngsters to be employed only by the worst employers?

Mr. King: If the hon. Gentleman had made more than a superficial study of the position, he would have known that Winston Churchill set up trade boards, which were mostly concerned with health and safety. They are now covered in separate legislation. The trade boards dealt mainly with manufacturing industry, whereas the wages councils cover mainly hotels and catering, the retail trades and part-time workers, including many women. The Government at that time were anxious to prevent sweating, as it is called, which is now covered by separate legislation. It is a different matter.

Mr. Ray Powell (Ogmore): Will the Minister let us know the total number of young people who will be affected by the measures? Will he also remember that many shop workers, who are still not covered by wages councils, are young? What protection will he give to them? The Minister talked about sweatshops. In Ogmore, 8,000 people are unemployed, 1,000 of whom are youngsters aged under 21. What protection will he give to those who are working in the sweatshops that are mushrooming in my constituency and in Wales generally?

Mr. King: I thought that the hon. Gentleman said that they were unemployed, but I may have missed the point. Obviously, I cannot give the hon. Gentleman the figure. We believe that the measures will lead to increased job opportunities for youngsters, but it is impossible to predict how many will be affected.

Mr. Peter Thurnham (Bolton, North-East): In welcoming these partial steps, may I ask my right hon. Friend to remember, when considering each industry, the advantages of abolition, especially for 20-year-olds, who might celebrate their 21st birthdays by getting the sack?

Mr. King: I understand my hon. Friend's point but, considering the earnings in those areas, I hope that that will not be the case. The new measures will help to avoid the obvious anomalies, where employers who wish to employ more young people cannot do so because they are required, for example, to pay a 16-year-old who has never worked 50 per cent. of the full adult rate. That cannot be justified, and we must tackle the problem.

Mr. Michael Foot (Blaenau Gwent): Since the right hon. Gentleman is content to lower standards and wages, especially for the young, does he believe that it is a good idea for other countries to follow our example? Does he not understand why those conventions were signed? Is it not disgraceful that Britain should be at the head of a drive to lower standards?

Mr. King: The right hon. Gentleman has heard all the exchanges on this matter, yet he appears to have paid no attention to the points that have been made. How can it be a positive benefit to any youngster to fix wages, in relation to adult rates, at twice the rate paid in Germany, if the result is that British youngsters are unemployed while German youngsters have jobs?

Mr. Spencer Batiste (Elmet): Can my right hon. Friend confirm that he has received many representations from industries involved with wages councils advocating their retention, but the removal of the damaging side effects that have built up? Is he aware that the skilful balance of measures that he has announced this afternoon will be widely welcomed by those who are genuinely concerned about job creation and increased training prospects for the young, although it will not be welcomed by those who weep crocodile tears and have no constructive alternatives to suggest?

Mr. Prescott: Twenty pounds a week—that is what it means.

Mr. King: I am grateful to my hon. Friend, who put the point better than I have succeeded in doing so far. I genuinely believe that we can help young people in this way. There is no merit in artificially preserving rates of pay which ensure that no one obtains employment.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I know that this a matter of great interest to the House, but we have a heavy day ahead of us. I shall allow questions to continue for 10 minutes, and I hope that everyone can be called.

Mr. Michael J. Martin (Glasgow, Springburn): As a former trade union officer, I know that many people in the catering trade work long hours, and that many youngsters in that trade are mentally and sometimes physically handicapped. They know nothing but hard work, and they are entitled to the protection of the Government. What will the right hon. Gentleman do to ensure that such youngsters are not exploited?

Mr. King: The hon. Gentleman raises a serious point about handicapped people, which no doubt will arise when we discuss the legislation.

Mr. Michael Forsyth (Stirling): Does my right hon. Friend agree that wages councils discriminate against the handicapped, ethnic minorities and young people, and that his proposals will be a fillip for them? Does he agree that the Opposition have shown that they can offer nothing to the young unemployed, and that they are happier to respond to the needs of their bosses in the trade unions than to tackle these fundamental problems?

Mr. King: I very much agree with my hon. Friend. The hon. Member for Glasgow, Springburn (Mr. Martin), who is an experienced trade union official, will know that there is a real problem here, which we must consider. The operation of wages councils can inhibit the employment of disadvantaged people who, above all, want the respect and responsibility that comes from employment.

Mr. Greville Janner (Leicester, West): While recognising that the Government's proposals are part of the continuing process designed to strip those who are fortunate enough still to have jobs of basic minimum legal protection, may I invite the Minister to set out his proposals for the next stage in the process? Since he has decided to simplify the method of introducing regulations to abolish wages councils, thereby depriving the House of its normal procedures, and following the quadrupling of the qualifying period for unfair dismissal protection, can he say which councils he intends to abolish? Or will he not tell the House even that?

Mr. King: The hon. and learned Member, with his expert legal knowledge, has raised a number of points which will arise if legislation comes before the House, as I certainly hope it will, and which we shall need to debate. My concern today was to set out the main framework at the earliest opportunity, as I promised the House I would. That I have done. I do not wish to pursue further the line which the hon. and learned Gentleman invites me to travel.

Mr. Conal Gregory (York): Does my right hon. Friend share my incredulity at the comments made by the Opposition in connection with a number of the councils such as the ostrich and fancy feather and artificial flower council, and the need for them? May I draw to his attention the fact that the Dutch Government introduced the young person's level of 23 and that, by considering reform along those lines, we will increase Britain's greatest growth industry, tourism? There will be delight, particularly in tourism circles in Yorkshire, that, as a result of these measures, some 60,000 to 70,000 jobs a year will be created.

Mr. King: I certainly accept what I think is a very important point. If we are considering future sources of employment, the scope for tourism is very significant. I hope that we may soon have something more to say on this.

The age level is obviously a matter of judgment. I took the view, after full consideration, that 21 was the right age. I have no doubt that that matter will be debated fully when we come to consider the legislation.

Mr. Derek Fatchett (Leeds, Central): Given that the Government's case depends on their argument that low wages will produce more jobs for young people, can the Secretary of State explain why the highest levels of unemployment for young people are found in those regions with the lowest wage rates for young people and the lowest levels of unemployment for young people are found in those areas with the highest wage rates for young people?

Mr. King: A number of other factors—not least the concentration of traditional industries and the scale of problems which have affected some of those industries—also dominate those issues.

Mr. Christopher Chope (Southampton, Itchen): My right hon. Friend's announcement today will be widely welcomed, because it will create many new job opportunities for young people. It will give young people the freedom to negotiate their own wages. I wonder why my right hon. Friend is denying this freedom to those who are over 21 and whether, in the light of the White Paper issued yesterday, he will consider excluding from the provisions of the wages councils all those employed by small businesses.

Mr. King: I understand that point. I think that the balance which I have tried to strike is the right one, and I commend it to the House. But I have no doubt that all these issues of detail will be a matter for discussion in the progress of the legislation.

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): Why do the Secretary of State and his Government seem to regard being young as an illness? Does the Secretary of State understand that he is going to have a very tough time persuading young people that he is doing them a good turn by cutting their pay and reducing their conditions of employment?

Mr. King: I am amazed that the hon. Gentleman is prepared to defend the system when he knows perfectly well that, by historical accident and sometimes by negotiation, wage rates for a number of young people are fixed at levels which simply are not economic and at which, therefore, there are not jobs. I will recommend as firmly as I can a system that will give encouragement to jobs and will give the best possible opportunities to young people by employers being able to offer them employment. At the start of their working life, when they are not able to make a significant contribution to the firm, employers are willing to give them a chance, provided that the level of pay is one which a company can afford.

Mr. Matthew Parris (Derbyshire, West): How is it possible for the Opposition to argue that abroad low wages create jobs because they give foreign manufacturers the edge over ours, yet those mechanisms do not apply at home?

Ms. Clare Short (Birmingham, Ladywood): We have low wages.

Mr. King: The truth is that, as the hon. Lady the Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms. Short) says, we have low wages and low productivity and we then jack up the wages of young people in a quite unreal relationship to the wages of adults. As a result, we tend to have the worst of all worlds. It is to amend that situation that I bring these proposals to the House.

Mr. Stuart Bell (Middlesbrough): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that in the the northern region high unemployment and low wages go hand in hand, and that, since 1979, unemployment has doubled in the manufacturing sector, with 250,000 able-bodied men and women on the dole? In addition, 440,000 workers are on less than the decency threshold which was worked out by the Council of Europe. Is he aware that in my constituency there is one street in which 90 per cent. of the people are unemployed? Can he tell the House where in his announcement today there is any message of hope, expectation or a lifting of morale for those people?

Mr. King: The hon. Gentleman will know that we have taken a number of measures, concerned with improving training opportunities, work programmes for the unemployed and the help which we can give them in a range of different ways. We are determined to take every step which may help to open more employment opportunities. We are starting now to create more jobs, but not fast enough to bite into the levels of unemployment. However, we are on our way, and we will continue to take steps which will genuinely help employment opportunities. I know that the hon. Gentleman comes from a difficult area which has tragic problems, but we will face up to those problems and we will take the steps which we genuinely believe can help.

Mr. Martin M. Brandon-Bravo (Nottingham, South): May I join those who welcome the policy of reform rather than of abolition? However, are we right to choose some arbitrary age to distinguish between adults, skilled and otherwise? I am concerned about late entrants into an industry. It might be far better for an industry to be able to have a say in defining what is adult—for example, after three or four years of experience in an industry. That may be of greater practical significance than choosing the age of 21 or even 23.

Mr. King: I hear what my hon. Friend says, and I respect his close knowledge of one of the industries concerned in this area. It is, of course, important for the House to keep in mind that what we are talking about here is simply the minimum rate. It is open to industries to make alternative arrangements within that framework. It is the basic flaw in the situation with which we are concerned.

Ms. Clare Short: Is the Minister aware that we on the Labour Benches are nauseated by Tory Members with two or three jobs, earning £25,000 a year plus, talking about cutting the pay of young people who earn £35 a week and adult workers who earn between £63 and £75, many of them working for supplementary benefit rates? The Minister is not entirely honest with the House. His party has for a long time been determined to cut the wages of young workers. The Government therefore introduced a scheme called the young workers scheme, whereby they subsidised employers at the rate of £15 per week to cut young people's wages. The scheme failed completely, and is about to be abolished. A report of the Select Committee on Public Accounts found that 77 per cent. of the subsidised jobs would have existed anyway, and the vast bulk of the other jobs were jobs taken from adults. The Minister knows that cutting youth wages will not create more jobs.

The House should also note that, although the brunt of the attack is on young people, there is also an attack on low-paid adult workers. That means mostly women and black workers. The provisions to pay only for a single hourly rate and one rate of overtime result in no protection for holidays, no protection for piece-rate workers and no minimum rate, so that a worker can be sent home any day of the week if there is not enough work. The attack is upon all the protections of some of the poorest and most vulnerable in society. The Government are inspired by a future in which Britain will compete with some of the cheapest lowest paying sweatshops of the world. The Opposition believe in a high-wage, high-skill, high-investment economy. We reject this statement, on the grounds of social justice and economic efficiency.

Mr. King: The hon. Lady says that she believes in all those things. A better recipe than her approach for destroying more jobs more quickly it is difficult to imagine. How can she make these accusations and allegations when she knows perfectly well that I have already referred to the relationship with Germany? Why is it that in Germany it is not thought unacceptable to have sensible and economic levels for young people? That economy is not seen as a low-wage, low-tech, low-skill economy; it is seen as a sensible way to get young people in with a better chance of training and a better chance of a job. That is what we are embarked upon. The distortions and allegations which she makes have no part in our programme.

Later—

Mr. Michael Brown (Brigg and Cleethorpes): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. At the beginning of the statement made by the Secretary of State for Employment, the Opposition shadow employment spokesman, the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott), raised a point of order with you about the statement being made in the House before being given prominence elsewhere. Is it not extraordinary that, after raising that point of order, the hon. Gentleman did not have the courtesy to listen to the remainder of my right hon. Friend's statement?

Mr. Speaker: That is patently not a matter for me.

Civil Servants (Assistance to Members)

4.59 pm

Mr. Donald Coleman (Neath): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. In the course of the debate on the Welsh rate support grant last evening, my hon. Friend the Member for Ogmore (Mr. Powell) raised with Mr. Deputy Speaker the fact that the hon. Member for Ynys Môn (Mr. Best) was seen to be obtaining information from the civil servants box at the back of the Chamber, although that hon. Gentleman is neither a Minister nor a Parliamentary Private Secretary.

At that point, Mr. Deputy Speaker ruled, quite properly, that it was not a matter for his concern because the people in the officials' box were outside the Chamber. We accepted his ruling, although it was clear that an attempt had been made by the hon. Member concerned to seek privileges over other hon. Members. May we have your guidance, Mr. Speaker, as to the propriety of the hon. Gentleman's action?

Mr. Speaker: I am aware of the incident that was raised with Mr. Deputy Speaker last night, and I am grateful to the hon. Member for Neath (Mr. Coleman) for giving me notice of his intention to raise it today, because that has enabled me to look into it with great care. Departmental officials are admitted to the box behind the Chair so as to be available to Ministers.

Mr. Ray Powell (Ogmore): It was I who raised the point of order last night, when Mr. Deputy Speaker informed me that there had been no infringement of the rules of the House. It was obvious that civil servants in the box were giving documents to the hon. Member for Ynys Môn (Mr. Best).

I understand that that hon. Member was informed that this point of order would be raised, and I appreciate that his absence may mean that he is engaged elsewhere. The fact that he has been informed means that my hon. Friends and I are not raising the matter without his knowledge.

When I approached the officials' box—as I told Mr. Deputy Speaker that I would — to ask for some information that I wanted regarding the situation in the Ogmore constituency and in Mid-Glamorgan, I was handed a copy of the supplementary rate support grant report which I already had, and the officials would not furnish me with any other information. They told me that they were available to give information to hon. Members other than Government Back-Benchers. If that information is correct and we can all approach the box for information, I need not have raised the point of order in the way I did last night, and I would not be raising the issue again today. However, I take it that the ruling is that the officials in the box are available only to advise Ministers.

Mr. Speaker: I have nothing to add to what I have said. It is a question for Ministers and not for the Chair.

Social Security

5.3 pm

Mr. Michael Meacher: (Oldham, West): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. As you are no doubt aware, authoritative information has been made public today, based on leaked documents, giving the numbers of gainers and losers under the social security Green Paper and the amounts of their gains and losses, largely losses. It shows that the number of losers is in excess of 8 million, including 600,000 of the poorest on supplementary benefit, and that their total losses are about £1 billion.

Ministers, including the Prime Minister, have repeatedly said that the information is not available now, before the April 1987 uprating. These documents, which have been seen and copied, reveal that Ministers have repeatedly misled the House.

Will you, Mr. Speaker, use your good offices to ensure that a statement is made at the earliest opportunity by the Secretary of State for Health and Social Security, so that hon. Members in all parts of the House may have an opportunity to question him on essential information the existence of which he cannot deny and which should have been made available at the outset, when he made his original statement on 3 June?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Gentleman is raising matters which are for Ministers and not for the Chair. It is not for me to call Ministers to make statements. That is a matter for the usual channels.

Mr. Alan Williams (Swansea, West): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. My hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) was not asking you to force Ministers to make statements. He was pointing out that until now the House has been misled by being told by, among others, the Prime Minister that the information was not available. He was——

Mr. Speaker: Order. Nor is that a matter for me. It is for the Government.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): Further to the point of order, Mr. Speaker. The Prime Minister and other Ministers have consistently denied the existence of documents relating to the cost of the social security reviews. Proof has now emerged that such documents exist. Is it not incumbent on the Government to present those documents to the House in the normal way in the form of a statement?

Mr. Speaker: That is a matter for them, not for me.

Mr. Andrew Faulds (Warley, East): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. We have a requirement in the House that no hon. Member is allowed to accuse another hon. Member of lying, and it is proper that we should have that arrangement. However, it poses problems for hon. Members who wish to comply with that reasonable proposition when there is a clear case, as in this instance, the occupants of the Government Front Bench, including the Prime Minister, have been less than honest with the House of Commons. How are we to pursue these matters when it is clear that we cannot make the accusation, yet the accusation would be absolutely valid?

Mr. Speaker: There are plenty of opportunities at Question Time and at Prime Minister's Question Time.

Mr. Alan Williams: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. My hon. Friend the Member for Warley, East (Mr. Faulds) has touched on an important point. You say that there are plenty of opportunities when hon. Members can raise issues such as this, Mr. Speaker, but we shall go into recess in a week's time and will not return until the end of October. Apparently the information is available. The Government have refused to present it to the House and have actually denied its existence. May we have an assurance from the Leader of the House that a statement will be made before we rise for the summer recess?

The Lord Privy Seal and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. John Biffen): No assurance can be given, but I suggest that we might look at the matter through the usual channels.

Racial Harassment

5.7 pm

Mr. Harry Cohen (Leyton): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to create an offence of racial harassment; to place a duty on a landlord to seek eviction of a tenant who is convicted of such offence if it is committed against another tenant of that landlord; to provide for the right of appeal against eviction and against proposals for rehousing; to place a duty on landlords and local authorities to provide information on the rights and duties in relation to racial harassment; to make provision for investigation of complaints and for a code of practice; and to make provision for compensation of victims.

This important legislative step is designed to tackle the problem of racial attacks in and around people's homes. The need for such legislation is highlighted by the tragic deaths in Ilford last Saturday, when Mrs. Shamira Kassam, who was eight months pregnant, and her three small children died in an arson attack on her home. The evidence strongly points to racial motivation. Petrol was poured through the letter box——

Mr. Nell Thorne (Ilford, South) rose——

Hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Cohen: Petrol was poured through the letter box three weeks earlier; there was an attack on the same property three years previously, when it was occupied by a different Asian family; and across the road, done by a Fascist organisation, was obnoxious, racist graffiti. Under my Bill, the police would have been under a statutory duty to investigate the previous arson attacks and the incident of the graffiti as racially motivated crimes.

These horrendous and needless murders, to society's shame, cannot be treated as an isolated incident. There has been a steady increase in the number and intensity of incidents of racial harassment. Sir Kenneth Newman, in his June report about the situation in London, pointed out that the number of reported cases of racist attacks went up by over 18 per cent. in 1984, whereas the crime rate generally went up by 9 per cent. We know, moreover, that many cases are not reported to the police, either for lack of confidence in the police or for fear of reprisals.

Most of the victims are Asian of Afro-Caribbean. The official Home Office report of 1981 found that the incidence of racial victimisation of Asians was 50 times higher than for white people, and for Afro-Caribbeans it was 36 times higher. The Policy Studies Institute's report, "Black and White Britain, 1984", considered that the Home Office may have underestimated the incidence of racial attacks by as much as 10 times.

Police perception of and reaction to these attacks is mixed. There is an inconsistency in their recognition of the racial motivation for such crimes and in the speed and type of their response to them. For example, they often exhibit scepticism and even hostility to the victims. They arrive late at the scene of the crime and end up simply advising victims to pursue private prosecutions.

However, there is a slow realisation of the extent of the problem. Mr. Robert Bunyard, chief constable of Essex, is quoted in The Times on 7 June 1985 as saying:

"ethnic minorities live in dread."

The police, media and politicians may have been wrong to dismiss such problems and people's fears as trivial when they are not. Sir Kenneth Newman has formally stated that racial attacks will be one of his prime priority targets for 1985. He has said:

"Reducing the numbers will not be easily achieved, nor will it be won by the efforts of the police alone."

That, by implication, advocates tighter law and the need for clearer duties on the police in these cases. My Bill will provide just that.

However, the Bill also imposes duties upon local authorities, as it is also, in part, a housing Bill. There is a tentative policy to deal with the perpetrators of racial harassment in a few local authorities—Newham and the GLC should be praised—but it is a piecemeal and uncoordinated approach in the absence of effective legislative backing. There is a poor record of co-ordination between local authorities and the police in dealing with cases of racial harassment. That has resulted in a hotchpotch of responses, instead of clear guidelines embodied in statutory responsibilities.

Specifically, my Bill will put on the statute book for the first time the crime of racial harassment — a racially motivated crime by a member of one racial or ethnic group against a member of a different racial or ethnic group. Racial harassment denies one the right to peace and comfort in one's home and reduces the quality of life. It can mean that the person affected fears for his safety.

The Bill includes a schedule that delineates such acts. They include unprovoked assault — including actual bodily harm and grievous bodily harm — damage to property—including breaking windows, doors or fences — the writing of racial slogans or graffiti, arson or attempted arson or damage to a building used by a racial or ethnic group, including places of worship and cemeteries.

The Bill also lays down police procedures for the conduct of investigations, the maintenance of records and the publishing of findings. It lays duties on all landlords and local authorities to inform their tenants and ratepayers of the offence and its consequences. Connivance or neglect by an officer of a body corporate, which can be the police, a local authority or a company landlord, in dealing with a case of racial harassment is also an offence. An injunction can be sought to stop any further acts of harassment occurring, and stiff fines and/or imprisonment are introduced upon conviction.

In severe cases, the Bill provides grounds for the eviction of perpetrators. They include the possibility of a compulsory purchase order being instituted against a convicted racist owner-occupier, subject to the acceptance of the Secretary of State. A convicted racist tenant who is subject to eviction cannot subsequently be rehoused in accommodation of a superior standard.

Consideration of the provisions of the Bill answers the criticisms of those who casually suggest that no new laws are needed. I was disappointed by the response of the Prime Minister yesterday to my question. The right hon. Lady expressed personal sympathy about the Ilford murders, but she was not prepared to make any effort to bring in legislation to combat this increasing form of violence.

Despite the Government's law and order stance, they want to leave the law out of their response to crimes of a specific racial nature. On the other hand, legislation against racial harassment is supported by the Labour party because it protects and defends our democracy. We cannot assume that a peaceful democracy exits in all sections of our community while many ethnic minority citizens live in fear and in a state of siege in their own homes.

We do not want to encourage vigilantes, but neither should we turn a blind eye when there is evidence of individual or organised Fascism perpetrated against ethnic minorities. My hon. Friend the Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham), who is shadow Secretary of State for the Environment, has said:

"Victims suffer twice; they are attacked and then have to move home."

My hon. Friend is a sponsor of my Bill, and he has pledged that the next Labour Government will strengthen the law and help the victims of racial harassment. I am proud to have pioneered the way for future legislation against racial harassment.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Harry Cohen, Dr. John Cunningham, Ms. Jo Richardson, Mrs. Margaret Beckett, Mr. Max Madden, Mr. Ernie Roberts, Mr. Tony Banks, Mr. Jeremy Corbyn, Ms. Clare Short, Mr. Derek Fatchett, Mr. Gerald Bermingham, and Mr. Greville Janner.

RACIAL HARASSMENT

Mr. Harry Cohen accordingly presented a Bill to create an offence of racial harassment; to place a duty on a landlord to seek eviction of a tenant who is convicted of such offence if it is committed against another tenant of that landlord; to provide for the right of appeal against eviction and against proposals for rehousing; to place a duty on landlords and local authorities to provide information on the rights and duties in relation to racial harassment; to make provision for investigation of complaints and for a code of practice; and to make provision for compensation of victims: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Friday 25 October and to be printed. [Bill 195.]

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. When you asked for the names of those who supported the Bill introduced by my hon. Friend the Member for Leyton (Mr. Cohen), I distinctly heard the hon. Member for Crawley (Mr. Soames) and some of his colleagues near him saying that they were opposed to the Bill. Perhaps they may wish to clarify this, so that their view is clearly on record.

Mr. Nicholas Soames (Crawley): Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I did not say "No", nor did I hear any of my hon. Friends say "No".

Mr. Martin Flannery (Sheffield, Hillsborough): Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The hon. Member for Crawley (Mr. Soames) did say "No". Not only that, but he was rude and objectionable the whole time that my hon. Friend the Member for Leyton (Mr. Cohen) was speaking. What is more, he conducts himself permanently as a proper lout.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Order. We have gone far enough on this. I did not hear anyone challenge the declaration that I made on the vote on the Bill.

Mr. Corbyn: Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The hon. Member for Crawley says that he did not say "No" when Labour Members clearly heard him do so. Is it not incumbent on the hon. Gentleman to come clean about whether he supports or opposes the Bill to outlaw racial harassment?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. We are all honourable Members. The hon. Member for Crawley (Mr. Soames) has said that he did not make the remark that was attributed to him, and the House should accept that, in accordance with its usual practice.

Mr. Andrew MacKay (Berkshire, East): Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. As the hon. Member sitting next to my hon. Friend the Member for Crawley (Mr. Soames) for the whole time that the hon. Member for Leyton (Mr. Cohen) was speaking, I can assure the House that my hon. Friend did not shout "No" and did not dissent in any way.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I have already told the House that I accept the word of the hon. Member for Crawley, and I am sure that the House does.

Orders of the Day

Administration of Justice Bill [Lords]

As amended (in the Standing Committee), considered.

New Clause 5

PREPARATION OF PAPERS FOR PROBATE ETC. BY UNQUALIFIED PERSONS

'For section 23 of the Solicitors Act 1974 there shall be substituted—

"(1) Subject to subsections (2) and (3), any unqualified person who, directly or indirectly, draws or prepares any paperson which to found or oppose—

(a) a grant of probate, or

(b) a grant of letters of administration, shall, unless he proves that the act was not done for or in expectation of any fee, gain or reward, be guilty of an offence and liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding the first level on the standard scale.

(2) Subsection (1) does not apply to a barrister or duly certified notary public.

(3) Subsection (1) also does not apply to any act done by a person at the direction and under the supervision of another person if—

(a) that other person was at the time his employer, a partner of his employer or a fellow employee; and

(b) the act could have been done by that other person for or in expectation of any fee, gain or reward without committing an offence under this section.".'.—[The Attorney-General.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

5.18 pm

The Attorney-General (Sir Michael Havers): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): With this it will be convenient to take the following: New clause 7—Probate work by qualified persons—

'(1) Section 23 of the Solicitors Act 1974 (restriction on persons acting in probate matters when not qualified to act as a solicitor) shall be amended as follows.

(2) After subsection (2) there shall be inserted—

"(3) Subsection (1) also does not apply to any act done by a person who holds such qualifications as may be specified by the Lord Chancellor in an order made by statutory instrument under this section;

(4) An order made by statutory instrument under this section may be varied or revoked by a subsequent order and any such instrument shall be subject to annulment in pursuance of a resolution of either House of Parliament.".'.

Government amendments Nos. 5, 6 and 27.

The Attorney-General: In Committee an amendment was moved by my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash) to clarify the position of unqualified staff who undertake probate work at the direction and under the supervision of a solicitor. I undertook to table a Government amendment on Report to deal with the matter.

The new clause puts beyond doubt the legality of unqualified staff preparing probate papers in those circumstances. As the concept of supervision is not apt for the taking of instruction, we have decided to abolish the statutory restriction in this respect so as to enable solicitors' employees to continue to take instruction in probate matters without the risk of committing an offence.

We have also taken the opportunity to modernise and improve the existing drafting of section 23 of the Solicitors Act 1974.

The other amendments provide for appropriate transitional arrangements, and consequential amendments to clause 8, which relates to incorporated practices.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause read a Second time, and added to the Bill.

New Clause 1

JUDICIAL REVIEW

'If leave for an application to the High Court for judicial review is refused, the court shall state its reasons.'.—[Sir B. Rhys Williams.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams (Kensington): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

My right hon. Friends and I have discussed new clause 1, and they know that I am interested in the subject for personal reasons. They also know that a significant body of well-informed people who observe the procedures of our courts believe that a change in the practice of the courts such as I am suggesting is highly desirable and ought immediately to come into effect.

Private citizens have come increasingly to rely on the judicial review procedure to obtain justice. The application goes before a single judge, who assesses the merits of the case and decides whether the applicant is to be entitled to take his or her complaint to the High Court.

Although not universal, I understand that it is normal for the single judge to make a ruling without stating reasons in court or in writing. That is wrong and should be changed immediately. In the event of the applicant being refused leave to take a case further, he and his legal advisers will have to make a difficult decision. For a private citizen, there is possibly the risk of futile but substantial expense if he decides to take his case further. There might be long delays before the outcome of the case is known and, during that time, he might lose chances to choose another solution which is available to him at once, but which might not be available if, in due course, his case comes to court.

If the applicant is advised to take the issue up for judicial review and his case is rejected out of hand by a single judge, that is likely to shake his confidence in his legal advisers. He might wonder whether they have given him bad advice.

A sense of resentment can be aroused if somebody who thinks that he has a fair case which ought to be heard is refused a hearing and no explanation is given. That is a type of resentment which British citizens ought never to feel about the operation of our courts. There ought never to be a suspicion that their case has not been considered adequately or that some factor which they do not understand, and which they could have overcome, has stood in their way when seeking justice. Justice should never be frustrated arbitrarily.

I have not been through all the relevant cases to see how many times the single judge has refused an applicant who has afterwards been able to establish that he has a serious case to be heard, though I am sure that such evidence could be adduced. But my right hon. Friends should be willing to accept my proposed change of procedure irrespective of whether I can support my argument with such evidence.

If the judge is clear about his decision, he can express it without being exposed to a serious extra burden. I am not asking that he should make a substantial written explanation, but he must state his reasons. If the judge is not perfectly clear and does not wish to be embarrassed by having to explain himself, there could be genuine doubt about whether justice has been done. That could not be right.

I hope that my right hon. and learned Friend will assure me that, if he does not like a new clause of one and a half lines appearing in the Administration of Justice Bill, the same effect will be achieved by another and, if he wishes, more appropriate route. I do not know how the Lord Chancellor would influence the practice of the single judge in the High Court, but, if the House is not to divide on the new clause, we are entitled to look to my right hon. and learned Friend to give a specific undertaking that the change required by my new clause will be made by another means.

Mr. Alex Carlile (Montgomery): The hon. Member for Kensington (Sir B. Rhys Williams) has raised a serious and important issue. The use of applications for judicial review has greatly increased recently, especially since the changes in the procedure from the old prerogative writs to the use of what we now call the judicial review procedure under order 53 of the Rules of the Supreme Court. Judges at all levels have pushed back the borders of judicial review. They are increasingly prepared to consider cases where Government Departments, local authorities and other bodies exercising quasi-judicial functions have not operated a fair procedure and have not acted properly.

Most applications for judicial review are made by aggrieved private citizens—many of them of limited means—who feel that important principles that affect their interests, and perhaps those of many others, have been attacked by the action of Government Departments or other bodies. I suspect that since applications for judicial review have become fashionable as a means of seeking judicial remedy, there have been many frivolous and unmeritorious applications. For those reasons, among others, the procedures relating to judicial review have been altered and sophisticated to enable applications with merit to be heard rather more quickly than before—there are still considerable and unacceptable delays, however—and applications with no merit to be disposed of rapidly and relatively informally.

Judges have never been afraid, when called upon to do so, to give their reasons, if necessary stating that an application before the court, whatever the jurisdiction under consideration, lacks merit or is even frivolous, vexatious or an abuse of the court's process. A long-standing tradition, inherent in the court through the operation of the common law, is the power to declare openly that a matter before the court falls within the categories of frivolous, vexatious and an abuse of the court's process. There is no question, therefore, of judges being put in an unpalatable position through having to give reasons in the situation postulated by the hon. Member for Kensington.

Most important in this context is the fact that at the moment there is no Bill of Rights to deal with contemporary issues that affect daily life in this country. I believe that there ought to be a Bill of Rights. Unfortunately, neither the Government nor the Labour party has been prepared hitherto to accept the need to go even to the extent of incorporating the European convention on human rights into our domestic law. Consequently, all that many citizens can do, in an effort to enforce what they believe, rightly or wrongly, to be their rights, is to make an application for a judicial review. The jurisdiction of the courts in England and Wales is both lacking and inadequate in that respect.

One small way to ensure that such manifest feelings of injustice as can occur, did not arise would be to ensure that if an application is thrown out by the court, the applicant at least knows why. I hope that the Attorney-General will say that he accepts the principle that in such cases reasons should be given. If he is not prepared to accept that principle, I can assure him that the considerable pressure for fundamental changes to public law will become stronger.

5.30 pm

The Attorney-General: I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Kensington (Sir B. Rhys Williams) for raising this matter. I have a great deal of sympathy for it. I believe that I can give an assurance both to my hon. Friend and to the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile). The Government agree that reasons should always be given. If that does not happen in practice, we should be grateful if examples of difficulties could be sent either to the Lord Chancellor or to me. The Lord Chancellor will consult the judiciary and, if necessary, introduce appropriate rule changes under order 53, which has virtually created the new system of judicial review. The hon. and learned Member for Montgomery described it as rolling back the frontiers. I prefer to say that it is advancing the frontiers. Whichever word one prefers, order 53 has created considerable changes which can only be in the interests of the general public. Therefore, I welcome them.

The changes are entirely the result of the rules committee changing the rules. They have not been brought about by legislation. Therefore, the changes for which my hon. Friend the Member for Kensington and the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery have asked can be made by rules of court. Primary legislation is not the right way to go about it.

Having heard my explanation, I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Kensington will withdraw his motion.

Mr. Robert Maclennan (Caithness and Sutherland): Can the Attorney-General say what time scale he has in mind for the consultations and for the introduction of these changes?

The Attorney-General: I should like to be able to answer the hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland (Mr. Maclennan), but this new clause has been examined only recently. I have been one stage removed from it. However, my consultations earlier this afternoon with the Lord Chancellor have allowed me to give this assurance.

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams: With the leave of the House, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

I should like to thank my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney-General for what he has said. If the House were to divide on this new clause, the feelings of hon. Members would be quite clear. I hope that the rules committee will bear in mind the strength of feeling about this matter. Although this has been only a short debate, it is nevertheless incumbent upon the Lord Chancellor, or the rules committee, to ensure that action is taken quickly and that what is contained in my new clause should be brought into effect by one means or another.

In view of the assurance that I have been given, I shall not seek to divide the House this afternoon. Therefore, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

New Clause 2

RESTRICTIONS ON CONFLICTS OF INTEREST IN CONVEYANCING

'No person or body corporate shall engage in the conveyancing of any property if they have a financial interest (other than their fee for conveyancing) in that transaction or any related transaction, including, but without prejudice to the generality of the foregoing, the provision of loans for the purchase of that or of any related property or the earnings of fees or commissions from estate agency, mortgage or insurance broking; and any person in breach of the provisions of this Clause shall if he is a licensed conveyancer be guilty of an offence punishable by the Council in accordance with Schedule 4 of this Act and liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding the third level on the standard scale or, in the case of a solicitor, shall be regarded as in breach of the rules as to professional conduct under section 31 of the Solicitors Act 1974'. — [Mr. Butterfill.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. John Butterfill (Bournemouth, West): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

I rise this afternoon to provoke, I hope, a discussion on the considerable conflicts of interest that could arise from the conveyancing provisions of the Bill. Many hon. Members who are in the Chamber today were members of the Standing Committee and they will be aware of the reservations that I expressed in Committee. I shall itemise some of the principal areas where I see conflicts arising, in the hope that I shall receive assurances from my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney-General.

The Bill proposes to take away the solicitors' monopoly on conveyancing and to permit a new class of licensed conveyancers. Those who are now engaged in all aspects of property transactions and property exchange may seek either to become licensed conveyancers or to employ licensed conveyancers. It is that aspect that gives rise to considerable concern.

It is possible that many estate agents will be sufficiently qualified by the examination that they have taken to apply to be licensed conveyancers. Others may meet those criteria or may employ licensed conveyancers. I perceive great difficulties if estate agents were to be involved in both estate agency and conveyancing. Many property transactions form part of a chain. A long transaction may involve three, four or possibly five properties. An estate agent who is selling a property at the top of the chain for £150,000 and earning a commission of £3,000 or £4,000 might also be selling a property at the bottom of the chain for £30,000 and earning a commission of only £600 or £700.

Mr. Alex Carlile: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the problem he is discussing has already arisen over the two solicitors' property centres which have now been opened? One solicitor with an interest in the property centre is acting for the vendor, another solicitor with an interest in the property centre is acting for the purchaser, and both have an interest in the house being sold by the property centre. Already we can see the conflict of which we are afraid arising in something which has the support of the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell).

Mr. Butterfill: I am grateful to the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile), and I agree entirely with everything that he has said. Later in my speech, I propose to deal in detail with that aspect. An estate agent might have two commissions from property sales in a transaction. He might also be involved in conveyancing one or more of the properties in a chain of transactions. An estate agent who was due to earn many thousands of pounds from a chain of transactions, and who was also acting as a conveyancer, might be faced with a problem of title of one of the properties. There could be an irresistible temptation for him to fail to point out the problem or at least to gloss over it, in the hope that the chain would not collapse and cause him considerable financial loss. That risk should rule out the possibility of estate agents carrying out conveyancing.

If solicitors are involved in conveyancing and the sale of properties, the same conflicts of interest will arise. Solicitors are already involved in the sale of houses and the Master of the Rolls, Sir John Donaldson, says that there is nothing in the solicitors' practice rules to prevent them from carrying out what he calls "property sales work", which, apparently, has always been part of the work of a solicitor.

Sir John uses the phrase "property sales work" to differentiate the work done by solicitors from that done by estate agents. That is a spurious interpretation, and I am sure that all hon. Members agree that if a solicitor advertises that he will sell a house, in addition to doing the conveyancing, he is, by any logical definition, involved in estate agency and, therefore, should be subject to the Estate Agents Act 1979 and any other regulations applying to conveyancing.

It has been claimed that solicitors do not need to be subject to that Act because their practice rules and the Solicitors Act 1974 impose on them obligations which are much greater than those imposed by the Estate Agents Act. However, that is not so. Solicitors are not subject to the mandatory disclosure of interests of relatives, staff and relatives of staff that is imposed on estate agents under section 21 of the Estate Agents Act.

Solicitors are not subject to the jurisdiction of the Director General of Fair Trading, as are estate agents. Solicitors are not subject to the powers of entry and inspection under section 11 of the Estate Agents Act, and they do not have to give details of their remuneration and expenses before a transaction takes place, as is required under section 18 of the Act.

Perhaps most important, although estate agents are required to account to their clients for interest on deposit moneys held for those clients, solicitors are not so required and may keep for themselves any interest earned. That is an important difference.

Whatever comes out of the Bill, solicitors involved in estate agency or "property sales work" should be subject to the same rules as everybody else.

Mortgage and insurance brokers may apply to become licensed conveyancers or may employ licensed conveyancers. They have an acute interest in property transactions.

They arrange mortgages for substantial commissions and life assurance endowment policies for substantial and continuing commissions on annual premiums.

If those brokers are also involved in conveyancing, there will be a grave danger that the large commissions which they earn from their brokering work, which will be much larger than the fees earned from conveyancing, could impose an unacceptable conflict of interest on them. Like estate agents, they could be involved in chains and they could build up a bigger interest in completing the deal than in looking after the interests of their clients.

5.45 pm

Probably the greatest problem is posed by banks and building societies. If in-house conveyancers are permitted to act for both sides, all sorts of conflicts may arise for the banks and building societies. Many borrowers are required to place their building insurance with a company nominated by the bank or building society. Until recently, that insurance had to be placed with the one company nominated by the bank or building society.

When I moved my mortgage from a bank to a building society, I was required to change my insurer, although he was a reputable underwriter at Lloyd's, and I had to accept one of the society's choosing. As a result, my premium almost doubled, and a substantial commission went to the building society.

We have taken action in the House to require banks and building societies to give borrowers a choice of insurance companies. However, only three companies are nominated by banks and building societies, and those are chosen because they give the biggest commissions and not because they give borrowers the best bargain.

If we are to allow banks and building societies to do conveyancing, will an in-house conveyancer be likely to tell a borrower that he could get a better rate of interest or a better deal by going somewhere else? It would be difficult for such a conveyancer to take a noble view that was contrary to his employer's interests.

Sir Anthony Grant (Cambridgeshire, South-West): I declare an interest as an adviser to one of the major clearing banks. It may help my hon. Friend to know that the banks are not interested in going into the conveyancing business. They do not think that it is part of their business and they are not particularly interested.

Mr. Butterfill: I am grateful for that assurance, but I strongly suspect that although that may apply to the clearing banks—though I doubt it, because they have gone into estate agency in other areas — I wonder whether it will apply to some of the secondary and tertiary banks and the loan sharks who inhabit this world. I have grave doubts about that.

Mr. Nicholas Budgen (Wolverhampton, South-West): My hon. Friend will know that Lloyds bank owns the very large Black Horse estate agency. The bank might not wish to engage in conveyancing direct, but there is no reason why it should not do so through the estate agency.

Mr. Butterfill: My hon. Friend has anticipated something that I intended to say later, but I am grateful to him for reinforcing that point.

Many banks earn substantial commissions by requiring borrowers to take out with a company nominated by the bank expensive life assurance to cover loans. The commission earned from that sort of business is very large and is bound to create conflicts.

Even more important is the mortgage deed — the terms of the loan—and how a borrower can be protected from the one-sided approach and lack of independent advice that would arise if the bank or building society were the sole arbiter for both parties. How would an in-house conveyancer advise a borrower if that borrower were made redundant or lost his job in some other way, and could no longer meet the payments? Under what circumstances could a lender evict a borrower, and what would be the rights of the borrower's wife and children regarding their occupation of the property? A court may grant an eviction order, and the bank or building society may be given the power of sale. What then happens if the lender controls an estate agency, such as the Black Horse agency or some of the estate agency chains set up by major building societies? Will the lender be able to sell the house through his in-house estate agency, raise the money, and get yet another commission from the entire transaction? If so, on what terms?

Mr. Austin Mitchell (Great Grimsby): That depends on which estate agent conducts the sale. How does having the advice of an independent conveyancer at the start of the procedure safeguard against all those problems arising, such as a person losing his or her job?

Mr. Butterfill: I am sorry that the hon. Gentleman has missed the point. All those matters are contained in the mortgage deed — the terms of the loan — and are normally negotiated between the borrower and the lender through their solicitors or other advisers. I am sorry that the hon. Gentleman shakes his head. I have been in professional practice in this field for 25 years, and I have acted in innumerable disputes between lenders and borrowers of the type that I am now describing. I have also been involved in negotiating with all sorts of institutions on the terms of their mortgage deeds. I accept that many people do not take up these points, but they should. Perhaps some of them have not been properly advised in the past. The debate may bring to people's attention the fact that they should be properly advised, and if we do no more than that we shall have achieved something for the public good.

If a borrower finds himself in financial difficulties, will he be permitted to take in lodgers to supplement his income? If he goes abroad, will he be allowed to let his house while he is away? Many mortgage deeds do not allow that, but after negotiations the lender often concedes that under certain circumstances that can be permitted. However, the concession is granted only be negotiation, and if the borrower asks. If one is not independently advised, will one ask? In the event of a dispute between the borrower and lender which may go to court, what provisions will be made for arbitration, and who will bear its cost? All such conditions are set out in the mortgage deed and need to be negotiated between two independent advisers, not imposed by one particular adviser.

Those are only a few of the problems arising with banks and building societies. We may argue that those problems will not arise with our highly respectable building societies, such as the Halifax, the Woolwich, the Abbey National and others, but they will arise with other building societies. There have been considerable problems with the Grays building society, the management of which has not been all that it should be.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: Does the hon. Gentleman realise, on the basis of the Which? survey and our knowledge of the world, that two thirds of house buyers approach a building society first? The same survey showed that only 11 per cent. sought advice from a solicitor about their mortgage. The hon. Gentleman is telling us that solicitors are qualified to give independent financial advice, which they are not, and that people are receiving that advice now, which they are not.

Mr. Butterfill: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for mentioning the Which? survey, but it was conducted among Which? readers, who tend to be better informed and who think that they can decide on these matters for themselves. The problem is that the general public, especially the young and inexperienced house-buyer, cannot so decide, and do not. The hon. Gentleman should study the Marplan survey, which, contrary to the Which? survey, showed that second-time buyers, as opposed to first-time buyers, recognise the grave need to have independent advice. That is precisely the point. People with experience of the system realise where they needed to be independently advised. Therefore, Marplan produced the opposite result to Which?

Mr. Budgen: I wish to take up the point of the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell). The fact that only 11 per cent. of people want financial advice and that conflicts of interest may occur in only 1 per cent. of cases, is like saying that only 1 per cent. of those convicted before the courts are wrongly convicted. Are we not trying to deal with a grave injustice which may occur at the margin?

Mr. Butterfill: I agree with my hon. Friend.

Mr. Greg Knight (Derby, North): Does my hon. Friend agree that the argument of the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) is bogus? The hon. Gentleman referred to the percentage of people who approach building societies first, but is not the crucial point the fact that they then see a solicitor before they are committed to taking out the loan with the building society?

Mr. Butterfill: I agree with my hon. Friend. Most people, before they think about entering into a transaction, go to a bank or a building society to see whether they can borrow the money. After establishing that and finding the property, they go to their solicitor.

Mr. Tony Favell (Stockport): I wish to make the same point. Does my hon. Friend agree that, after going to a bank or a building society people have the benefit of independent advice from a solicitor before signing on the dotted line?

Mr. Butterfill: Again, I agree with my hon. Friend. We may argue that conflicts will not arise with the highly respectable banks which we know and love, such as Barclays, Lloyds and the National Westminster, or even with financiers of undoubted probity, such as Julian Hodge and Bernie Cornfeld. However, we are also dealing with the denizens of the nether regions of the financial market — the loan sharks and tertiary banks, which impose conditions which many hon. Members would not even believe. We are legislating for those areas, in addition to the household names, whose conduct is not entirely beyond reproach.

We are told that the Government will deal with all these problems by regulation; that the regulations, which are to be published, but which, regrettably, we have not yet seen, will overcome all the difficulties which may or could arise. I am grateful to my right hon. and learned Friend for showing me a copy of a letter which the Lord Chancellor sent to the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell), and one which the Prime Minister sent to the hon. Gentleman, confirming that the Government are resolute in their view that banks and building societies should not be allowed to act for both sides in the same transaction because of the problems that have arisen. I am reassured by my right hon. and learned Friend on that issue at least.

I am less reassured on the prospective regulations, which cannot and will not apply to solicitors who are involved in estate agency. I hope that my right hon. and learned Friend will be able to reassure me, that he will explain how he proposes to deal with the anomaly that may well arise if solicitors are permitted to continue to practice both conveyancing and estate agency, and that the Government will deal with all the problems that I have described. If they legislate for any extension of a conflict of interest which they may regard as being in the public interest—otherwise, it would be a restriction on trade—I hope that a warning will be issued similar to that which appears on cigarette packets. There should be a Government warning which states, "Entering into this transaction without taking independent advice could seriously damage your financial health".

I see no difficulty in providing one-stop shopping, which is so dear to the heart of the hon. Member for Great Grimsby and others. It can be provided by grouping businesses together under one roof. Why not have in one building a solicitor, an estate agent, a mortgage broker and even a building society? Perhaps they could all agree to charge a composite fee which would be lower than the sum of the parts. There could be agreed divisions of the fee of individual responsibility for those with whom they deal. If there is no individual responsibility, there will be temptations and conflicts of the sort that I have described.

For example, if a building society conveyancer, in acting for both sides, were to behave inappropriately or negligently, that would give rise to an action for negligence on the part of his client. If he were an independent solicitor, how could the borrower sue? How could he sue the building society's own solicitor, when that solicitor or conveyancer could say, "I was acting for my principal client, my employer. I have no duty to you."? Where would the remedy be for the borrower in those circumstances?

I hope that the Government will deal with all these matters when they come to address the regulations. I hope also that my right hon. and learned Friend will give an assurance that the regulations, when they are available, will be brought before the House for an affirmative resolution. The House must have the right to scrutinise. The matter cannot be left to the Lord Chancellor's discretion.

If we do not get the protection for which I and many others are looking—we shall not know until we are able to study the regulations—I hope that the professions that are involved in property transactions will take the initiative themselves. I trust that the professions will come forward with a self-denying ordinance whereby they will say to their members — I include the Law Society, the new Council for Licensed Conveyancers, which we are about to establish, the Royal Institution of Chartered Surveyors, the National Association of Estate Agents and all the other bodies involved—"None of you should be involved in conveyancing if you have any other fee or commission arising out of the property transaction." Perhaps we can persuade the professions to produce a self-denying ordinance, instead of pursuing their own self-enrichment, and to act in the public interest for the protection of the public.

Mr. Ken Weetch (Ipswich): The new clause should be opposed and defeated. The presence of a profusion of lawyers in the Chamber makes me certain that we are hearing the last gasp of the old restrictive practices system. The lawyers are making a last-ditch attempt on behalf of their entrenched professions to retain the old system by opposing radical and structural change.

Mr. Butterfill rose——

Mr. Weetch: No. I shall not give way at this stage.

Mr. Butterfill: I wish to intervene on the very point that the hon. Gentleman is making.

Mr. Weetch: I shall not give way at this stage.

The professions are attempting to oppose changes in conveyancing. They wish to keep conveyancing in the dark ages, where it has been for 150 years, to the disadvantage of the consumer.

When we talk about an issue in the House we are frequently, in reality, talking about something else. In this instance we are not really talking about conflicts of interest or anything similar. It is convenient for lawyers to advance the conflict of interest argument and to avoid other issues. It is a bogus argument and that can be said for much of the other stuff that we hear from the legal profession.

The reality is that we are discussing economic matters. Who is to gain the major slice of the lucrative conveyancing market that arises from a society that is becoming more than ever a property-owning democracy? The Building Societies Association calculates that by the end of the century over 70 per cent. of the population will be owner-occupiers. These people will be more mobile and, therefore, the conveyancing market will be worth thousands of millions of pounds. It is not surprising that the legal profession is defending restrictive practices to the last ditch. It clearly considers it crucial that it should have the largest slice of the action. The argument over the new clause sets the scene.

It is important to bear in mind the main objective of the conveyancing exercise. Our aim is to give the consumer as many options as possible. If someone wishes to buy a house, to buy and sell, to trade up or to buy for the first time, I want him to have the maximum number of options. If a firm of estate agents has an in-house department of licensed conveyancers, I do not see why the consumer should be prevented from using the agency. I should like him to have the option of a licensed conveyancer working for someone else or on his own account. The consumer should have access to a solicitor if that is what he wants. He should have access to the conveyancing department of a major bank if that is his wish. In other words, he should have all the options before him.

The choice should extend beyond outlet to structure. The consumer should have the choice of a small firm, a medium-sized firm with corporate status or a large-scale approach. He should be able to choose between a number of individual specialists working on their own and an in-house conveyancing service. The pattern of consumer demand to emerge will be for the market place to decide. Perhaps the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell) will take that comment in the spirit in which it was intended. The structure should emerge according to the shape of supply and demand in the market place. I hope that that point goes home to the right hon. Gentleman.

Although I initially had some reservations about conveyancing with respect to building societies—I have criticised the building societies in the House—I now believe, on balance, that the proposition should be supported. The Bill is a poor attempt to bring about more competition. In principle, it has widened the category of persons who can practise conveyancing but has loaded it down with such a lot of paraphernalia that the widening will not be great. In return, the monopoly has been tightened but extended to the contract for sale — previously untouched by the monopoly under section 22 of the Solicitors Act 1974. In a fundamental sense the "monopoly" is more vicious and tightly functional than it has been for 150 years. If this is an exercise in more competition, it is a straightforward confidence trick. If building societies and banks are allowed to carry out conveyancing which is regulated properly by appropriate codes of practice, the scope of consumer choice will be widened.

The burden of one argument is that there is a great potential for abuse if building societies and banks perform the conveyancing on a property. That possibility exists, but it does not logically follow that abuse is inevitable. It is possible to legislate against abuse. If it is argued that we cannot choose an option because of potential abuse, we shall never move forward. The right action is to take the advantages from a line of options, legislate against the abuses and ensure that they do not occur.

Mr. Butterfill: Would the hon. Gentleman care to comment on a recent case involving a Lincolnshire solicitor whose wife runs an estate agency from adjoining premises? The Law Society has ruled that there is no conflict because the two businesses are in no way related.

Mr. Weetch: I shall not comment on that case. An intervention in which an hon. Member puts a case to another hon. Member without giving supporting detail is not even a good beginning for consideration. If the hon. Member for Bournemouth, West (Mr. Butterfill) will send me all the supporting correspondence, I shall consider the matter. At this stage I cannot give a snap judgment on my feet about what is probably a complicated matter. I think that that is the consensus of the House. If that is the type of legal advice that comes forward in a snap judgment, I hope that it is the advice that would be used when I am being prosecuted and not when I am being defended.

Building societies can offer substantial structural advantages in conveyancing. As large organisations, they can offer certain industrial-type advantages. Make no mistake—conveyancing is organised in the same way as the putting-out system was organised in the 18th century, and it has not altered since. It is still a matter of small workshops, which the managerial and technical revolutions have passed by. Conveyancing has been impeded by the monopoly that has been enshrined in legislation.

[Mr. Weetch]

As large organisations, building societies can offer certain advantages. A large in-house department in, say, the Halifax building society can offer a large throughput of conveyancing transactions which can be backed by substantial financial resources and streamlined procedures. That is a natural extension of the building societies' activities, and they have a critical interest in the title. We are talking about a large throughput of work at low unit cost.

Mr. Carlile: Does the hon. Gentleman believe that, in his Shangri-la of building societies with large conveyancing departments, the scrutiny of a conveyancing transaction for a client living in Llanidloes by the Halifax building society some 200 miles away in Yorkshire would be as good as the scrutiny given by a Llanidloes solicitor who has no interest in the transaction other than the fee that he will obtain for the conveyancing?

Mr. Weetch: It may, or it may not be as good. These days when conveyancing transactions take place the last thing that a solicitor does is look at a property. I would go one stage further and say that I have seen bigger mistakes in my constituency by local solicitors than by solicitors who operate from London. Whether one lives in a particular locality or has a professional business in that locality frequently has nothing to do with it.

Mr. Frank Field (Birkenhead): One of my hon. Friend's assumptions concerns falling unit costs. Is it not true that building societies might push up unit costs? They might say, "The loan is here for you if you use our lawyer, although our lawyer happens to be more expensive than one outside the building society."

Mr. Weetch: I was going to bring up that point later in my speech when dealing with the shortcomings that we should guard against in allowing building societies to engage in conveyancing. I believe that the unit costs of the building societies will be lower because they will operate under economies of larger scale. If they do not, as long as the consumer has the option to go elsewhere for his conveyancing, he can decide what to accept and what to avoid. There should be a code of practice in which abuses and potential abuses are outlawed.

The real point is not about conflicts of interest. The Law Society has only relatively recently stipulated that a solicitor cannot act for the buyer and seller at the same time. Until a few years ago it was the usual practice for a solicitor to act for the buyer, the seller and the building society. There are a good many cases in which that still happens. I have a constituency case where the solicitor is acting for the seller, the buyer and the building society. I wrote to the Law Society asking this simple question: is this professionally right? Unfortunately, the answer went to my constituency office in Ipswich. I said to my secretary, "Read the letter for me and simply tell me 'yes' or 'no' whether it is right for a solicitor to act for the buyer and the seller." She said, "The answer appears to be a little evasive." I thought to myself, "I bet it is." This is not the first time I have come across this sort of thing. For all the arguments about conflicts of interest and who should do what in conveyancing, most solicitors do not care if Joe Soap does the conveyancing, provided they collect the profit from him.

We are not talking about ethics; we are talking about economics. Many people believe that large building societies will drive out small firms, that small solicitors' offices will be unable to compete with large building societies with in-house departments. They have genuine fears that some building societies might use conveyancing as a loss leader. Small firms would therefore tend to go out of business.

If we applied that principle elsewhere and prevented large firms emerging we should still be in the world of the small workshop and the small grocery shop. If the conveyancing market demands that large firms emerge, they will emerge. If that is the structure that the consumer and the market place want, that is what will happen. Passing this new clause will not stop it because it will be an organic function.

Over the years, building societies have indulged in a multiplicity of restrictive practices. They have restricted insurance cover opportunity and taken the commission. Until relatively recently, they never allowed the purchaser to have sight of the valuation survey. Building societies have been the centrepiece of the conveyancing monopoly. They have also organised a cartel on interest rates. No one was ever protected from those abuses by solicitors or any of the chartered surveyors because the major professions connived with the building societies in some of those abuses.

Solicitors have always been able to place money in building societies, sometimes with and sometimes without the consent of their clients, in return for mortgage queue jumping, and at times of scarcity of funds, in return for building societies underpinning their monopoly and for favourable conditions for doing the mortgage work. Solicitors have often connived with the building societies in providing life policies which did not suit the consumer.

If the legal profession criticises building societies for collecting commission, it is the pot calling the kettle black, because I know of no group of people which collects commission faster from a variety of directions than do practising solicitors. Much of that argument is therefore bogus.

We are approaching the problem in the wrong way. Building societies can do the job, provided the potential for abuse is eliminated. We should eliminate the abuse by statutory codes of practice, not eliminate the option.

A number of things must be done. The consumer must be given the freedom to go elsewhere. Any practice which involves pressure to take conveyancing services because a loan is being provided should be outlawed. Any contract which loads the conveyancing charge on to the mortgage, at many times the original price, should be forbidden. Loss leading should be outlawed when it is aimed at eliminating competitors.

The Office of Fair Trading supports the idea of building societies doing conveyancing. I am confident that it can protect the consumer in all these matters. With the proper safeguards, the consumer should be given the option of having his conveyancing done by a building society, and I believe that it is not for the House to stop him.

Mr. Alex Carlile: We have heard from the hon. Member for Ipswich (Mr. Weetch) a speech of almost religious fervour, in which he indulged in all the cheap rhetoric of lawyer bashing. I confess with some pride to being a lawyer, but I should tell the House, before the hon. Gentleman berates me for my self-interest, that I have rarely seen a conveyance, apart from those which from time to time I have signed to accommodate myself and my family, I have never passed an examination in conveyancing, or tried to, I have never read a book on conveyancing, and I have little interest in conveyancing as a legal subject.

I fear that one word used repeatedly by the hon. Gentleman has revealed the weakness of his argument—the word "consumer". The hon. Gentleman, and some of those who are of like mind on this issue, seem to envisage a world in which an attractive young couple will be out doing their shopping on a Saturday morning and will suddenly turn to each other and say, "Let's go and buy a house." They pop into the estate agent's and pick out a house. Then, rather as if buying a can of beans, they pop into the building society and everything is arranged for them by the smiling manager, and all goes through smoothly and without a hitch. That is seen as the world of the consumer.

Unfortunately, we do not consume our houses as we consume a can of beans. We must live in our houses. We must live, not just with their attractions, but with their imperfections. The greatest imperfection that there can ever be in a house is a defect in the owner's title. I speak in favour of the new clause because I believe that everything possible must be done to ensure that the householder's title is protected and assured to the greatest possible extent. There is no protection for purchasers of houses comparable to that provided under the Sale of Goods Act 1979. It is not possible for a householder, who has purchased his house in circumstances which go wrong, to go to the local trading standards department and have the building society — if it be a building society — prosecuted for defective conveyancing under the Trade Descriptions Acts.

The purchase of a house is usually the most serious, expensive, enduring and, in some cases, dramatic commitment that many people make, apart perhaps from the commitment to marriage. We should consider house purchase within that context of its importance in people's lives. It is expensive to buy a house, whether one buys it in the ritzy arbours of the south-east or on the pleasant mountains of Wales. A great deal of money must be found by the person who wishes to buy a house. It is a fact—it may be uncomfortable for those who oppose the new clause—that building society A may offer interest rates slightly lower than those offered by building society B, and the interest rates of building society C may be slightly higher than both. It is not simply a matter of a quarter or a half per cent., because it is likely that the person buying the house will be committing himself or herself for about 25 years, and a quarter per cent. means a great deal of money over those 25 years. The commitment may involve not just the mortgage repayments, but the payment of insurance premiums.

6.30 pm

The hon. Member for Ipswich suggested that, in his perfect world of fair and regulated building society conveyancing, there would be some kind of free choice as to which building society one would go to. More important, he said that there would be a free choice, if one went to a building society, of deciding not to use that society for one's conveyancing. He said that one could still go to the solicitor down the road for the conveyancing.

It is a custom of the hon. Member for Ipswich to listen to only one side of the argument on these issues, and he is not listening now. If he can bring himself to have the courtesy to listen, I say to him that we are in a mortgage glut at present, and it may be that people can walk out of a building society saying, "I am going to the solicitor down the road for my conveyancing," but if there were a mortgage famine, as there has often been in the past, is the hon. Gentleman really saying that one could enforce a provision whereby the building society would have to say to the prospective purchaser, "We are awfully sorry to lose your conveyancing, but of course we will give you the mortgage in any event."? One would have no such luck. A building society would not provide the mortgage for people who did not have the society doing the conveyancing.

If the hon. Member for Ipswich honestly thinks that building societies will not use conveyancers to ensure that they get the mortgage business on the terms that they want, it shows that he has not examined the issues properly and does not understand the meaning of the phrase "conflict of interest".

Mr. Favell: Is that not what happens now in many states of the United States of America? If one goes to a loan company and does not use its legal services, one simply does not get the loan. The use of the legal services of the loan company is very expensive, and people in many parts of America are trying to get out of the clutches of a loan company for that reason.

Mr. Carlile: I am grateful to the hon. Member for Stockport (Mr. Favell) for drawing attention to the American experience. His point reinforces my argument.

Mr. Butterfill: Does the hon. and learned Gentleman agree that his fears are reinforced by the behaviour of building societies with regard to insurance for the property?

Mr. Carlile: I entirely agree with the hon. Gentleman, who has referred to his own experience. I have had similar personal experience on two occasions. On one occasion I had to insist upon using the insurance company in which I had confidence and from which I expected to get satisfaction.

There are, of course, mutual life offices, which do not pay commission to anybody. Many of us have taken out our own insurance policies of all types with those mutual life offices. One can hardly imagine the building societies giving anything but discouragement to purchasers of homes who wish to go to those mutual life offices, which do such a good job—and have for hundreds of years—in the insurance market.

The hon. Member for Ipswich says—and I heard the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) muttering something to the same effect from a sedentary position—that solicitors are qualified to give financial advice. One of the basic qualifications which a solicitor must have is some financial understanding. I would be the first to question whether the present training of solicitors and barristers is either adequate or covers the fields that it should. Nevertheless, solicitors, in order to practise in conveyancing, are trained and must have a basic understanding of the transactions. In addition, they learn a great deal through their experience.

I am sure that the hon. Member for Ipswich will be aware that, under the solicitors accounts rules, a person cannot come straight out of law school and set up in practice as a solicitor. There has first to be supervision by a senior qualified solicitor for a period of years.

Mr. Greg Knight: Does the hon. and learned Gentleman agree that often the solicitor will get the client to question the transaction? The solicitor will say to the client, "Are you sure you want to go ahead with this? Are you sure you want to take out a loan of this size?"

Mr. Carlile: The hon. Gentleman is correct, and I shall be coming to that point, but before doing so may I postulate a rhetorical question? How often do we hear of building society managers saying, "Yes, Mr. and Mrs. Jones. Thank you for your interest, but the house is pre-1919, so you will be better off down the road at another building society which gives greater percentage loans or loans at a lower rate for such properties."? How many times can we expect to hear building society managers saying — [Interruption.] Does the hon. Member for Great Grimsby wish to intervene?

Mr. Austin Mitchell: I hope the hon. and learned member realises that, in regard to the duties of solicitors, Cordery's book, "The Law relating to Solicitors", specifies:

> "A solicitor is under no duty to advise his client whether a sale is a prudent one or whether an independent valuation is desirable".

In other words, the financial side of the transaction is not the solicitor's responsibility.

Mr. Carlile: The hon. Gentleman's corduroy is as threadbare as his argument. The fact is that a solicitor who does not give that kind of advice to his client has very little prospect of continuing in practice as a solicitor. If the hon. Gentleman will open his eyes and look at the advice given by solicitors, he will find that day by day they are saying to their clients, "The terms of building society A are better than those of building society B, so although you have been to building society B to make inquiries, I suggest that you take your mortgage from building society A. How many building societies will say to Mr. and Mrs. Jones, coming in off the street, "Our terms are worse than those available down the road."?

I received a letter yesterday from a solicitor in Hull —not a million miles from the seat of the hon. Member for Great Grimsby—making precisely the point that was made in an intervention. That solicitor told me of a specific recent case in which a client of his had come into the office, having made the decision to purchase a particular property, and given him instructions to deal with the conveyance. By the end of the week the client had decided not to buy that property because the solicitor had pointed out to him that, from the resale point of view, it was not in a particularly good area, that he probably could not afford it in any event, and that he would be just as well off in his existing house with an extension, which would cost him far less money, and for which finance by way of mortgage was available. That is the sort of service that is given every day by solicitors, whose only interest in the transaction is the fee that they will have, either for the conveyancing or for the advice they give not to go ahead with the transaction.

We heard from the hon. Member for Bournemouth, West (Mr. Butterfill) about the need for scrutiny of the mortgage deeds. I will not repeat it; I will simply say how right he was. The House is grateful to him for making that point so forcefully.

I have heard it suggested that the local solicitor would provide no better service than the solicitor in the great in-house office in Halifax. It was suggested by the hon. Member for Great Grimsby from a sedentary position that the country solicitor who does the conveyancing for the client never goes to look at the property. Perhaps I am lucky in the solicitors that I know. My own solicitor has never conveyed a house on my behalf, on the many occasions when we have moved, without walking round every inch of the boundaries of the property. At least the solicitor is there in the area, so the client can ask him to walk round and check the boundaries. In country areas the first thing that any solicitor looks at is the boundaries, either on a plan or by walking round them. If any difficulty arises as a result of the inquiries before contract, will the in-house conveyancer get into his company Rover and drive from Halifax to Llanidloes? If he does, who will pay the 30 or 40p a mile for him to do it? It will be the client. All this brings into question not just the arguments against our conflict of interest point as put forward by the building societies, but the cost-effectiveness argument that we have just heard.

I do not expect certain Labour Members behind me to agree, but the solicitor acting independently is not in anybody's pocket except the pocket of his client. If he renders an unsatisfactory service, his client has a number of forms of redress. He can go to the Law Society, though I would rather see him going to an independent complaints body. That is a matter which we may discuss later. He can also sue his solicitor. During the Committee stage of the Bill the hon. Member for Great Grimsby asked whether it was sensibly possible for a client to sue his solicitor.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: How common is it?

Mr. Carlile: The hon. Gentleman has just asked from a sedentary position: how common is it for a solicitor to accept instructions to sue another solicitor? There are hundreds, if not thousands, of cases every year in which solicitors are sued by their clients. I hear laughter on the Opposition Front Bench, but those of us who practise the law have acted on innumerable occasions in actions against solicitors for breach of contract and negligence. I ask the hon. Member for Great Grimsby to produce to the House a catalogue of cases in which the negligent actions of solicitors have not been taken up but should have succeeded. I should be surprised if he is able to do so.

Mr. Butterfill: I should like to reinforce the hon. and learned Gentleman's view on that point. I am a chartered surveyor, and my firm frequently acts for the insurers appointed by the Law Society on actions between solicitors, where one solicitor is suing another. It is a substantial proportion of the work of the firm in which I am a partner. It certainly happens very often.

Mr. Carlile: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his comments. If one sues a building society, as many people have had to do, one runs up against all the institutional stonewalling to which one is all too accustomed in litigation. The underwriters who deal with solicitors' negligence claims are frequently under pressure to settle, and they frequently do. Although some solicitors' negligence actions are unfortunately and needlessly protracted, a great number of the claims are settled. Actions for solicitors' negligence generally avoid the institutional harshness of a suit against a building society.

I turn now to the matter of solicitors'-property centres. I received a letter this morning from a senior and respected solicitor who practices in the Wrexham area. He is personally known to me and I have considerable regard for his ability and his objectivity. The solicitors' property centre in Wrexham has run into professional difficulties. As I mentioned in an intervention, there are instances where one firm which makes money from the centre is acting for the vendor, and another firm which also makes money from the centre is acting for the purchaser. That raises a clear conflict of interest. I am afraid the Law Society has taken a weak line on it and says that it does not know the answer. That does not help my correspondent very much. That conflict of interest ought to be instructive to those who wish to extend conveyancing to the institutions.

The county of Powys includes, I am delighted to say, the constituency of Brecon and Radnor. I wanted somehow to get that into the debate. In a rural area like Powys, which is but an example, there are many excellent and old-established firms of solicitors. Those firms provide an all-round service. They deal with many problems similar to those with which we deal at our constituency surgeries. They deal with matrimonial matters, crime, probate and conveyancing. Some of the things with which they deal are not within their immediate expertise, but they are able to obtain specialist advice elsewhere. To a great extent, their bread and butter is conveyancing. By and large, they are not expensive conveyancers, because they cannot be. The price of a freehold cottage in Powys may be between £15,000 and £20,000, and one cannot charge a lot of money for the conveyance of a £15,000 cottage. While conveyancing no longer subsidises other work, for litigation is nowadays apparently worth while for solicitors, without the conveyancing the prospects for many of those firms would be poor.

I hope that the hon. Members for Ipswich and for Great Grimsby, whose party last night, in the debates on the rate support grant, was espousing the need for local services, do not wish to nationalise the legal advice service. I hope they share my view that it is desirable for a reasonable standard of legal advice to be available in all areas, including the small market towns of Montgomeryshire. I hope the hon. Gentlemen will accept that there is a risk that firms of solicitors in areas like that will be forced either to amalgamate or to cut the range of services.

There is great competition, even hostile rivalry, between firms in small towns, which makes it as sure as anything that negligence by a firm of solicitors will be rooted out. I hope that the hon. Gentlemen agree that the level of competition and service should be maintained. I hope that they will take it from me that the profession knows best how much it depends upon conveyancing for its bread and butter.

Amalgamations may take place. Many of them would be against the public interest, but there is an even greater danger. It is that these highly respected, independent, and in many cases exceedingly skilful firms of country solicitors, may be forced into takeovers by slick city firms. It would not be in the interests of people in the shire counties and rural areas to have only the limited legal advice services provided by small branch offices of big city firms. Hon. Members who are tempted by institutional conveyancing should bear in mind the legal service needs of the community before they pitch in with the lobby we have heard ventilating its views this afternoon.

Mr. Knight: In view of the propensity of the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Austin Mitchell) to keep commenting on the number of lawyers who have taken part in this debate, perhaps I should start by saying I have no interest to declare. Although I am a qualified lawyer, I currently receive no fees or remuneration from that profession. However, I have a deep unease about the prospect of building societies being allowed to carry out domestic conveyancing.

I should draw the attention of the House to two articles that appeared in last Sunday's newspapers. The first article, from the Sunday Telegraph, was headed, "Conveyancing—the great debate." It stated something that we all accept and know:

"Building societies argue that they would — if legally permitted to employ their own solicitors — give customers a cheaper, quicker service . . . Some insurance brokers voice the suspicion that building societies are invading their patch a little too greedily and are becoming intensely preoccupied with earning commission on endowment mortgages, house insurance and house contents insurance."

Further down the same page, the paragraph headed, "The Savings Scene", referred to the proposal by the Leicester Building society to merge with the Alliance. It also stated:

"If the proposed merger of the Woolwich and Nationwide Building Societies goes ahead our three biggest societies—the Halifax, Abbey National and Woolwich-Nationwide — will outweigh all the others put together."

There is something sinister about that. The building societies are developing their muscle in the expectation that they will be allowed soon to carry out conveyancing.

The Sunday Times carried an article entitled, "Farewell 1874, roll on 1987: It's all go for new business." The article stated:

"While there is little contention over services such as money transmission and insurance sales . . . certain other proposals raise fundamental questions about conflict of interest and about the building societies' ability to move from doing a simple job, which they are generally considered to do well, to providing some more complex financial services. On the question of ability, the portents from across the Atlantic are not good. A few years ago, the American equivalent of building societies, the savings and loan associations, were given the freedom to broaden their services. In the best-run associations, big staff changes were needed to operate the broader range of services. And at the worst-run there have been multi-million dollar disasters as a result of irresponsible lending and over-ambitious investment. The building societies claim that it will not happen here."

They would, wouldn't they? The House should note that danger.

Mr. Butterfill: Does my hon. Friend agree that another danger is that building societies are not democratically accountable? In theory, their members—the depositors and borrowers—may attend their general meetings, but, in practice, hardly anyone turns up. Therefore, they are self-perpetuating oligarchies, effectively accountable to no one. In contrast, large institutional shareholders of public companies can attend their annual general meetings and influence board policies. No such thing happens with building societies.

Mr. Knight: My hon. Friend makes a valid and telling point, and the House will have noted his comments.

[Mr. Knight]

The hon. Member for Ipswich (Mr. Weetch) appeared to say that we are right to have fears, but that those fears can be regulated by legislation. He said that those who have spoken against allowing building societies to carry out conveyancing are overstating the case. However, building societies are already regulated, and I do not believe that they serve their customers as best they could. One need only walk down the high street of any town to see the offers that building societies can make, within the scope of the regulations to which they must adhere, to try to attract custom. I have noted a few of the inducements that are currently on offer. One building society offers money boxes to children who open accounts; another offers trips to a zoo; and another suggests an "adopt a duck" account, which allows its new customers to do that, and gives them free admission to a wildfowl trust centre. However, none of those accounts offers high rates of interest. In addition, the children who are induced to open such accounts cannot claim back the tax that they will pay through their savings. Under the present restrictions on building societies, the customer is not getting the best possible service. Therefore, one should be worried about what might happen if banks and building societies are allowed to carry out conveyancing.

No Conservative Member would disagree with increased competition in conveyancing. Indeed, that is what the Bill seeks to do in a modest way. But the House must ensure that it does not allow building societies so much power in the marketplace that anti-competitive practices result. We are on thin ice, and we must tread warily.

Mr. Austin Mitchell (Great Grimsby): It is fascinating to see so many professionals gathered here today to defend their vested interests and earnings from the consumer. It was especially interesting to hear the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile) appealing for the country solicitor vote in his constituency. I do not know whether he was unveiling Liberal party policy on competition, but, if he was, we welcome it. The real spectacle today has been Labour Members urging competition and Conservative Members, as usual, defending vested interests.

We must be clear about the effect of the new clause. It is designed to stop competition and the development of comprehensive services to the consumer. It does so on behalf of the vested interests—especially solicitors and some other professions — which have been doing too well for too long at the expense of the consumer. That is the essence of the argument.

There have been different approaches to the fear of competition. The Law Society, which failed to retain the conveyancing monopoly, has suddenly decided that it had better start to steal the building societies' clothes. Therefore, it has dressed itself up as the protector of the house buyer and started to attack the building societies as though they are ogres and have not been serving the house buyer for about 100 years by providing mortgages.

The Lord Chancellor, acting here as the political arm of the Law Society—[HON. MEMBERS: "Oh!"] In that case, the provisional wing of the Law Society — has produced a mythical conflict of interest which he says is sufficiently important to obviate the principle of more competition. He has not published details of the conflict of interest, or given us any idea about the nature of the replies that he has received to his inquiries. He has not told us the number of cases to which that conflict of interest applies. We have no published evidence to support the Lord Chancellor's assertion that the conflict of interest is so overwhelming as to prevent banks and building societies from carrying out conveyancing.

Mr. Butterfill: I should take up the hon. Gentleman's point about the new clause being a defence of vested interests. Of the hon. Members whose names are attached to the new clause, only two are solicitors. My profession is completely unregulated. Anyone—even the dustman —could set up tomorrow as an estate agent. Indeed, the dustman could set himself up tomorrow as a surveyor, which I would regret. Perhaps the House will discuss that matter later. I cannot understand what vested interest the hon. Gentleman believes I am protecting.

Mr. Mitchell: The effect is to defend the vested interest of solicitors in maintaining an effective conveyancing monopoly. That is how it works out. The way in which the hon. Member of Bournemouth, West (Mr. Butterfill) has approached it is to explode the doomsday weapon. His approach drives everything apart. We want services to come together to help the consumer. I want to pose a few questions about how this will work.

If a solicitor serves on the building societies panel and does the conveyancing for somebody, he gets a separate fee for acting on that panel. That would be stopped by the new clause. He would not be able to advise the building society on title, so that practice would go. If he has an agency for a building society, that also would be stopped. If solicitors combine, as they do in Scotland and in some parts of this country to run a property centre—it is an increasing practice which I commend and which we should encourage — that, too, would be stopped by the new clause. If a solicitor is taking a commission from a building society in respect of money invested in that building society, that would stop his advising people to take out a mortgage with that building society.

Mr. Butterfill: I am delighted that the hon. Gentleman confirms the effect which I envisage. The intention of the clause is to stop people having their snouts in the same trough more than once.

Mr. Mitchell: I agree that there is a noble spirit of self-sacrifice, but I think that the professions which are backing it do not realise exactly what is implied. They back it from a very different motive — to keep their snouts in a particularly rich trough.

Mr. Favell: I am a practising solicitor and an agent of the Halifax Building Society. The hon. Gentleman is absolutely right. Solicitors will suffer from the new clause if it is agreed to, and they should, because I have always believed that a dog cannot have two masters. That is why solicitors do not act for vendor and purchaser. I should like to ask one question of the hon. Gentleman. On this of all days. Would he be happy if Johnson Matthey acted for the customer and for itself in the matter of a loan, because it is a bank?

Mr. Mitchell: I should be happy if the Treasury and the Bank of England acted on Johnson Matthey in a sensible fashion. I shall ignore that question, because it is irrelevant.

There is a spirit of self-sacrifice if a solicitor is rushing forward to give up a privilege in this fashion—it is done to stop the banks and building societies acting in competition.

This forces us back into an old situation, but we are now discussing a new class of house buyer in today's society—people who have not bought houses in the past and who do not have the middle class skills and tradition of contact with a solicitor. The house buyer is forced to build up his own orchestra piece by piece instead of having a comprehensive service—one-stop shopping—whether it is provided by estate agents, banks, building societies or solicitors running property centres. All can compete to provide a comprehensive service. That is what we want for the house buyer, rather than the professional segregation which this measure would enforce.

What should we do about the new clause? My view is that we should leave the Bill as it is. I have therefore tabled no amendments of the kind that we dealt with at such length in Committee to allow banks and building societies to do conveyancing, whether through licensed conveyancers or solicitors. The amendments tabled in Committee were intended to air the principle. The principle is reasonably straightforward and secure. Therefore, it would be better to leave the Bill open rather than include this unnecessary restriction. In essence, we are committed to allowing banks and building societies to do conveyancing.

I and the sponsors of the Bill which I brought in in 1983 have firm promises from the Solicitor-General that the Government are committed to allowing banks and building societies to do conveyancing through employed solicitors. The building societies have firm promises from the Government that they will be able to provide an integrated service to the house buyer, part of which must be conveyancing.

The Chancellor is pirouetting and wriggling, trying to find ways to fulfil the principle without conceding the practice, and he has come up with two proposals. The first is that the building societies should be allowed to do conveyancing for other people's customers. In other words, people will get killed crossing the road from the Bradford to the Halifax. Perhaps we shall have a twinning arrangement or something similarly ludicrous.

Secondly, there is the letter of 8 July from the Lord Chancellor's Department, which states

"that lending institutions might offer the service through subsidiary companies in which they have only a minority shareholding."

It wants to know what conflict of interest is provoked by the size of the minority shareholding. It continues:

"In particular, how small should an institution's holding be before it need no longer constitute a bar to the company undertaking conveyancing for borrowers?"

There are ways to attempt to concede the principle which the Government have promised honourably to fulfil without making it so attractive that the building societies will do what is intended, but in fact they do not fulfil the promise. The promise was that banks and building societies would be allowed to do this for their customers. The alternatives are so silly that they will not work and they will be laughed out of court. Therefore, it is sensible to say what will happen.

The Bill will allow for the possibility of licensed conveyancers being employed by banks and building societies. It is for the council to decide at its own discretion in the interest of the profession. The building society legislation next year will allow building societies to do conveyancing, the details of which will be defined by regulations. The regulations will have to provide what we want — full freedom to do conveyancing, employing their own solicitors or conveyancers, under certain restrictions defined by the regulations. Those restrictions would be to ban loss leading, to require the supervision of the Office of Fair Trading, to ensure that there is no compulsion on the borrower to have the conveyancing done by the same building society, and to ensure that in that small minority of cases in which a conflict of interest arises—and who better than solicitors to recognise a conflict of interest when they see one?—the solicitor representing the building society shall be required to advise the customer to get his own independent advice.

Mr. Alex Carlile: The hon. Gentleman suggests the supervision of the Office of Fair Trading. How does he suggest that that supervision should be carried out when one is dealing with the local branch of a building society? If he is suggesting that it should be carried out by trading standards officers, does he realise that they already have insufficient money to carry out their statutory duty and that they have no training in this or any similar sphere?

Mr. Mitchell: If that is the extent of the petty debating points which can be raised against the proposal, the case is unanswerable. There will be supervision by the Office of Fair Trading, to which people will be able to make complaints.

Mr. Alex Carlile: How?

Mr. Mitchell: Experience shows that building societies are far more sensitive to their public image, to public pressure and to complaints, and they are far more vulnerable than solicitors. Indeed, solicitors have been able to maintain a monopoly of conveyancing for many years, despite the protests of the public. As soon as the pressure develops that building societies should offer a range of choice and insurance policies, they do so. As a result, we now have three insurance companies recommended by building societies. The details can be worked out later. [Interruption.] That is the way in which legislation is normally passed, is it not? We define the principle, and we set out the procedures in regulations.

To conjure up such hypothetical fears is the feeblest of possible defences against the proposal. Let us be clear about what the solicitors are pleading against banks and building societies. The solicitors say, "We have perfect practice. Everything we do is perfect and efficient. We always inspect the property and supervise the conveyancing"—when it is done mainly by secretaries and clerks —"and we always advise the customer." That, in the main, is rubbish. Some solicitors work in that fashion while others do not. Probably most do not.

Against what is proposed, they are conjuring up the spectre of hypothetical fears and extreme cases. For example, in all the cases produced today, even by the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery, the building society would not have given a mortgage in the first place. After all, it is in the interest of the building society to ensure that it has good title, that the person should be able to repay the mortgage, and that it has a good relationship with its customers. The building society is, therefore, as well qualified to deal with these matters as solicitors.

Mr. Alex Carlile: Will the hon. Gentleman accept from me that he is wrong in his assumption that the building society would not give a mortgage in the cases that I cited? In the Hull case, the building society was prepared to give a mortgage, but the solicitor advised the client not to proceed, and eventually the client accepted the solicitor's advice.

Mr. Mitchell: Will the hon. and learned Gentleman accept from me that the experience of the Halifax building society, with all its branches, is that it could find no cases in which solicitors had recommended against the mortgage offered by that society? That adequately covers the point that the hon. and learned Gentleman made about building societies being huge organisations thrusting piles of money at every borrower. That is a myth. Everybody knows how difficult it is to obtain a mortgage and how much scrutiny takes place by building societies into individual cases. As I say, it is in the interest of the society that the borrower is able to carry the mortgage and that the title is good.

Mr. Butterfill: My experience as a practising chartered surveyor is that most building societies—my firm acts for 32 banks and building societies—are interested only in the security of the loan. When banks and building societies lend small sums of money, secured against valuable property, they do not care whether there are serious defects in the property, which may be of great concern to the purchaser, so long as there is enough security in the property to guarantee the loan. Therefore, there is not always identity of interest between the purchaser and the building society.

Mr. Mitchell: Hon. Members are raising extreme cases. In every case that has been brought to my attention there have been strict inquiries. It must be agreed that, as a general proposition, the building society wants good title because it might need to realise the asset. Nor does it want the odium of turning people out of house and home if they cannot pay the premiums.

The hon. Member for Bournemouth, West posited an extreme and unlikely case, and that is true of all the arguments that have been adduced against this change. The conflict of interest argument is fallacious. People turn, in the first instance, to the building society. They go to a solicitor only after they have been to the building society. The two procedures — the conveyancing and the arranging of the mortgage—proceed concurrently but independently. That is what happens in the real world.

Nor are solicitors qualified to give the independent financial advice that is being raised now as a strong argument.

Mr. Weetch: I was told recently by the general manager—a highly qualified solicitor—of a major building society, one of the top six, that in 50 per cent. of cases the mortgage deed was prepared wrongly—it is a question only of filling in blanks—and that in many cases the wrong mortgage deed was returned. In other words, if the mortgage was being given by the Halifax, the deed sent back was, say, from the Alliance.

Mr. Mitchell: That corresponds with my experience in doing my own conveyancing in London. At one stage I received a communication from the solicitor representing the other side asking why the house was registered as two separate properties. I discovered that he had sent me details of somebody else's house. That is the efficient care that is taken in these cases. I accept the evidence of the building societies about the inadequacy of work done by the solicitors.

The need for independent advice has been raised as a kind of bogey man to frighten us away from giving conveyancing to banks and building societies. Plainly, solicitors are not qualified to give that independent advice. If they are now putting themselves forward as providing financial advice, I welcome that because it is another area in which they want to compete. Nevertheless, most solicitors do not know the range of mortgages and building societies, and, more important, most solicitors have a vested interest in channelling customers to the building society in which they invest their funds, from which they get commission and with which they have a close working relationship. How can that be described as independent advice?

For the benefit of, among others, the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery, with his legal expertise, I shall quote a case to show that the legal evidence goes against the idea of the provision of independent financial advice by solicitors. The most important case was in 1962. In Bowdage v. Harold Mitchelmore and Company, the plaintiff, a games mistress, wanted to sell a piece of land. I need not go into the details. Mr. Justice Melford Stevenson said that a solicitor who acted for a client in relation to the sale of land could not be said, in the absence of special instructions, to undertake the duty of advising the client whether the transaction was, from the client's point of view, prudent.

In other words, it is not part of a solicitor's duty to give the sort of advice that is now put forward as an argument for stopping solicitors employed by banks and building societies from doing conveyancing. One cannot argue in favour of a practice which does not exist on a legal basis which is fictitious.

Sir Gordon Borrie, the Director General of Fair Trading, himself a barrister, said that if building societies were allowed to develop conveyancing, it would provide for

"'one-stop shopping' for housing . . . and will lead to greater competition with others who provide such services, and this should benefit housebuyers whether they opt for 'one-stop shopping' or not because competition from building societies will keep everyone on their toes."

That is obviously true. The costs of conveyancing have come down by 20 to 30 per cent. We must keep up the pressure to keep those prices coming down. That means extending the competition to banks and building societies and not allowing solicitors to sit back, cosily saying, "There is no greater threat from licensing conveyancers. We can start upping the charges once again and milk the customer."

Sir Gordon Borrie added:

"Contrary to the views of the Law Society, I do not see any inherent or insurmountable conflict of interest if a building society were to provide conveyancing services to a purchaser who is also a borrower from that society. Both have a common interest in ensuring that good title passes from vendor to purchaser. The Law Society has stressed the value to the client of independent advice, for example, as to which building society to go to or as to whether a repayment mortgage or endowment mortgage would suit him best. Those matters seem to me more a 'selling point' for the independent solicitor's services than grounds for disallowing building society employed solicitors from providing basic conveyancing services."

What would be the position if banks and building societies were not allowed to carry out conveyancing, which would be the effect of the new clause? The proposal at present comes really only from the Lord Chancellor, who is effectively out on a limb on this matter. I receive plaintive letters from him—some of them increasingly abusive, but they are mainly plaintive—telling me that I must realise that he is the embodiment not only of the law, but of the Government.

That cannot be true. If it is, it means that the Government are not fulfilling the honourable promises that were made to me and to the other sponsors of my Bill. If it were true, the Government would not be following their policy on competition and dealing with professional as well as public and financial monopolies. If it were true, the Government would not be following the wishes of the Department of Trade and Industry in this matter. They would be putting themselves in the ludicrous position of bowing to the vested interest of the Law Society—the new Scargill—which brings the Government, or at least the Lord Chancellor, quaking to their knees. The Government are saying to the Law Society, "Yes, you are right, we must betray our policies and act against competition. You, the Law Society, are such a powerful vested interest that we shall give way to you." The Government cannot afford to be involved in such a spectacle.

We are seeing Rumpole's last stand—the last stages of an ongoing, long-running comedy programme—but Rumpole in this instance cannot stop the tide of progress. Of course banks and building societies should be allowed to do conveyancing, and it is an essential part of competition.

There is a rapidly expanding market with new generations of house-buyers. Some 70 per cent. of houses will be privately owned by the end of the century. People will sell and buy houses much more frequently. The turnover is growing all the time. This is a rich market in which there is room for everyone, but there must be competition to stop the vested interest developing. One does not create monopolies by widening competition. We must bring down prices and get people to compete to serve the customer.

We are seeing new methods and competition, prices falling, and new entrants to the market. All that is good for the public and for house buying because it makes house buying wider and more freely available. That is what we want to encourage and that is why the new clause is wrong. Neither the hon. Member for Bournemouth, West nor the Chancellor can stand in the way of this tidal wave of progress, which will engulf them both.

Mr. Roger Freeman (Kettering): I cannot agree with the analysis by the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell), because I do not believe that greater competition, which I agree is needed in this sector, is inconsistent with the importance of separating what may be in some cases a conflict of interest. He argued that the only way in which we can achieve greater competition in the legal profession's provision of conveyancing services is to ignore, or break down and throw away, the separation of interests that my hon. Friend the Member for Bournemouth, West (Mr. Butterfill) outlined. I apologise for the fact that I was not here when the new clause was moved, and therefore did not hear all of my hon. Friend's speech.

The hon. Member for Great Grimsby said that he thought that most Conservative Members had a vested interest in this matter. I have no vested interest in the conveyancing of houses. I am a chartered accountant, and therefore in an allied profession, but I am not involved in any way in the conveyance of property or the lending of money to those who purchase and sell property. Therefore, I do not fall into the category outlined by the hon. Member for Great Grimsby.

However, I have talked to the solicitors in my constituency. We have half a dozen firms in my provincial town, and I have discussed the Bill with them over the year and a half since the hon. Member for Great Grimsby first advanced his views. I have kept in touch with the local legal profession and sought its views and comments.

The solicitors in my constituency accept the principle of licensed conveyancing, if not with open arms. However, there are problems, on which I have some questions for my hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor-General. The problems arise out of one-stop shopping—permitting the bank to provide not only the money and the financial facility to exchange the property, but also a survey and the conveyancing. That concerns solicitors in my constituency and I shall advance some of their worries. I apologise to my hon. Friend the Member for Bournemouth, West if I repeat any of the points that he has made, but it is important that they are rehearsed clearly.

The new clause does not prohibit banks from offering conveyancing services to third parties. I do not agree with the hon. Member for Great Grimsby that banks and building societies that have licensed conveyancers on their staff would not be providing conveyancing services to others. It is obvious that they would provide those services to customers. Therefore, some of the economies of scale and of modern technology and greater competition would clearly apply in those cases. The new clause only stops banks from offering conveyancing services to customers with whom they are involved in providing finance.

It is important to emphasise that in my constituency the service of conveyancing is competitive. There is great competition between the firms of lawyers in the principal town. I know that, because I have checked it. I have looked at the way in which conveyancing fees have moved over the past five years and particularly in the past 12 months. There is no question but that that service is provided competitively.

I have another point to raise with my hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor-General. I am concerned that there are certain instances where the independent advice to the potential property owner is important. For example, in the two years in which I have represented my constituency I have come across many instances of the problem of rights of access. This has nothing to do with the value of the property; they are problems that the solicitor would point out to his clients. I wonder whether a licensed conveyancer working for a bank would not be tempted to cut corners by not exaggerating, or even not pointing out in clear language, the potential problems of rights of access.

Another example would be responsibility for upkeep on either a property shared in common or common party walls to property. Again, this does not necessarily affect the value of properties on which the loan transaction is based but it affects the rights of the property owner and his enjoyment of that property. There is also the problem of the rights of foreclosure on the mortgage loan, on which important and independent advice should be offered. A licensed conveyancer might be influenced by his employer, the bank, in not drawing the attention of the customer with great clarity to what some of those rights and commitments are.

Impartial advice is also needed on finance. I have come across several instances in which the solicitor has asked whether his client is aware that alternative finance might be available at a cheaper rate than the rate quoted by the building society or whatever, a rate that appears to be a little on the high side. He might tell the client that it might be beneficial to shop around. Such impartial advice would not be available at a one-stop shop.

These are all examples of issues on which the solicitor or the licensed conveyancer should be providing advice for his clients. If he is employed by a bank with one-stop shopping I wonder whether this advice will be brought out as clearly as it should be. I agree that new clause 2 prevents solicitors from enjoying the benefits of commissions when arranging finance. My hon. Friend the Member for Bournemouth, West is being consistent — he is saying that banks should not be involved in the conveyance and that the licensed conveyancer for a firm of solicitors should not receive any other financial reward from the transaction.

7.30 pm

What sanctions will be available in regard to a group or bank which does not conform to the high standards adopted by most firms of solicitors? There are sanctions for solicitors and there will be sanctions for licensed conveyancers, but whence will the pressure come to ensure that high standards in banks are preserved?

The hon. Member for Great Grimsby said that some solicitors are inefficient, that some members of the great British public want one-stop shopping and that, because we want greater competition, we should permit banks to convey property through licensed conveyancers. He cares little for the so-called conflict of interest argument. I pay tribute to the hon. Gentleman's initiative during the past two years, but he will get competitive pressures in the profession through the introduction of licensed conveyancers offering a conveyancing service to customers with whom they are not involved financially.

Such competitive pressures will arise naturally. The benefits of those pressures are already obvious in my constituency. The customer is getting a good deal. We should consider whether it is wise to throw out, as the hon. Member for Great Grimsby has in a cavalier fashion, the benefits that must be worth serious consideration. Insufficient consideration has been given to the importance of independent advice. A solicitor or licensed conveyancer with no financial interest has a responsibility to ensure that the client is properly advised. I look forward to my hon. and learned Friend's comments. I have raised these issues because they have been raised with me.

Mr. Frank Field: I am not a lawyer, so, as I am not accustomed to being paid by the length of time that I am on my feet, I can be mercifully brief.

My hon. Friends have advanced two reasons why we should oppose new clause 2. The first is that we should oppose restrictive practices. I must declare a vested interest as a member of a political party that was brought into existence by the trade union movement and which understands the value of restrictive practices or, as we like to call them when talking about our own territory, checks and balances. Before I am enticed into attacking restrictive practices, I should like to spend a little more time establishing where such an argument might lead me.

The second reason that has been adduced for opposing the new clause is that the market should decide the shape and size of firms servicing customers. My hon. Friend the Member for Ipswich (Mr. Weetch) said that those comments would thrill the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell). That might be the case, but they do not thrill me.

Mr. J. Enoch Powell (South Down): I have my name on the new clause anyway.

Mr. Field: That is indeed true. The market might well decide the shape of firms, or so the theory tells us, but the fact remains that we all favour competition if we are doing the competing but we never favour it if it operates against us. One of the natural laws of the market, therefore, is that people try to do deals to limit competition. I therefore do not find the two reasons for opposing the new clause persuasive.

The hon. Member for Bournemouth, West (Mr. Butterfill) painted a large canvas with a broad brush. Mine will be small. I should like to consider building societies and what I consider to be the growth of the new Leviathan. Building societies have recently taken over some of the functions of banks. People have asked what harm that has done. We are beginning to hear that the building societies believe that they should take over some of the functions of post offices and sub-post offices, such as the payment of pensions. If they get that deal, there will be wholesale closures of post offices, although building societies will not take on the full range of functions offered by post offices.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: It is no use conjuring up bogey men. My hon. Friend asked what harm it had done for building societies to go into competition with banks. What harm has it done?

Mr. Field: That development did no harm, but it does not follow logically that, because that did no harm, all following changes will do no harm. My hon. Friend and I will, as always, oppose the closure of sub-post offices if building societies get the job of paying pensions.

We have been asked to whom building societies are responsible. The answer is, very few except those who run them. Building societies already provide loans, are in league with house agents, undertake surveys, arrange insurance deals for property and try to persuade customers to take out indemnity policies for mortgages. The House has a right to draw a line and say that building societies already have enough power and influence without our adding yet another and important twist.

My hon. Friend the Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) has argued powerfully several times that Labour should use every opportunity to attack the extraordinary fees that some lawyers earn. I am in sympathy with that argument, but my hon. Friend's proposed solution is worse than the evil. If we want to limit the amount of money that lawyers can earn from conveyancing, there is a simple method—lay down a scale of fees for conveyancing. It would be more effective for the House to debate that proposal than to give building societies even more power as an indirect means of limiting the power of lawyers.

The two main arguments against the new clause do not persuade me. We have allowed building societies to assume an extraordinary range of powers. So far, those powers have usually been exercised with considerable responsibility, but that does not necessarily mean that this will continue, and at this stage we say that building societies are big enough.

Mr. Nicholas Brown (Newcastle upon Tyne, East): I shall also try to be brief, and not just because I, too, am not a lawyer.

New clause 2, which the hon. Member for Bournemouth, West (Mr. Butterfill) and other hon. Members seek to add to the Bill, is designed to deal with conflicts of interest over conveyancing. The hon. Member for Bournemouth, West properly identified three separate areas of professional concern where the debate about conflict of interest is important. He made a strong point about solicitors acting as estate agents, particularly when a chain of sales is being handled by one firm. His point about insurance brokers also had merit. I shall deal later with whether or not it can be covered by regulation.

His third category occupied more time in Committee than any other item. New Clause 2 overstates its case in relation to this third category. All hon. Members agree that unfair practices should be prevented. The division between us relates to how it should be prevented and what constitutes a conflict of interest. Hon. Members also agree that we are living through a period of change. For that reason, if for no other, we should approach the problem in a measured way.

The view of the Opposition is that it would be possible, by regulation, for banks and building societies to provide an in-house conveyancing service. We object to new clause 2 because, whether intentionally or not, it completely closes the door to that possibility. The Opposition's view is that the interests of the consumer are best protected by a plurality of provision. We do not want building societies to establish, because of their power to make loans, a monopoly over conveyancing services. One of the tests of the regulations should be the maintenance of a plurality of provision, thus preventing unfair practices by building societies because of their control over the provision of finance.

There is a range of objections to banks and building societies providing an in-house service. The first objection falls into the category of special pleading. The case for rural solicitors was put very persuasively in Committee by the hon. Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Ottoway) but his case did not persuade me. It was that the funding of rural solicitors was to be underpinned by those who seek to transfer their houses in rural areas. I am not sure that that is fair. People who live in rural areas should have the choice of a cheaper conveyancing service, if it is available.

Mr. Alex Carlile: What steps would a Labour Government take, bearing in mind what the hon. Gentleman has just said, to ensure that legal services continued to be made available on a broad front in rural areas?

7.45 pm

Mr. Brown: Had the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile) diligently attended the Committee proceedings, as did Conservative Members and my colleagues, he would have known that that matter was dealt with during our discussions on legal aid and law centres. But of course he did not diligently attend the Committee proceedings. I do not intend to travel again over that ground, because that is not the issue with which we are dealing.

Mr. Carlile: Answer the question.

Mr. Brown: I shall deal next with my second point, on conflicts of interest. Genuine and perfectly proper objections can be made to building societies providing an in-house conveyancing service, but my view is that those objections can be met. There is no conflict of interest between the organisation providing the finance and the individual who, according to the title deeds, will eventually be the owner of the property. Both the individual and the organisation providing the money have a clear interest in achieving a secure title. However, a conflict of interest arises on financial advice.

It is wrong to expect an in-house conveyancer who is employed by a building society impartially to advise the purchaser of the property. The point was well made in Committee by the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) that many solicitors do not provide advice on these matters. House purchasers have already secured their mortgages before they ask somebody to handle the conveyancing side of the transaction, so it ought to be possible to make regulations to deal with this point. I understand that the Lord Chancellor does not intend to do this, but on this point the Bill is permissive and it would be possible for a future Government to make regulations to meet it. If the new clause is successful, that will not be possible.

At this stage, therefore, the Bill ought to be permissive so that we can return later to this matter. We should explore further the possibility of making regulations and be able to discuss this matter again. I have no doubt that we shall discuss it again, together with many other points that are contained in the Bill.

The Solicitor-General (Sir Patrick Mayhew): I, too, shall be brief — but because I am a lawyer! I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Bournemouth, West (Mr. Butterfill) on moving this new clause, thereby giving an opportunity to the House to discuss further the vexed question of how best to protect the public from advice tainted by interest while at the same time protecting the public from unnecessary restraints on competition. Although it has been a longer debate than many hon. Members expected, it has been of a very high quality.

The balance of the argument has been against the proposition of the hon. Member for Ipswich (Mr. Weetch) that the concern expressed by Conservative Members about conflict of interest is bogus. Many impressive speeches pointed to the real danger that a conflict of interest can arise.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: Mainly by lawyers.

The Solicitor-General: No, that is not right. My hon. Friend the Member for Kettering (Mr. Freeman) asked whether or not it was important that there should be independent advice on a number of matters — for example, about alternative means of financing loans and the responsibility for the upkeep of party walls. The question at issue is whether one should legislate to protect the public in all circumstances against such a risk or whether one should legislate on a less extensive scale and rely, as my hon. Friend the Member for Ipswich said, on the ability of the public to choose advice elsewhere. It is far from easy to solve that problem.

As my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney-General mentioned on Second Reading, the Farrand committee said:

"The risks to the consumer are too great to permit market forces alone to control entrance to. . . the conveyancing market. Our approach in considering the safeguards needed for non-solicitors to undertake conveyancing has thus been to propose certain essential restrictions on competition, although these are intended to go no wider than is necessary to ensure adequate consumer protection."

That approach can be validly applied to the wider subject with which the new clause is concerned.

I wish to make clear the Government's position on conveyancing by employees of building societies and other financial institutions. We are committed to introducing legislation to permit banks and building societies to offer financial services and we are committed to doing so in a way that does not prejudice the consumer through conflicts of interest or anti-competitive practices. Both limbs of that commitment are important and both will be honoured.

The problem is that arrangements for a loan are an integral part of most conveyancing transactions and the lender's employee is inhibited in advising the borrower about the loan, because he owes his primary duty and his livelihood to his employer. That has meant that the difficulties in the way of lending institutions providing conveyancing services have proved more intractable than had been expected.

Since the consultation exercise on which we embarked, we have been examining ways of carrying forward our commitments. We have decided to amend the legislation that prevents all corporate bodies, including building societies, from offering conveyancing services. The Lord Chancellor will be empowered to exempt individual corporate bodies from the restrictions and to impose general conditions on the way in which the services are provided, to ensure that the consumers' interests are not prejudiced. The legislative mechanism will have to be flexible enough to enable new ideas to be implemented quickly and without the need for further primary legislation. We intend to take those powers in the next Session.

The new clause would prohibit any persons or bodies from providing conveyancing services if they also provided a loan, estate agency or brokerage services in the same or a related transaction. I hope that I have demonstrated that we share the anxieties behind the new clause. There would be a clear danger of conflicts of interest if mortgage brokers or insurance brokers formed partnerships or corporate bodies with licensed conveyancers. My hon. Friend the Member for Bournemouth, West drew attention to the significant sums that can be earned in commission. They are a plain source of temptation to temper the advice that might otherwise be given.

I do not need to take time over matters that have been extensively explored in the debate. However, we believe that the new clause is too sweeping in its exclusions. For example, it would rule out the present practice of the purchaser's solicitor drawing up the mortgage deed on behalf of the building society after the contract has been agreed and he has advised his client. That is a harmless, indeed beneficial, practice.

The Government's aim is to increase competition in conveyancing as much as possible, provided that proper consumer protection is maintained. We welcome measures to reduce the number of agencies that a purchaser has to deal with when moving house, subject to the overriding need adequately to protect the public from conflicts of interest. We see no difficulties arising if lending institutions offer services in transactions where they are not also providing a loan—my hon. Friend the Member for Kettering rightly pointed out that the new clause would not prevent that—but we have not yet found a way in which those institutions could provide a combined package of loans and conveyancing without risking unacceptable conflicts of interest. Lending institutions are commercial organisations and their interest is in the arrangements for the loan, as distinct from ensuring good title, and is not the same as that of the borrower.

Although we have not overcome the problem, we are continuing to work on it and one possibility under examination is that lending institutions might provide the services through subsidiary companies in which they hold only a minority stake. The Lord Chancellor recently met the chairman of the Building Societies Association and made it clear that the Government would welcome a solution that dealt with the problem of conflicts of interest. There is a genuine welcome for all constructive suggestions, but it would be irresponsible for us to pretend that problems do not exist.

We remain committed to increasing competition, we are determined to ensure that the interests of the consumer will be adequately protected when we introduce reforms, and we shall continue to build on the progress already made. Increased competition means that conveyancing services can readily be obtained at prices that are about one third lower than those prevailing a year or two ago, as was confirmed by my hon. Friend the Member for Bournemouth, West.

Licensed conveyancers will inject a further element of competition and such developments are enormously in the interests of all our constituents. Therefore, after what I have said about the Government's approach to this important matter, I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Bournemouth, West will agree that, on balance, it would be better for him not to press his new clause, but rather to allow the Government to bring forward their proposals in due course.

Mr. Butterfill: Perhaps inadvertently, my hon. and learned Friend did not refer to my reservations about estate agents being involved in conveyancing and solicitors being involved in estate agency work. Will he comment on that matter and on whether it would be possible for the regulations that are to be drafted by the Lord Chancellor to be subject to the affirmative resolution procedure?

The Solicitor-General: I carried my enthusiasm for brevity too far. I shall deal with both those points. I shall report to the Lord Chancellor that my hon. Friend wishes the regulations to be subject to the affirmative resolution procedure. My noble Friend will consider that request, but I cannot give my hon. Friend any assurances.

We have to face the fact that solicitors at present provide a combined estate agency and conveyancing package. I know that some hon. Members have reservations about that, and we understand the strength of those reservations. Nevertheless, that is the position. We did not feel that the provision of a combined package of sale and conveyancing to vendors raised such overwhelming difficulties that we needed to urge the Law Society to prohibit it. At present, estate agents cannot provide conveyancing services. Obviously, a solicitor could not provide conveyancing services to a purchaser if that solicitor was acting for the vendor. That is not permitted.

On the face of it, the present position puts estate agents at an unfair competitive disadvantage compared with solicitors, and therefore we are considering whether estate agents should be free to provide similar packages to vendors. Certain requirements would need to be met before those packages could be permitted, if they were to be permitted. We would need to ensure that the conveyancing work was properly supervised by a qualified person. Similar rules governing conflicts of interest would have to apply to estate agents offering conveyancing, as they do to solicitors in private practice. We shall need to consider whether special arrangements should be made to protect against conflicts of interest where an estate agent is selling more than one house in a chain. Comprehensive financial arrangements would have to be made to secure adequate consumer protection.

Subject to those essential requirements, we are considering whether estate agents should be permitted to provide the service so that they can compete on equal terms.

Mr. William Cash (Stafford): My right hon. and learned Friend mentioned consumer protection, but he did not mention competence. In the context of estate agents providing conveyancing services at present practised by solicitors, does he agree that competence is extremely important, and that it is difficult to ensure that an estate agent will be competent to provide such legal services?

The Solicitor-General: That is right, but we are talking about employed solicitors or employed licensed conveyancers.

Incidentally, in a debate which has given rise to the figure of Lord Chancellor Rumpole, I agree that competence is of great importance in all these matters.

Mr. Butterfill: I am grateful to my right hon. and learned Friend for his many assurances. I must confess that I am a little disappointed with what he said about estate agents because I had hoped that the Government could find it preferable if neither lawyers nor estate agents were involved in a position where there could be a conflict. Nevertheless, I accept my right hon. and learned Friend's point that I may have gone further than advisable, and under the circumstances, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

New Clause 3

PREVENTION OF ANTI-COMPETITIVE PRACTICES AND MONOPOLY SITUATIONS.

'For the purpose of preventing anti-competitive practices and monopoly situations or their development in the field of conveyancing services and services connected with such services by persons or bodies corporate involved in or directing or controlling such services, whether directly or indirectly, the Director-General of Fair Trading and the Secretary of State shall, from the date of the commencement of any of the provisions of Part II of this Act, keep the provision of those services under constant review in pursuance of their functions respectively under the Fair Trading Act 1973 and the Competition Act 1980.' —[Mr. Cash.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Cash: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

I am deeply worried that we may be moving towards concentrating economic power in the hands of lending institutions. The new clause relates to part II of the Bill, which to a certain extent anticipates the building societies legislation that we expect next year. To prevent anti-competitive practices and monopolies or their development in conveyancing services and services connected with such services by persons who would be involved in directing or controlling those services, the new clause provides that the Director General of Fair Trading and the Secretary of State shall be obliged from the date of the commencement of part II of the Act to keep the provision of those services under constant review in pursuance of their powers and duties under the Fair Trading Act 1973 and the Competition Act 1980.

I received a letter from my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney-General, in which he states:

"We will have the opportunity to debate the economic power of the lending institutions, and its relevance to the question of whether they should be permitted to offer conveyancing services, when the provision enabling the Lord Chancellor to exempt 'recognised' bodies corporate"—— that is, bodies recognised in clause 31——

"from the restrictions on conveyancing for reward is brought forward next Session. I dare say the matter will also be touched upon on Wednesday."

He continues:

"As I said in Committee, we do not consider that any special provision is needed to protect against anti-competitive practices and monopoly situations in conveyancing when Part II of the Bill comes into force. We believe the existing legislation is sufficient."

I am deeply worried that the provision of conveyancing services under part II of the Bill will be part of a new monopoly by lending institutions regarding land tenure. In future, on an inevitably progressive basis, building societies and banks will provide estate agency, insurance brokerage, jobbing, stockbrokerage and conveyancing services.

There are strong arguments for effective international competition for economic institutions so that they can compete effectively abroad. However, there are significant dangers in the path that we choose to tread, because its consequence is to concentrate a vast amount of economic power in the hands of relatively few lending institutions. As a consequence, we may regret having followed that path, unless—I believe that this is both a classically Liberal and a classically Tory position—we are sure that anti-competitive practices and monopolies will not develop.

My right hon. and learned Friend said that he did not think that it was necessary to have any special provision to deal with the problem because the powers under the Fair Trading Act 1973 and the Competition Act 1980 are sufficient. My point is that we must deal with the problem of anti-competitive practices and monopolies before, not when, they have accumulated. That is what my new clause provides.

When I looked over my notes on the subject I was particularly interested to see a quotation from the Nationwide building society's general manager on 2 April 1984. He said:

[Mr. Cash]

"Within ten years, the number of building societies in Britain is likely to have shrunk from 200 to no more than 10, and these 10 will be almost indistinguishable from retail banks in the range of services they offer to personal customers."

Only four days ago, on Saturday 13 July, The Times announced that the Nationwide and Woolwich building societies were to merge, with £15 billion-worth of assets. Therefore, the trend is already being well established. Mr. Tim Melville-Ross, chief general manager of the Nationwide building society, is quoted in the The Times as having said:

"the main reason for the merger was to create a society better able to take advantage of the new powers coming to building societies under legislation to be passed in 1987.

As we move into new areas of business it will be important for societies to have sheer size and financial strength . . . We will look to take advantage of most of the new powers under the coming legislation."

He seems to have made my point quite well. I believe that the trend will be followed by other building societies.

I have argued consistently and vigorously for the position adopted by the Conservative party — it is a conviction which I hold strongly—in favour of fair and free competition. The aggregation and accumulation of power by the lending institutions will seriously divert us from a principle which otherwise I would thoroughly applaud, unless it is monitored carefully from the beginning of the acquisition of the powers.

I support the principle behind the Bill and the extension to licensed conveyancers, provided that they are fully competent to do the sort of work which hitherto has been done exclusively by solicitors. It is impossible to argue that there is no connection between the Bill and the proposed building societies Bill or the provision of conveyancing services by banks. I have already made clear my objection to the provision of these services. That is borne out in principle by the White Paper "Financial Services in the United Kingdom." The provision of conveyancing services under these new arrangements is likely to become yet another of the financial services provided by the lending institutions.

In Committee I quoted a statement made by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry. Referring to the financial services, he said:

"The Secretary of State will have the power, to be exercised on the advice of the Director General of Fair Trading, to revoke or amend rules which have anti-competitive effects."

The same point is made in chapter 8 of "Financial Service in the United Kingdom," which states:

"(i) to apply a consistent framework of competition law throughout the financial services sector; and

(ii) enable the Secretary of State to require the Boards to amend or withdraw either of their own rules of those of organisations recognised by them if he is persuaded that such rules are detrimental to competition and not justified in the interests of investor protection."

A similar point is made on page 42 of the White Paper, which refers to the desirability of obtaining the advice of the Director General of Fair Trading. If what is good enough for the White Paper on financial services is to be applied to competition, the same provisions should be applied to conveyancing services.

Professor Payne of Alabama, a Warner professor of law emeritus, has made his position clear on the experience that the United States has gained from seeing conveyancing services fall into the hands of the lending institutions. I am not advancing an argument to support the solicitors. My concern is to protect the consumer, not solicitors. We must ensure at the same time that we honour our commitment to competition. Professor Payne said:

"In most parts of the United States conveyancing costs are higher than in England. In recent years they have become so outrageous as to incite prolonged hearings in the Congress and an investigation by the Department of Housing and Urban Development. For the high price the buyer pays he receives only a fraction of the services and protection taken as a matter of course on the other side of the Atlantic . . . Every unbiased observer admits that the American system works badly for everyone except the mortgagee. Chronic criticism of the system is voiced but gets nowhere because the lending institutions do not want change."

8.15 pm

Sir Gordon Borrie has suggested that there should be a number of caveats on the provision of conveyancing by the lending institutions. He has said that these will be needed if the public are to benefit and continue to benefit from the new competition. He contends that competition will operate effectively only so long as the customer knows precisely what services are available to him. He believes that where the building societies provide a range of services to a single client, the services should be priced transparently. He considers it essential that there should be a "dose of official weed killer" to ensure proper and full competition in the provision of these services.

The new clause would effectively provide the sort of weed killer which the Director General of Fair Trading is proposing should be applied. It would ensure that we live up to the principles of competition to which we adhere. I hope that my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney-General will be able to give me some specific assurances that we shall not engage in anti-competitive practices and monopolies when part II comes into force.

The Attorney-General: I well understand the anxieties of my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Cash), but I must limit my reply to the purpose of this part of the Bill, which deals with licensed conveyancers. Many of my hon. Friend's anxieties will be more appropriately expressed when we come to consider the building societies Bill next year.

I explained in Committee that the provision of conveyancing services is already within the scope of the Competition Act 1980. Investigations through the normal machinery — a reference from the Director General of Fair Trading to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission, which in turn reports to the Secretary of State — are available. The new clause is really not necessary to enable us to deal with anti-competitive or monopolistic practices when part II comes into force.

It has been suggested that it would be preferable to prevent such practices arising in the first place by requiring the Director General of Fair Trading and the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry to vet rules drawn up by the bodies connected with conveyancing. Let us consider what is proposed in the Bill. The Lord Chancellor will not approve rules that allow anti-competitive practics to operate. He will, of course, consult the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, who will no doubt take advice from the Director General of Fair Trading, before concurring with rules drawn up by the council to ensure that the sort of situation of which my hon. Friend is fearful does not arise. Thereafter, the Director General will keep under review the operation of licensed conveyancers as part of his general statutory duties to ensure that no undesirable practices subsequently develop. In our view, that is entirely adequate, and there is no need for the special provision which the new clause promotes.

Mr. Cash: I am grateful to my right hon. and learned Friend for the clarity of his reply. I am glad to note the assurance that he has given. Therefore, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

New Clause 4

SOLICITORS COMPLAINTS BOARD

'1.—(1) There shall be a body to be known as the Solicitors Complaints Board.

(2) It shall be the general duty of the Board to promote high standards of competence and professional conduct among solicitors and to ensure that those standards are sufficient to secure adequate protection for members of the public.

(3) Schedule [The Solicitors Complaints Board] to this Act shall have effect with regard to the Board.

2.—(1) The Board may, in pursuance of its general duty referred to in paragraph (2) of subsection 1, make rules, with the concurrence of the Master of the Rolls and after consultation with the Council of the Law Society, for regulating in relation to any matter the professional practice, conduct and discipline of solicitors, including rules for regulating the association of solicitors with other persons in connection with the provision of legal services to members of the public.

(2) If any solicitor fails to comply with rules made under this section any person may make a complaint in respect of that failure to the Board.

3.—(1) There shall be established two committees of the Board to be known as the Investigation Panel and the Adjudication Panel, constituted as provided by the Board by rules under this section and having, as from the appointed day, the functions conferred or imposed on them by or under subsections 4, 5 and 6 of this section.

(2) Rules under paragraph (1) above—

(a) shall secure that a person who sits as a member of the investigation panel in the preliminary proceedings on any case shall not sit as a member of the Adjudication Panel in any subsequent proceedings on that case; and

(b) shall not come into force until approved by order of the Lord Chancellor.

(3) The power to make orders under paragraph (2) above shall be exercisable by Statutory Instrument subject to annulment in pursuance of a resolution of either House of Parliament and includes power to vary of revoke such an order by subsequent order.

4.—(1) The Investigation Panel shall have the functions conferred or imposed on them by this section.

(2) It shall be the duty of the panel to investigate any case in which—

(a) a complaint is made to the Board by or on behalf of a member of the public against a solicitor, in respect of the professional conduct of, or the services provided by that solicitor; or

(b) it is alleged that a solicitor—

(i) has (whether while a solicitor or otherwise) been convicted by any court in the United Kingdom of a criminal offence which renders him unfit to practice as a solicitor; or

(ii) has, while holding a practising certificate in force under the Solicitors Act 1974, failed to comply with any condition to which that practising certificate was subject; or

(iii) has failed to comply with any rules made by the Board under this Act; with a view to presenting the findings of such investigation to a Tribunal of the Adjudicating Panel for determination under subsection 6 of this section.

(3) For the purposes of paragraph 2*(a)* a complaint against a person who, at the time of the matters complained of, was an employee or associate of a solicitor shall be treated as a complaint against that solicitor.

(4) Any reference in paragraphs (2) and (3) to a solicitor includes reference to a person who was a solicitor at the time of the matters in question.

5.—(1) Where the Investigation Panel are satisfied that it is necessary to do so for the purposes of investigating any complaint made to the Board—

(a) alleging professional misconduct by a solicitor; or

(b) relating to the quality of any professional services provided by a solicitor,

the Board may give notice to the solicitor or his firm requiring the production or delivery to any person appointed by the Board, at a time and place to be fixed by the Board, of all documents in the possession of the solicitor or his firm in connection with the matters to which the complaint relates (whether or not they relate also to other matters)

(2) Sub-paragraphs (2) to (12) of paragraph 9 of schedule 1 to the Solicitors Act 1974, together with paragraphs 12 to 16 of that Schedule, shall apply in relation to the powers conferred by paragraph (1) as they apply in relation to the powers conferred by sub-paragraph (1) of paragraph 9 of that Schedule and accordingly in those provisions—

(a) any reference to the Society shall be construed as including a reference to the Board; and

(b) any reference to a person appointed, or to a requirement, under sub-paragraph (1) aforesaid shall be construed as including a reference to a person appointed, or to a requirement, under paragraph (1); and

(c) any reference to any such documents as are mentioned in sub-paragraph (1) aforesaid shall be construed as including a reference to any such documents as are mentioned in paragraph (1).

(6)—(1) The Adjudication Panel shall have the functions conferred or imposed on them by this subsection.

(2) It shall be the duty of the Panel to consider the findings of any investigation presented to them by the Investigation Panel with a view to taking one or more of the following courses of action:—

The panel may, in an appropriate case—

(a) dismiss the complaint or allegation; or

(b) administer a reprimand to the solicitor; or

(c) refer the case to the Solicitors Disciplinary Tribunal for hearing and determination; or

(d) refer the case to the Arbitration Service for hearing and determination under subsection 9 of this section;

(e) where the professional services provided by a solicitor in connection with any matter were in any respect not of the quality that could reasonably be expected of him as a solicitor,

(i) determine that the costs to which the solicitor shall be entitled in respect of those services shall be limited to such amount as may be specified in their determination and direct the solicitor to comply, or to secure compliance, with such one or more requirements falling within paragraph (2) as appear to them to be necessary in order to give effect to their determination;

(ii) direct the solicitor to secure the rectification, at the expense of the solicitor or his firm, of any such error, omission or other deficiency arising in connection with the said matter as they may specify;

(iii) direct the solicitor to take, at the expense of the solicitor or his firm, such other action in the interests of the client as they may specify.

(f) The requirements referred to in subsection (e)(i) are—

(i) a requirement to refund the whole or part or any amount already paid by or on behalf of the client in respect of the solicitor's cost in respect of the services referred to in that provision;

(ii) a requirement to remit the whole or part of those costs;

(iii) a requirement to waive, whether wholly or to any special extent, the right to recover those costs.

(3) The Panel shall give notice of any action which it takes under paragraph (2), and of the grounds for any such action, to the complainant and to the Law Society.

(4) Where it appears to the Panel—

[Mr. Cash]

(a) that any such allegation or complaint as is mentioned in paragraph 2 of subsection 4 ought to be referred to the Solicitor's Disciplinary tribunal for hearing and determination by that Tribunal; and

(b) that it is necessary for the protection of the public to do so, the Panel may direct that any practising certificate held by the solicitor in question shall be suspended until the allegation or complaint is determined by the Solicitor's Disciplinary Tribunal or until the expiration of such period as may be prescribed by rule made by the Board, whichever is the earlier.

7.—(1) Subsection (2) of section 46 of the Solicitors Act 1974 (Solicitors Disciplinary Tribunal) shall be amended to read as follows—

"(2) The Master of the Rolls shall, after consultation with the Solicitors Complaints Board and with bodies representing the interests of consumers, appoint the members of the Tribunal."

(2) After subsection (2) of section 46 of the Solicitors Act 1974 (Solicitors Disciplinary Tribunal) shall be inserted—

"(2A) A person who is a member of the Council of the Law Society shall not be eligible to be a member of the Solicitors Disciplinary Tribunal."

8.—(1) The Board shall establish an Arbitration Service for the determination of cases arising out of a complaint to the Board in which compensation not exceeding £2,000 may be appropriately awarded.

(2) The Arbitration Service shall be constituted as provided by the Board by rules made under this section.

(3) Rules under paragraph (2)—

(a) shall secure that a person who sits as a member of the Investigation Panel in the preliminary proceedings on any case shall not sit as a member of the Arbitration Service in any subsequent proceedings on that case; and

(b) shall not come into force until approved by order of the Lord Chancellor.

(4) The power to make orders under paragraph (3) shall be exercisable by Statutory Instruments subject to annulment in pursuance of a resolution of either House of Parliament and includes a power to vary or revoke such an order by subsequent order.

9.—(1) The Arbitration Service shall have the functions conferred on them by this section.

(2) It shall be the duty of the Service to hear and determine any case referred to them under subsection 6 of this section.

(3) Upon determining any such case as is referred to in paragraph (2) the Arbitration Service may—

(a) award compensation to the complainant not exceeding £2,000; or

(b) dismiss the case.

(4) The Board may, with the approval of the Lord Chancellor, make rules providing for the procedure to be followed by the Arbitration Service when hearing and determining any such case as it mentioned in paragraph (2).

(5) If it appears to the Lord Chancellor that there has been a change in the value of money since the date when this section comes into force, he may by Order made by Statutory Instrument subject to annulment in pursuance of a resolution of either House of Parliament substitute for the sum specified in sections 8(1) and 9(3) such sum as is the then equivalent of £2,000.'.—[Mr. Nicholas Brown.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Nicholas Brown: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): With this it will be convenient to take the following: New clause 8—Council for Legal Services—

'(1) For the purposes of Part I of this Act and the Solicitors' Act 1974 there shall be a body known as the Council for Legal Services.

(2) It shall be the general duty of the Council to ensure that standards of quality of service which can reasonably be expected of solicitors and of professional conduct among solicitors are upheld and enforced and it shall assume all the powers of the Law Society under the Solicitors Act 1974 for that purpose.

(3) Schedule 9 will have effect with respect to the Council.

(4) The Council shall appoint an Ombudsman who shall have responsibility for

(i) the investigation of complaints against solicitors in respect of quality of service and professional conduct

(ii) promoting conciliation in appropriate cases

(iii) unless falling within the jurisdiction of the Solicitors' Disciplinary Tribunal, in resolving complaints and applying the sanctions available to the Council under section of the Solicitors' Act 1974.

(5) The Solicitors Act 1974 shall have effect subject to the amendments specified in Schedule 10.'.

Amendment No. 1, in page 2, line 4, leave out clause 1.

Amendment No. 18—New Schedule—

'THE SOLICITORS COMPLAINTS BOARD

Status

1. The Board shall be a body corporate.

Constitution

2.—(1) The Board shall consist of—

(a) no more than 15 solicitors of at least ten years standing; and

(b) no more than 10 lay persons.

(2) Members of the Board who are solicitors shall be elected by a postal ballot of all solicitors holding a practising certificate at the time of the election.

(3) Lay members of the Board shall be appointed by the Master of the Rolls after consultation with—

(a) the Board;

(b) relevant professional bodies; and

(c) organisations representing the interests of consumers.

(4) A member of the Council of the Law Society shall not be eligible to stand for election to the Board.

3.—(1) During the initial period the Board shall consist of a chairman and not more than 15 members (at least 5 of whom shall be lay members) appointed by the Master of the Rolls.

(2) In this paragraph the "initial period" means the period beginning with the establishment of the Board and ending immediately before the date fixed by the first scheme under subparagraph (3) for the coming into office of the first persons elected or nominated as members of the Board in accordance with the scheme.

(3) The Board shall prepare a scheme making provision as to—

(a) the election or nomination of persons for the purposes of sub-paragraphs (a) and (b) of paragraph 2(1).

(b) the tenure and vacation of office of persons elected or nominated as aforesaid, and the eligibility of persons for election or nomination.

(4) A scheme under sub-paragraph (3) shall not come into force until it has been approved by the Lord Chancellor and the first scheme shall be submitted to the Lord Chancellor for approval before the end of the period of one year beginning with the establishment of the Board.

(5) The Master of the Rolls shall after consultation with the members of the Board appoint a Chairman of the Board to hold office for the period of one year.

4.—(1) The Board shall have power to raise a levy on practising solicitors, which levy shall be charged on the issue or renewal of a practising certificate.

(2) The levy referred to in sub-paragraph (1) shall be sufficient to meet the expenses of the Board incurred in the performance of their functions under this Act.

Remuneration of members

5. The Board shall have power to pay to the members of the Board or any of its committees such fees for attendance and such travelling, subsistence or other allowances as the Board may determine.

Incidental powers

6. The Board shall have power to do anything which in its opinion is calculated to facilitate the proper discharge of its functions, including the borrowing of money.

Officers and staff

7.—(1) The Board shall have power to appoint such officers and servants as it may determine.

(2) The Board shall pay to its officers and servants such remuneration as it may determine.

(3) The Board shall, as regards any officers or servants in whose case it may determine to do so, pay to or in respect of them such pensions, allowances or gratuities, or provide and maintain for them such schemes (whether contributory or not) for the payment to or in respect of them of such pensions, allowances or gratuities, as it may determine.

Committees of the Board

8.—(1) The Board may establish a committee for any purpose (other than a purpose for which it is required to establish a committee by virtue of any provision of this Part) and may delegate to any committee established under this paragraph, with or without restrictions or conditions, as it thinks fit, the exercise of any function exercisable by the Board under this Part, not being—

(a) a power to make rules, schemes or standing orders under this Part;

(b) a function expressly conferred by this Part on any committee required to be established as aforesaid; or

(c) subject to any express provision for delegation in the rules, a function expressly conferred on the Board by any rules under this Part.

(2) The number of members of a committee established under this paragraph, and the terms on which they are to hold and vacate office, shall be fixed by the Board.

(3) A committee established under this paragraph may include persons who are not members of the Board (whether licensed conveyancers or not), but a majority of the members of any such committee (including the Chairman) shall be members of the Board.

Proceedings

9.—(1) The powers of the Board and of any of its committees may be exercised notwithstanding any vacancy, and no proceedings of the Board or of any of its committee shall be invalidated by any defect in the election or nomination of a member.

(2) The Board may make standing orders for regulating the proceedings (including quorum) of the Board and of any of its committees.

Accounts

10.—(1) The Board shall keep proper accounts of all sums received or paid by it and proper records to those accounts.

(2) The Board shall appoint auditors to the Board, each of whom shall be a member of one or more relevant bodies of accountants.

(3) The Board shall cause their accounts to be audited annually by the auditors to the Board; and, as soon as is practicable after the accounts for any period have been audited, the Board shall cause them to be published and shall send a copy of them to the Lord Chancellor together with a copy of any report of the auditors thereon.".

Mr. Brown: On Second Reading and in Committee the Opposition made clear their view that part I was inadequate for its purpose. We are conscious of the improvements that the Government have made and we have taken care to draft the new clause so that we can retain the benefits of part I as it stands. The problem is that all the major anomalies which were pointed out on Second Reading remain. Part I will not deal with the widespread public dissatisfaction with the present system. The largest single grievance is that the legal profession controls the mechanism for dealing with complainis against it. The National Consumer Council's MORI poll revealed that only 3 per cent. of those polled thought that this was satisfactory. No matter what hon. Members feel about the accuracy of opinion polls, one would have to allow for a wide margin of error to interpret 3 per cent. in favour as a vote of confidence in the status quo.

The new clause meets the point by setting up an independent body to deal with complaints. It will be professionally serviced by its own staff. The legal profession will have an important voice in its functioning. We are not anti the profession, but the solicitors will not control this body. Thus, the public's objections will be met and the profession's reputation will be enhanced, because the public will have confidence in the complaints system.

The public's second major grievance against the present mechanism is over the confusing variety of avenues of complaint. The intractable nature of the complaints procedure and the tremendous obstacles faced in securing any financial remedy for a grievance will combine to make the ordinary complainant feel that the legal profession is ganging up against him. The new clause provides a focus for complaints and the possibility of redress.

It is difficult for a citizen to obtain advice and help when trying to come to grips with the negligence of his solicitor, and we provide for that. It is useless to point to the existence of the voluntary negligence panels. The Law Society has not bothered to monitor their performance, so we do not know how effective they have been. I have the experience of my constituents, whom I have tried to help, to guide me. My attitude is shaped by my practical experiences of the profession in Newcastle upon Tyne. I have no doubt that complainants are given the run around when they try to complain about solicitors. Whether that is the intention, or whether the present system makes it almost inevitable, I am not able to say. This injustice must be stopped, and our amendment does that.

If the abuse is not remedied now, public pressure, and perhaps a change of Government—or at least a change of Lord Chancellor—will make the pressure for reform later almost inevitable. The new clause is based on the Solicitors (Independent Complaints Procedure) Bill which was introduced by my hon. Friend the Member for Battersea (Mr. Dubs). I pay tribute to his pioneering work, which is very much appreciated not just by those who have the interests of the consumer at heart but by those who have the long-term interests of the profession at heart.

The amendments have been altered from their original wording to take account of the Coopers and Lybrand findings and recommendations and to make them compatible with the Solicitors (Independent Complaints Procedure) Bill. The Opposition have been working from the draft Coopers and Lybrand report, which someone was good enough to send me in advance of publication, and perhaps in advance of potential dilution. I like to think that it was sent to me by the Lord Chancellor, but the Attorney-General tells me that that is unlikely, to put it at its nicest.

The report tells the Law Society what the Opposition, the Legal Action Group and the National Consumer Council could have told it more cheaply. In short, the report says that the game is up. It urges an independent complaints procedure, a focus for complaints, a separation of the Law Society's trade union functions from its disciplinary ones, and arbitration. I was pleased that the report referred to the solicitors' trade union role in the same affectionate way as I referred to it in Committee.

The report says some unkind things about the speed and responsiveness of the Law Society's complaints procedure. It found that there was "a substantial backlog" and that

"the Professional Purposes Department was under-resourced and inadequately staffed."

The report then criticised the department for its "extreme caution". Yet this is the institution in which, under part I of the Bill, the Government invite the general public to have continued confidence. The public will not have that confidence in it. They will rightly continue to feel cheated.

[Mr. Brown]

Perhaps the most worrying aspect is the Government's failure to develop a policy in advance of events. The pace of legislation has been dictated, not by the Government, but by the Law Society. The Government do not form a view until the Law Society has formed a view, which the Government then uncritically endorse. This is utterly craven. This wrong approach to reform has got the Government into the present mess. They are legislating in part I for the La[illegible]ociety's last known view. However, the Law Society has just received a report from Coopers and Lybrand, which it commissioned, which says that the present view is wholly inadequate and untenable. On past form, when the Law Society changes its mind, the Government follow. It is therefore likely that we shall go over all this ground again and that the time of the House will have been wasted on part I.

There is a way out for the Government. To provide this way out we, as a responsible, helpful and constructive Opposition, have tabled the new clause. It could be that there are those with professional interests who hope that part I, as it stands, will appease the complaints. There may be those who hope to lose the contents of our amendments and the Coopers and Lybrand recommendations by delay and obstruction—in short, by adopting the same tactics which those who complain about solicitors say are used against them.

These proposals are our response to the present position. If that situation is allowed to deteriorate, due to neglect or deliberate obstruction, public pressure for a more thorough review of the Law Society's privileged position will become irresistible. I commend the new clause to the House and to the profession — in that order, not in the Government's order.

Mr. Alf Dubs (Battersea): Earlier this year, I introduced under the ten-minute Bill procedure the Solicitors (Independent Complaints Procedure) Bill. Leave to introduce the Bill was given by the House without any opposition. Although it provoked an enormous postbag of mail from all over the country, I have not had a single letter or representation other than in support of the Bill's aims. I mention that legislation because these amendments are directly based on it.

I am grateful especially to the Legal Action Group but also to the National Consumer Council for their help in preparing the Bill and publicising it. There has been enormous support for that legislation. I have been astonished at the number of people who spoke to me, in the House and outside, and at the number of letters that I received not only from the very rich, who have complained bitterly about their solicitors, but from the very poor, whose lives have been seriously disrupted and damaged by disputes in which they believed that justice had not been done, although they complained about the solicitors who acted for them.

Of course, complaints against solicitors come from a minority of people. The bulk of our constituents are satisfied with the service that they get from solicitors. I am not seeking in any way to denigrate the whole profession. Nevertheless, an important minority feel seriously aggrieved because of their dealings with the legal profession. They feel that they have not received justice and believe that the method by which they can complain against solicitors is inadequate. They want changes.

I appreciate that the Attorney-General is embarrassed about this part of the Bill, because the Coopers and Lybrand report has appeared at the wrong time for him. I do not want to tread too much on his toes and dwell on his embarrassment, but it is obvious that he must be embarrassed. In a sense, I am sorry that circumstances have conspired to make that so.

The mystery surrounding the Coopers and Lybrand report puzzles me a little. I understand that it has been made available officially by the Law Society. I went into the House of Commons Library earlier today and asked whether it had a copy of the report. It assured me that it had not been able to obtain one from the Law Society. My hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown) has one, and I have three copies. They all arrived by mysterious means in brown envelopes from sources about which I am not clear. If the Attorney-General is short of a copy or two, I have three. I do not need them all. I am genuinely puzzled about why the Law Society, knowing that the Bill was going through the House, and knowing that the part of the Bill dealing with complaints against solicitors was coming before the House, did not move a little faster. I have reason to believe that the report has officially been out for about a week. Despite that, it has not reached the House of Commons Library. The Law Society is adding to the Attorney-General's embarrassment. If he is cross about that, I can only say that I agree with him.

8.30 pm

The Coopers and Lybrand report seems to be a sensible document. It makes its main criticisms of the present arrangements concisely. I should like to quote from paragraph 20 (a), (b) and (c) because that summarises the fault of the present system which is not put right by part I but which would be put right if the amendments were to be accepted. The first point is:

"A conflict of role arises if one body, in this case The Law Society, is responsible both for handling complaints against solicitors and for carrying out the full range of activities of a professional representative association".

There is a contrast in the views of Ministers. They feel that there would be an unacceptable conflict of interest in regard to conveyancing if the same solicitor were to work for a bank or building society, yet they do not—unless I am going to be surprised later—share the view that there is an intolerable conflict of interest if the Law Society acts as a professional body on behalf of solicitors and investigates complaints against solicitors by members of the public.

The second point made by the Coopers and Lybrand report is:

"the distinctions made between the different types of complaints are confused and extremely difficult for the public to understand".

The third point is:

"the complaints handling process is slow, cumbersome, inefficient and unresponsive to change."

The case for the amendments is contained within those three criticisms. As my hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East said, the amendments are based upon the Bill that I introduced, but have been adjusted to give more direct effect to the Coopers and Lybrand report.

It is essential to have an independent system for investigating complaints against solicitors. As has been made clear in the report, that would give a number of distinct benefits. First, if the suggested scheme were adopted, there would be one focus for complaints. In other words, a member of the public who feels a sense of grievance would have only one place to go and could be satisfied that the complaint would be taken on from there. At the moment, the Law Society all too often says that it does not handle a complaint and it may suggest a different remedy to the complainant. The solicitor might be required to do the work again or to refund the money.

Some of those benefits exist in the scheme provided in the Bill. The solicitor might be reprimanded. The complaint might be referred directly from the new complaints body to the solicitors disciplinary tribunal or there might be an arbitration scheme that would make recourse to the courts in negligence cases involving up to £2,000 unnecessary. The last point would be especially beneficial because a complainant who feels aggrieved by his previous experience of the legal profession and perhaps the courts will not be happy if he is told that he has a remedy and can go to the courts. Of course, there is the money involved. Legal aid might help. However, it will not appeal to the average person who feels a sense of grievance to suggest that he or she should go through the whole cumbersome procedure again and possibly incur the expenditure of significant sums of money. That is why I am keen on the arbitration scheme which is suggested in the amendment.

There is another point of some importance which relates to a proposal contained in the Bill and which I think is unsatisfactory. I understand that, under the present scheme, the Law Society has a wide discretion to refuse to deal with a complaint. That is wrong. It is arbitrary and it may leave the complainant confused. Such a let-out would not be available to the new body dealing with complaints. It would be obliged to deal with all complaints. That proposal would be of immense benefit not just to the average member of the community who feels a sense of grievance but to the legal profession. I cannot think of a more invidious position for the legal profession to find itself in than the one in which it is now. There have been some notorious instances in which the complaints system, as handled by the Law Society, has completely broken down. I shall not take up the time of the House by repeating examples which have been mentioned previously.

If the Law Society wishes to sustain the present position or if it believes that the small improvements contained in the Bill are adequate, it is in difficulties. I contend that the Bill is inadequate.

If we pass the Bill and merely say, "Oh, well, we may get round to thinking about this again," we shall be storing up trouble for ourselves. Even at this late hour in the Bill's life, the Attorney-General can say that he accepts the amendments. He has an alternative, which I put to him as a second best. The least that he can do is give a commitment that he will consider sympathetically the conclusions contained in the Coopers and Lybrand report with a view to early legislation. If the Attorney-General cannot do that, he is merely storing up difficulties for himself.

An enormous body of opinion in this country feels that we need the changes. They are of interest to many people. Until such changes are brought about, and until we have an independent system of investigating complaints against solicitors, many of us and many other people will not be satisfied. If we leave the matter tonight without a commitment for the future, it will not be long before we shall have to legislate again. It would be a pity to say that we will do nothing now, put off the day and have to do something in a few years' time. That is not good enough. We owe more to the people who would like to see changes.

I hope that we can have some positive guidance from the Attorney-General. I hope that he will accept the amendments but, if not, I hope that he will give a clear commitment as to the action that he will take in the near future.

Sir John Farr (Harborough): I welcome new clause 4, which has a good deal of merit. I hope that my right hon. and learned Friend will carefully consider some of the suggestions that he has heard from the Opposition because, although the Law Society supports the improvement contained in the Bill, some of us believe that the present arrangements, even with the improved machinery included in the Bill, will not be adequate.

I support the right of anyone to go to the complaints board. The complaints will then be referred to the investigating panel and to the adjudicating panel. That seems simple and straightforward.

I am grateful to the Law Society for writing to me only last month to explain the safeguards that exist in the Bill and the improvement that the Bill would make to the existing system. Even with that strengthened system, I believe that in practice there will be manifest failings. I say that because in the Bill, and in the letter from the Law Society dated 5 June, there is not one word about delay. I have serious misgivings about the way in which the Law Society conducts its affairs, because of the almost endless delay and prevarication that an ordinary Member of Parliament experiences in trying to obtain some form of justice for his constituents.

In the past 10 years, two of my constituents met with severe accidents involving head injury. In each case I had to approach the Law Society in trying to secure better compensation for them. I shall refer to my constituents as Mr. A and Mr. B.

Mr. A, who was involved in a serious car accident, was awarded about £27,000 for his injuries. It was a handsome and fair award, but the solicitor who acted for Mr. A presented a bill for about £23,000. Luckily, that was spotted and the solicitor eventually sent my constituent a cheque for the overcharge of £23,000 in his bill because of "a clerical error", as he put it. That was a disgraceful case of deliberate overcharging of a man who was not mentally able to cope with his affairs for himself. That solicitor should have been prosecuted for criminal negligence. That is the course that the Law Society said that it was considering four or five years ago. Although Mr. A has received back the £23,000 overcharge, there is no sign of a prosecution taking place.

Mr. B, who was also involved in a serious motor car accident, was awarded substantial damages of about £22,000. Again, that was a perfectly fair award. As with Mr. A, the machinery of the law proceeded in an adequate and normal way. But Mr. B's solicitors fell foul of the law by paying Mr. B directly £22,000 when he was manifestly mentally inadequate. In his mentally disabled state, Mr. B squandered the money and is now penniless. The solicitors handling Mr. B's case were in contravention of the law for, if a client is mentally incapacitated, they have a duty not to give him the money directly, as he is not able to be responsible for his actions. I sent particulars of that case to the Law Society between five and 10 years ago.

[Sir John Farr]

The last letter I had from the society was this week. I was reminded that the long recess was due and that the society hoped in due course to let me have counsel's opinion on whether the firm in question should be prosecuted.

In dealing with those two cases I met with extreme lack of interest, prevarication and blocking on the part of the Law Society. As far as I can see, it will be another 10 years or so before the obvious action will be taken. For that reason, if I have the chance to do so, I shall support the new clause.

8.45 pm

Mr. Alex Carlile: The Glanville Davies case was an ill wind but it did a good deal of good. It swept like a hurricane through the Law Society in Chancery lane, and I believe that one of the most interesting results of that case is that it has actually changed attitudes among solicitors.

In paragraph 41 of the Coopers and Lybrand report, in which I think the authors are referring particularly to their contacts among solicitors, they say:

"We have found widespread agreement with our broad conclusion that complaints handling should be transferred from The Society to a new and regulatory body separate from and independent of The Law Society".

They go on to say:

"We have much less agreement about the nature and functions of the new body—not least because many had thought up to, but not beyond, the need for complaints handling to be independent of The Society."

However, it is not beyond the wit of man and not even beyond the wit of Government — even of this Government—that some means might be devised, and devised very quickly, to provide the independent procedure needed for dealing with complaints against solicitors.

It is notable that other professions and other bodies have already devised independent disciplinary procedures. The accountancy profession, which had to deal with the difficulty of being a profession split into different parts, has recently established a joint disciplinary scheme which applies to all members of four professional associations participating in the scheme. The scheme provides procedures for investigating the professional and business conduct of accountants of the four different types. The procedure enables their efficiency and their competence to be investigated in questions which give rise to public concern.

It is fundamentally offensive that the Law Society should carry out the two functions of representing solicitors and regulating solicitors. It is not necessary to expand the arguments beyond those broad but important professions of principle—a principle which, I believe, is widely held on both sides of the House. We would hope to hear tonight from the Attorney-General that the Government have not only taken note of the Coopers and Lybrand report—as, of course, they have—but have decided that in the next Session of Parliament, within the next few months, there will be legislation giving expression to that widespread agreement to which I referred in quoting from paragraph 41 of the report.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: The great majority of the solicitors—the collective noun is a "charge" of solicitors —who were present on the Government Benches during the debate on conveyancing, when the Government's mind was still open and the solicitors were wanting to close it in a direction favourable to their interests, have now disappeared. I take it that that means that on this matter the Government have made up their mind and will not accept our new clauses. Nevertheless, it is still important to argue the case for the amendment, in the best interests of the legal profession itself.

My concern is for a profession which serves the public in all its problems, defends all its rights, and even puts the public interest and serving the public above its vested interest as a cosy profession. It is because of that emphasis that the Government should act in the profession's own best interest and accept the new clauses.

There is a sad contrast between the Government's behaviour on this matter and on conveyancing, and it is important to draw attention to that. When it comes to banks and building societies doing conveyancing, conflict of interest becomes paramount—so important that it can obviate the principle in the eyes of some. The Lord Chancellor can selfishly argue that one has to defend the income of solicitors because one does not want to pay more fees in legal aid to them. Conflict of interest there is all-important. But when we come to complaints against solicitors, where there is a real conflict of interest, it is ignored by the Government. That conflict is real and palpable and is felt by the public.

The Law Society cannot act as a trade union defending the vested interests of its members and as custodian of the public interest serving and dealing with complaints by the public. It cannot be judge, jury and accused in its own case. There is a real conflict of interest. If the Government regard conflict of interest as so important, why do they not do something about it and accept our new clauses, which get round the problem? The Coopers and Lybrand report makes clear in paragraph 23 what a conflict of interest is. It says:

"some consider that The Society's complaints handling and representational roles are inherently in conflict, whatever arrangements are devised to minimise the conflict in individual cases; they are concerned that, despite rigorous efforts to eliminate conflict in those cases, there will still be cases in which it will occur. From our programme of interviews and consultations, we are impressed by the widespread perception of, and concern over, this basic conflict, both among members of the profession and among outsiders."

The question of conflict of interest is obsessive. Why will the Government not do anything about it? Our new clauses get round the problem. All Members who speak on legal issues are deluged with complaints about solicitors. One can understand some of the complaints, because people who lose do not like losing. But many of the complaints are about shoddy workmanship, inattention and inefficiency. They are justified complaints from which there is no redress. The Bill, as it stands, does not provide adequate redress. The Government will be serving the public well if they accept the new clauses.

Part I of the Bill is not satisfactory. There is no mention of a concrete code of written professional standards. The boundary between negligence and inadequate professional work is not defined. The Law Society is given wide discretion to deal with complaints, or to refuse to deal with complaints, and the shoddy work jurisdiction is almost entirely in the hands of the society. All that is wrong.

More important, events have overtaken the Bill and we are legislating nonsense. The report from Coopers and Lybrand manifestly says that the Bill is inadequate and that there has to be independent machinery. That is what we are proposing in the new clauses. Yet the Government are determined to press on in the face of their own inadequacies. They are closing the case for legislation for at least two or three years, and giving us a stopgap measure which has been rejected by the society's own advisers.

I am aware that part I comes directly from the Law Society. Speaking as the political arm of the Law Society, the Lord Chancellor says that part I was requested by the society, and he is inclined to listen only to the society in this kind of case. That is an interesting comment on the source of the legislation. The Law Society's own management consultants, Coopers and Lybrand, say the proposals are inadequate and therefore the Government have a responsibility to think again. They should not push this House into nonsensical legislation which has been bypassed by events.

The Government will doubtless say that they want time to consult, but there was no consultation over part I before it was put into the Bill. In any case, consultation could take years, bearing in mind the way the profession functions. Coopers and Lybrand referred to an unacceptable gap of 11 years in the preparation by the society of a new guide to professional conduct. If that is the speed of consultation, it would be far better to do what we are proposing, which is to lay down the basic guidelines by way of the new clauses and to allow consultation to take place on how the basic guidelines are to be operated and filled in.

Parliament has a clear mandate from the public to act by ensuring that the new legislation is not nonsense. That is what it will be if we pass it unchanged. It should be not a stopgap, but legislation which will fulfil a public need. There is strong public feeling. All the opinion polls and our own correspondence show that. We need an independent review procedure for complaints. If the Bill is passed unamended, people will feel that Parliament is once again ignoring the public interest and getting into cahoots with a privileged profession in order to protect that profession from the standards of impartiality and independent review which are maintained in every aspect of life and in all other professions.

The Attorney-General: The canard was repeated by the hon. Member for Newcastle on Tyne, East (Mr. Brown). I assure him that there is no mole in ermine in this building, and that includes the Lord Chancellor. I suspect I know who it was.

We had a valuable contribution from the hon. Member for Battersea (Mr. Dubs), and all of us respect his work on this subject. I have expressed my admiration for him before, and I repeat it tonight. I should tell the hon. Gentleman that if the Library does not have the Coopers and Lybrand report it must be because it does not take the Law Society's Gazette, because it was published as a supplement to the Gazette on 10 July and was therefore available to anybody who needed it.

I wish that I could give to the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile) the undertaking that within a few months we will introduce legislation. I cannot do that, for reasons which I shall explain in a little detail.

My old friend the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) invented yet another phrase — a charge of solicitors — which tempts me to think that he is the grouser of Great Grimsby. I hope that he will not sue me for that.

I hope that the House will forgive me if I take a little time, because this is an important subject and deserves to be dealt with in proper detail. It has been helpful to have this opportunity so early after the publication of the report to debate the proposals for an independent solicitors complaints board, as reflected in the new clauses and in another way in the Coopers and Lybrand report, or what it calls the exposure draft of its report.

Before Opposition Members get too carried away with enthusiasm for immediate change, I must inject a note of caution. The first warning must be that whatever legislative changes might be needed to give effect to such proposals, they cannot be included in this Bill. It is far too late, even if there were settled policy, to formulate the additional clauses which would be needed to make the changes suggested in the Opposition new clauses or by Coopers and Lybrand. Not only would there need to be several new provisions to set up a solicitors complaints board, to describe its functions in detail and to prescribe its constitution, but there would have to be a line-by-line examination of the 80 or so sections of the Solicitors Act 1974 to see what should be removed, what retained and what amended. Therefore, the new clauses are defective, although I do not complain about that. I admire the huge amount of work that must have gone into them, and I congratulate hon. Members on what they did.

This debate will be helpful in assisting the Law Society in its deliberations on the report — we have already heard conflicting views, as one would expect, from the council of the Law Society—and the House will agree, on reflection, that rushed and ill-thought-out legislation is something that we would live to regret.

We are considering an exposure draft—a first report — as only one element in the first phase of the fundamental review of the society's functions and organisation now in hand. We must await the further reports from the management consultants on the other matters within their terms of reference. We must consider structure, staffing and systems, which have been expressly reserved by Coopers and Lybrand for later phases of the review, as is consideration of the society's representational functions and its role in legal aid administration. All those matters deserve careful consideration, and even if the society can form rapid decisions following the end of the consultation period in October — which I suspect is unlikely — if would be foolish then to press for early legislation and, therefore, miss the opportunity to take account of later proposals, which, in a sense, is the reverse of the accusations made against us in carrying on with part I.

The Coopers and Lybrand report proposes that a solicitors complaints board independent of the Law Society be created with the duty of investigating all complaints against solicitors. A central theme is that the new board would provide a one-door entry point for all complaints against solicitors, having power to impose sanctions in respect of less serious cases, but being able to pass on the more serious cases of misconduct and negligence to the solicitors disciplinary tribunal and the courts. That approach is only one option for change. The society, being rightly anxious to encourage as wide-ranging a debate as possible, has identified some alternative options. It might, for example, be possible to satisfy public concern through the creation of separate committees within the Law Society with responsibility for the investigation of, and the adjudication on, complaints against solicitors. It seems right that such alternative approaches be considered. Whether we can accept them is another matter. The society has also identified some potential difficulties outlined in the Coopers and Lybrand report.

Those considering the report will no doubt wish to make an especially close analysis of the wide variety of factors which it brings together. The consultants — naturally enough, perhaps, having regard to the nature of their exercise — have tended to concentrate on the society's functions when considering possible improvements in the system for handling complaints. But this ignores the fact that the society is only one of three bodies with major functions in this area, and—hitherto, at least — has been exercising very much a subordinate jurisdiction when compared with the courts and the solicitors disciplinary tribunal.

We shall always have problems between any new body and the negligence jurisdiction of the courts, bearing in mind the real and immediate danger of prejudice to clients' interests. We must think carefully about the extent to which a single point of entry can work in this area. Further thought may need to be given to the relationships with the quality control aspects of taxation and remuneration certificate procedure. We may need additional consideration of the role of a lay observer, given the presence of lay representatives on the proposed new body. We must also consider accountability: to whom should that new body be accountable?

Those are some of the clearly difficult issues that must be resolved before the Government can invite the House to consider legislation for changes. The report acknowledges that there are no absolute answers here and that these are matters for judgment. It acknowledges that much existing criticism may relate to appearance as much as to reality. It refers to "a wider issue of public confidence, by no means confined to the Law Society, in the accountability of professional associations and the means of disciplining their members."

The criticisms that have been made of the lack of independent elements within the existing system disregard the part at present played by the solicitors disciplinary tribunal as a statutory body, independent of the Law Society, and the lay observer as an independent check on the society's handling of complaints against solicitors. Thus, even on the fundamental principle of an independent body, there is clearly more than one view. In his recently published report, the lay observer—and I shall not quote it all—made it quite clear that he took a contrary view, so the opinion, although it may so appear from the debate today, does not in fact lie all in the same direction. After the recent events in Wales, I think that we are now a little more suspicious of MORI polls than we were before. Therefore, the MORI polls which were quoted previously must be considered with a little suspicion.

The response to the consultation exercise which has now been embarked upon will assist the society in reaching informed decisions on all the matters raised in the Coopers and Lybrand report. It is right that the Government should wait until such time as this process is complete before forming a view of their own, but I assure the House that the Government have a completely open mind about whether a complaints system independent of the Law Society best suits the public interest.

I come to the points that were made by the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery. This is really an approach from a different angle, based on the report of the National Consumer Council. It is getting to very much the same end by rather different means. The points that I have made, as I am sure the hon. and learned Gentleman will appreciate, as a lawyer, about the Coopers and Lybrand report apply equally to him. I hope that he will forgive me if I do not go into great detail, because in a sense I would merely be repeating what I have said before. Whichever suggestion one takes—the Coopers and Lybrand report, which is merely the first stage of a much more detailed analysis, or the National Consumer Council report — these are matters which obviously need a great deal more consultation, and I am sure that, on reflection, the House would be the first to agree that hastily rushed through legislation does great harm in the end.

Part I contains a number of real benefits for the client. I would hate in any way to delay those, because, if we cannot have all that we want today, for the reasons that I have given, part I provides more safeguards for the public, which the House will generally welcome.

Mr. Dubs: The Attorney-General has been a little enigmatic. He says that the Government are completely open-minded about the possibility of an independent system for investigating such complaints. Can he give the House some idea of the possible time scale, on the assumption that this open-mindedness on the Government's part comes to an end and the Coopers and Lybrand report proves to be persuasive?

The Attorney-General: I think that I made it clear. We obviously must have the complete series of reports from Coopers and Lybrand. On the existing report, there is a consultation period ending in October. We shall want to see what the Law Society and others concerned say. It may well be that the bulk of opinion will be on the lines of Coopers and Lybrand. I want to have the other reports, because Coopers and Lybrand has reserved certain matters, to which I referred, for later reports. We do not want to have two bites at the cherry. Indeed, we have already been accused of having two bites.

We shall have to consider carefully the existing law about solicitors contained in the Solicitors Act 1974. I assure the hon. Gentleman that there will be no deliberate holding back by the Government. We shall move as fast as we can, but he will appreciate, as will all hon. Members, the difficulty in getting such matters into the programme of a coming Session. There is always great competition to include Bills. I give him the undertaking that there will be no feet dragging of any kind.

Mr. Nicholas Brown: The Attorney-General's reply was disappointing, though not unexpectedly so. We appreciate the Government's difficulties, even embarrassment, in this area. However, we feel it important to show the Law Society that Opposition Members mean business and we shall, therefore, press the matter to a Division.

New Clause 10

AMENDMENT OF ARBITRATION ACT 1950

'In paragraph (b) of section 7 of the Arbitration Act 1950 (party fails to appoint an arbitrator), the words after "appoint an arbitrator" to the end of the paragraph shall be replaced by the words "or does not do so within the time specified in the agreement or, if no time is specified, within a reasonable time, the other party to the agreement, having appointed his arbitrator, may serve the party in default with a written notice to appoint an arbitrator and, if the appointment is not made within seven clear days after the service of the notice, the High Court or a judge thereof may, on the application of the party who gave the notice, appoint an arbitrator on behalf of the party in default who shall have the like power to act in the reference and make an award as if had been appointed in accordance with the terms of the agreement.".'.—[Mr. Ottaway.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Richard Ottaway (Nottingham, North): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Clause 57 blocks a loophole in the law of arbitration but creates an inconsistency. The clause is welcome in that it stops people being able to avoid appointing an arbitrator and therefore to avoid having a properly constituted arbitration panel but, as those who follow the debate on clause 57 in Committee will be aware, I was anxious that its approach was wrong in that it provided for a court appointment of a replacement arbitrator. I thought that a somewhat surprising decision in view of the weight of opinion of people in the arbitration profession who went to the Department of Trade and Industry to make their case. It is regrettable that their views did not prevail.

As a result of clause 57, section 10 of the Arbitration Act 1950 is inconsistent with section 7 of that Act. Section 7 provides that, when parties have agreed to refer a dispute to two arbitrators as umpire, in the event of default in the appointment of one of the arbitrators, a properly constituted panel becomes a sole arbitrator. Clause 57 provides that when there is a default in the appointment of an arbitrator, there are three arbitrators, and the second is appointed by the court. That is bad law and, inconsistent and should be remedied.

In Committee, I tried to provide consistency with section 7 of the 1950 Act but my proposal was rejected on three grounds. I should like to consider the arguments that my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney-General used to reject my proposal. First, he said that a fundamental requirement was that the clause should provide that a dispute should be settled by a three-man arbitration tribunal. I have managed to comply with that requirement by providing in the new clause for a three-man arbitration tribunal. Secondly, he said that it was important for such a clause to have the blessing of the United Nations Committee on International Trade Law and that clause 53 should be in line with the model clause on arbitration. Again, I have got over that hurdle by providing in the new clause for a three-man arbitration panel, which is consistent with the UNCITRAL model code.

The most important point, however, is that the Government took the advice of Mr. Justice Mustill. To quote again my right hon. and learned Friend, he said:

> "Mr. Justice Mustill is probably the greatest expert on the law of arbitration . . . Mr. Justice Mustill is probably the leading expert of all time in this respect."—[Official Report, Standing Committee D, 4 July 1985, c. 196.]

I am happy to accept my right hon. and learned Friend's view of Mr. Justice Mustill. It is unfortunate that in Committee we did not have before us a letter dated 26 February 1985 from Mr. Justice Mustill to Lord Hacking. Referring to sections 7 and 10 of the Arbitration Act 1950, he said:

> "We accept that section 7 provides a precedent for party-appointment. There is, however, much to be said for the view that it is an anomaly, which should not be perpetuated. The Advisory Committee will have to look at sections 7, 10 and 25 together, since they do not really add up."

The unfortunate point about clause 57 is that it does not take Mr. Justice Mustill's advice but looks in isolation at section 10. All I am seeking to do in the new clause is to follow Mr. Justice Mustill's advice by taking sections 7 and 10 together. I have adopted in my new clause the Government's wording of clause 57. Having deployed my right hon. and learned Friend's arguments in Committee and having adopted the Government's wording in the new clause, I hope that he will be able to accept it.

The Attorney-General: I admire my hon. Friend's great ingenuity, but I am afraid that I still have to disappoint him. I appreciate that his approach is consistent and unobjectionable but the problem is that it goes beyond the intention of clause 57, which was designed to fill a specific gap in the Arbitration Act that had been identified by the Mustill committee on a temporary basis — I emphasise "on a temporary basis"—prior to consideration by the departmental advisory committee on arbitration for the reform of arbitration law in the light of the UNCITRAL model. The solution chosen in clause 57 was recommended by the sub-committee and it was adopted in the UNCITRAL model law. As yet there is no evidence that section 7 is creating difficulties for arbitrators but the ingenuity shown by my hon. Friend will be drawn to the attention of the sub-committee.

Mr. Ottaway: Although I am somewhat disappointed, I am reassured by the assurance of my right hon. and learned Friend that the matter will be looked at. Therefore, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 6

PREPARATION OF CONVEYANCING DOCUMENTS BY UNQUALIFIED PERSONS

The Attorney-General: I beg to move, in page 10, line 9, at end insert—

'(5) After that subsection there shall be inserted—

"(4) A local weights and measures authority may institute proceedings for an offence under this section.".'.

In Committee I undertook to introduce an amendment to empower trading standards departments, which formerly were known, probably inappropriately, as weights and measures authorities, to undertake prosecutions for breaches of section 22 of the Solicitors Act 1974. This amendment gives effect to that undertaking. For some time, the arrangements for prosecuting illegal conveyancers have been regarded as unsatisfactory. The Royal Commission on legal services recommended that the Law Society should cease to undertake such prosecutions. No statutory requirement is imposed on the Law Society to do that, and it has assumed responsibility rather by default. That has given rise to presentational difficulties, because it has not been sufficiently recognised that when the Law Society initiates such prosecutions, it is not being selfish and acting in its own interests, but is acting to protect the public.

We have been exploring alternatives and it has been agreed that local trading standards departments should take responsibility in this area. That seems to be a sensible move.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 8

INCORPORATED PRACTICES

Amendments made: No. 5 in page 11, line 17, leave out 'of that Act shall also'

and insert

', or (as the case may be) section 23(1), of that Act shall'.

No. 6, in page 11, line 24, at end insert

'or (as the case may be) under the said section 23.'.—[The Attorney-General.]

Clause 14

ISSUE OF LICENCES BY COUNCIL

9.30 pm

The Attorney-General: I beg to move amendment No. 9, in page 15, line 38, at end insert——

'(4A) Where—

(a) an application for a licence is made in accordance with section 13 by a person who, at the date of the application, already holds a licence under this Part; and

(b) no new licence is issued to him in pursuance of the application before the time when his existing licence would, apart from this subsection, expire in accordance with subsection (4), his existing licence shall not expire at that time but shall continue in force until a new licence is issued to him in pursuance of the application or, if the application is refused by the Council—

(i) until the end of the period within which an appeal may be brought against the refusal under section 28(1)(a); or

(ii) if such an appeal is brought, until the appeal is determined or abandoned.'.

Mr. Speaker: With this, we may take Government amendments Nos. 10, 13, 19 and 21 to 24.

The Attorney-General: In Committee, the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown) moved an amendment to clause 11 designed to ensure that licensed conveyancers should not be prevented from practising when their application to renew an existing licence was not dealt with in time by the Council for Licensed Conveyancers. I undertook to bring forward an amendment to cover the point.

As so often happens, while we were considering the matter raised by the hon. Gentleman, other issues arose which are covered by the amendments grouped with No. 9. Two remove from the council the power to revoke recognition of a body corporate on the grounds of fraud or error and enable the discipline and appeals committee, which is a much better body, to exercise that power. That fits in with the respective roles of the council and the committee under part II.

Two other amendments introduce a right of appeal against refusals to grant recognition to bodies corporate, whether of licensed conveyancers or of solicitors. An amendment to schedule 3 ensures that the council's rule-making powers regarding proceedings before the discipline and appeals committee is sufficiently flexible.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment made: No. 10, in page 16, line 1, leave out 'of expiry of his previous licence'

and insert

'when his previous licence expired in accordance with subsection (4) (or would have so expired but for subsection (4A))'.—[The Attorney-General.]

Clause 31

PROVISION OF CONVEYANCING SERVICES BY RECOGNISED BODIES

Amendment made: No. 13, in page 29, leave out lines 26 to 28.—[The Attorney-General.]

Clause 68

SHORT TITLE, COMMENCEMENT, TRANSITIONAL PROVISIONS AND SAVINGS

The Attorney-General: I beg to move amendment No. 17, in page 56, line 28, leave out 'and 55 to 64' and insert ', 55 to 61 and 63 and 64'.

This is a technical amendment to the commencement provisions, correcting the reference to the sections that will come into force two months after Royal Assent.

Amendment agreed to.

Schedule 2

INCORPORATED PRACTICES: SUPPLEMENTARY PROVISIONS

Amendment made: No. 19, in page 60, line 26, at end insert—

Appeal against refusal of Council to grant recognition

[The Attorney-General]

1A.—(1) Where the Council refuse an application by any body corporate for recognition under section 8 of this Act, that body may appeal to the Master of the Rolls against that refusal within one month of being notified of it.

(2) On an appeal under this paragraph the Master of the Rolls may—

(a) direct the Council to grant recognition of the body in question under section 8 of this Act; or

(b) affirm the refusal of the Council; and he may make such order as to the payment of costs by the Council or by that body as he thinks fit.

(3) Rules made by the Council with the concurrence of the Master of the Rolls may make provision, as respects any application for recognition that is neither granted nor refused by the Council within such period as may be specified in the rules, for enabling an appeal to be brought under this paragraph in relation to the application as if it had been refused by the Council.

(4) The Master of the Rolls may make regulations about the procedure for appeals to him under this paragraph.'.—[The Attorney-General.]

Schedule 4

The Discipline and Appeals Committee: Supplementary Provisions

Amendment made: No. 21, in page 75, line 41, leave out from 'relation' to end of line 8 on page 76 and insert

'to proceedings before the Discipline and Appeals Committee under this Part.

(2) As respects proceedings before the Committee under section 25,'.—[The Attorney-General.]

Schedule 6

Bodies recognised under s.31: Supplementary provisions

Amendments made: No. 22, in page 85, line 26, at end insert—

'Revocation of recognition on grounds of fraud or error

6A.—(1) Where the Discipline and Appeals Committee are satisfied that the recognition of a body corporate under section 31 was granted as a result of any error, or as a result of fraud on the part of that body, the Committee may, if they think fit, by order revoke that body's recognition.

(2) A body corporate may be granted recognition under that section notwithstanding that any recognition previously granted to it has been evoked under this paragraph; but if any such recognition was so revoked on the ground of fraud that body shall not be granted recognition under that section except on an application made in that behalf to the Committee.

Appeal against decision of Council in relation to grant of recognition

6B.—(1) Where, in the case of any body corporate, the Council—

(a) refuses an application by that body for recognition under section 31; or

(b) decides to grant recognition of that body under that section subject to any restrictions, that body may appeal to the Discipline and Appeals Committee against that refusal or decision within one month of being notified of it.

(2) On an appeal under this paragraph the Discipline and Appeals Committee may—

(a) by order direct the Council to grant recognition of the body in question under section 31, either without restrictions or subject to such restrictions falling within subsection (3)(d) of that section as may be specified by the Committee in the direction; or

(b) affirm the refusal or decision of the Council; and the Committee may make such order as to the payment of costs by the Council or by that body as they think fit.

(3) Rules made by the Council may make provision, as respects any application for recognition that is neither granted nor refused by the Council within such period as may be specified in the rules, for enabling an appeal to be brought under this paragraph in relation to the application as if it had been refused by the Council.'.

No. 23, in page 85, line 28, leave out sub-paragraph (1).

No. 24, in page 85, line 33, after 'Paragraphs', insert '1(2),'.—[The Attorney-General.]

The Attorney-General: I beg to move amendment No. 25, in page 86, line 10, leave out

'that Part of that Schedule'

and insert

'Part II of Schedule 5'.

This is a minor drafting amendment which corrects an insufficiently clear reference in schedule 6.

Amendment agreed to.

Schedule 9

Transitional provisions and savings

Amendment made: No. 27, in page 91, line 25, at end insert—

'Restriction on preparation of papers for probate etc.

5A. Where a person has committed an offence under section 23 of the Solicitors Act 1974 before the commencement of section [Preparation of papers for probate etc. by unqualified persons] of this Act, he shall not be liable after that commencement to be proceeded against in respect of that offence unless the act constituting that offence would have constituted an offence under section 23, as substituted by section [Preparation of papers for probate etc. by unqualified persons] of this Act, if it had been in force at the time when the act was done.'.—[The Attorney-General.]

Order for Third Reading read.—[Queen's and Prince of Wales's Consent signified.]

9.33 pm

The Attorney-General: I beg to move, That the Bill be now read the Third time.

I am grateful for the high quality of our debates tonight, and, in particular, in Committee. As so often happens, the criticisms made of the Bill relate generally not to what is in the Bill, but to what people think should have been it it.

As is so often the case when the Government introduce change, far from satisfying the reforming element in us, it serves only to increase the appetite for more. We have been asked to move immediately towards the establishment of an independent body to deal with complaints against solicitors, and we have spent a good deal of time discussing whether banks and building societies should be permitted to offer services. The House will have the opportunity to return to both those issues in due course. The Coopers and Lybrand review of the Law Society is still in its early stages. We await with interest the developments in that area as the exercise progresses. Legislation to enable the Lord Chancellor to exempt bodies corporate from the restrictions on conveyancing will be introduced next Session. I am sure that many hon. Members present tonight will reappear then to air their views on how those powers should be exercised.

The provisions of the Bill are familiar to hon. Members. The speeches from hon. Members on both sides of the House have been largely constructive and helpful, and the Bill has undoubtedly been greatly improved by all our efforts. My hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor-General and I are grateful to the right hon. and learned Member for Aberavon (Mr. Morris), to the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown), and to all those who have played a part in tonight's debate for their assistance, and for the good will which has coloured our proceedings. I commend the Bill to the House.

9.35 pm

Mr. Nicholas Brown: In concluding my speech on Second Reading, I said that the Bill was more to be commended for effort than for achievement. The Bill is an under-achiever, and many hon. Members may eventually feel that it was not worth the effort. I have no doubt that part I will not stand the test of time. Part II timidly and cautiously introduces the new profession of the licensed conveyancer. We wish the new profession well, and believe that it will benefit the consumer. However, the question of in-house work by building societies remains unresolved.

I noticed, as did many hon. Members, that the long title of the Bill is drawn wide. At one stage I considered introducing an amendment to set a statutory retiring age for Lord Chancellors. However, I must not refer to what is not in the Bill, which is frustrating, as most matters which should be in the Bill are not.

Despite the issues that divide us, and the occasional charges of vested interest and counter-charges of ignorance, the Report stage, like the Committee stage, was reasonably good natured. In that spirit I shall draw my remarks to a close by putting in a kind word for the Attorney-General. He has had his problems in recent legal affairs debates, and the Opposition have always sought to help him constructively. Recently he had to respond to the loss of the disreputable original clause 22 from the Prosecution of Offences Bill and the equally disreputable original clause 43 from this Bill when both clauses were defeated in the other place. He had to explain why the Government retreated from their original promise to my hon. Friend the Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) on banks and building societies, and he had to defend part I of the Bill, which has been superseded by events. In Committee, he could advance only the worst of arguments to defend the present state of our defamation laws—that he could not afford to change them because of the cost. He was clearly embarrassed by the lack of coherence in the present state of law centres.

I shall now come to the good word. To all those points the Attorney-General's ultimate response was, as it had to be, "I am only the agent of the Lord Chancellor." To be fair to the Attorney-General, that is the only respectable excuse available to him.

9.38 pm

Mr. Cash: I am glad to have taken part in the proceedings, and I thank my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney-General for the courtesy that he has shown throughout. I wish the Bill well.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read the Third time and passed, with amendments.

Rates (Edinburgh)

9.39 pm

The Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. George Younger): I beg to move,

That the Rate Reduction (City of Edinburgh District) 1985-86 Report, which was laid before this House on 3rd July, be approved.

I should like to start by setting the action that we have taken against Edinburgh in the context of our policies on local authority expenditure as a whole and then set out the reasons why we have taken action against Edinburgh this year.

On any measure, local authority expenditure is a significant feature of the economy. What Scottish local authorities spend accounts for half the programme of public expenditure in Scotland for which I am responsible. In the United Kingdom as a whole, local authority expenditure accounts for a quarter of public expenditure. Given the range of services provided by local authorities, this is not surprising, but it does emphasise the fact that no Government can leave local authority expenditure out of their economic calculations. I do not think that Labour Members would disagree with that. Certainly their policies when last in office confirm that they agree with us that local authority expenditure cannot be ignored and has to be controlled in the pursuit of national economic aims.

Local authority expenditure in total is still too high. It is still above the level it was when we came to office, although I am glad that increasing numbers of authorities are now reducing their expenditure and budgeting to spend within guidelines. In 1984-85, 15 authorities budgeted to spend within guidelines. This year, the number is 30, and I hope to see continued improvements.

The problem of local authority expenditure is increasingly becoming a problem of a small group of authorities. If we look at this year's overspenders, of which there were 35, 12 were within 3 per cent. of guideline and 16 were within 6 per cent. Of the remaining seven all except one were within 8·1 per cent. of guideline. All these 34 authorities have of course suffered grant penalties but, under the new improved arrangements that we have introduced, if they bring their spending down to guideline at outturn, they will have their penalty returned. There is no reason why this money should be lost to ratepayers if authorities take action now and reduce their expenditure.

The exception to this pattern of overspending is Edinburgh district council with its massive overspend against guideline of 48 per cent. On any test this planned expenditure is excessive and unreasonable and action simply has to be taken in the interests of the city's ratepayers. However, before I turn to the details of the case against Edinburgh, I should like to trace briefly the history of the term "excessive and unreasonable" as applied to local authority expenditure and linked to the power to take selective action.

Although the origins of the power are in the local government legislation of 1929, the power to take action against an individual local authority on the grounds of excessive and unreasonable expenditure, and on which, in amended form, we are taking action against Edinburgh, is set out in the Local Government (Scotland) Act 1966. It is therefore a measure put on the statute book by Labour Members when they were in power. We have, of course, amended and improved it so that we can operate on planned expenditure and return the savings to the ratepayers. However, the basic concept of selective action is contained within legislation for which the Labour party was responsible and for which the ratepayers are, I am sure, grateful.

[Mr. George Younger]

Mr. Tom Clarke (Monklands, West): Is the right hon. Gentleman really telling the House that the guidelines had statutory backing in 1966?

Mr. Younger: No, I did not refer to guidelines. I merely pointed out that the ability to take selective action for excessive and unreasonable expenditure was proudly introduced by a Labour Government. It may be significant that the Minister who introduced that measure has since joined the Social Democratic party. I leave it to the Opposition to judge whether that has any significance.

We have initiated selective action on 14 occasions. The total of savings achieved over the years is over £80 million and there have been significant benefits to ratepayers. For instance, the rate of Lothian regional council went down by 25 per cent. over two years. It is, of course, a power to be used only when an authority is clearly planning excessive and unreasonable expenditure. Last year, no authority fell into that category. This year, one authority has stood out and I should now like to turn in detail to the reasons why I initiated action against Edinburgh and why, having considered the representations it made in response to my action, I have decided to lay this report before the House.

It is necessary only to set out the basic statistics for Edinburgh's expenditure plans for 1985-86 to make an overwhelming case for selective action. The figures speak for themselves and I shall remind the House of them. Edinburgh is planning to exceed its guideline by no less than 48 per cent. This is a massive excess and it is six times greater than the next highest excess. If all authorities had overspent by 48 per cent. local authority expenditure in Scotland would have been no less than £1,289 million higher than it is.

If I heard the hon. Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) correctly when he was speaking on the radio this morning, he made it clear that he would have nothing to do with supporting any defiance of court rulings or any contempt of court by a local authority. I hope that he will confirm that sensible and statesmanlike statement when he speaks this evening. However, he must go rather further if he is to satisfy the House of his and his party's bona fides in this matter. We require a clear statement from the hon. Gentleman whether he fully supports all the actions of the Labour administration of Edinburgh district council, including its rating plans, expenditure plans and the increase in rates which these plans involve. He owes it to the House to make it clear whether these plans have his full support in every detail.

Edinburgh's excess expenditure of 48 per cent. represents £17·2 million in cash, which is almost 20 per cent. of the total overspend of all Scottish local authorities, although at guideline level Edinburgh's expenditure accounts for only 1·2 per cent. of guideline provision. Without Edinburgh's contribution, the spending performance of Scottish local authorities would look much better.

The level of spending against guideline is not the only test, and on every other way of considering the figures Edinburgh stands out from all other authorities. Its planned level of spending per head is, at £114, the highest of any district council, and almost double the district average of £62. It is well above the average of comparator authorities and above each comparator individually.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that there are other ways of judging an overspend of £17·2 million? That sum is a quarter of that which was ladled out to Johnson Matthey Bankers and the cost of five days on the Falklands.

Mr. Younger: Yes. It is probably a much smaller sum and a much smaller percentage if it is compared with all that we spend on the Health Service or the education service in Scotland. It can be compared with anything one chooses. Surely it is fair to compare Edinburgh with its nearest comparator authorities and other local authorities generally. I have no doubt that it is difficult to run a local authority but it is the easiest matter in the world to run one if no attention is paid to the amount of money required to do it. The skill is in matching resources to requirements and it is that which we are criticising this evening.

The level of growth planned at a time when we are asking authorities to reduce their spending is staggering. Edinburgh is planning to spend in real terms—that is, making full allowance for inflation—33 per cent. more than it spent last year. The comparable figure for districts as a whole is 1·8 per cent. Compared with what the council was spending in 1978-79, it is now planning to spend 68 per cent. more in real terms after fully allowing for inflation. The comparable figure for districts as a whole is 8·3 per cent.

Thus, on any test, Edinburgh is planning expenditure which is excessive and unreasonable. The cost of that to the ratepayes is heavy, and it is their interests which selective action is designed to protect. When I initiated selective action, I therefore proposed a reduction in the rate of 5·2p to reduce Edinburgh's excessive expenditure and return the savings to the ratepayers in the form of reduced rates. A 5·2p rate reduction, if translated into expenditure savings, would reduce Edinburgh's expenditure by £16·145 million. That would still leave it £1 million above its guideline. That is a 3 per cent. excess compared with the average for all other districts of 2·7 per cent. Thus, in my proposals I am not even expecting Edinburgh to come down to its guideline or even the average excess over that guideline of other authorities. After making such a reduction, its expenditure per head would, at £79, still be above the district average of £62 and the average for its comparators. It would still be above all the comparators individually except one, and above all the cities except Glasgow, which has special expenditure needs. The level of spending after selective action would still be 16 per cent. in real terms above what the council was spending in 1978-79, and that is double the district average. Thus, I do not believe that, in proposing a rate reduction of 5·2p, I am asking Edinburgh to do the impossible when one sees what authorities as a whole, and comparable authorities, are doing.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce (Gordon): Does the Secretary of State accept that, while what he says is true in respect of a complete financial year, by imposing this cut halfway through the financial year he is requiring a cut of about 50 per cent.? That will have a chaotic effect on the city's administration.

Mr. Younger: The hon. Gentleman is correct. I shall be covering that point in a few moments. I hope that I am not to take it from his intervention that he supports what Edinburgh is doing. I should have expected him and his party to support this measure.

Mr. Bruce indicated dissent.

Mr. Younger: I hope that we shall be told whether the Liberal and the Social Democratic parties support Edinburgh. We are entitled to know.

I invited Edinburgh to submit representations on my proposal and I have studied the full comments which it sent me. I, together with my hon. Friend the Minister responsible for home affairs and the environment, met representatives of the council when they expanded on those representations. The council's representations and a note of our meeting are included in the report which I have laid before the House. However, I am bound to say that nothing said in the representations or at our meeting leads me to change my view that the council is planning excessive and unreasonable expenditure, or that it is unreasonable for it to be asked to cut its expenditure by the equivalent of a 5·2p rate.

The representations of the district council contain a vast amount of detail about services. The implication seems to be that any reduction in the level of services that it has in mind is unacceptable. For the reasons I have given, however, I believe that the expenditure consequences of what Edinburgh proposes are quite unreasonable, and must be reduced. I note that Edinburgh is not arguing that any lesser reduction in its plans would be preferable.

I shall comment on some of the general points which Edinburgh makes. First, it is much concerned that the overall effect of the two statutory steps that I have taken against it—the order which is before us today and my order requiring a reduction in its rate fund contribution to the housing revenue account—is to point to a level of expenditure implied in the budget proposed by the local Conservative group. It suggests that my proposals therefore flout the views of the local electorate. But I stress to the House that that line of thought is not relevant to the order before us, which, as I shall explain, is very generous to Edinburgh. The coincidence, to which the district council's line of criticism relates, does not occur unless one also takes into account my housing order. The reasonableness of that order by itself has, of course, been upheld in the courts.

The whole argument about the coincidence is in fact wrong-headed. My decision to look for a reduction of 5·2p was based on the considerations I have mentioned, including consideration of the average excess over guideline of all districts, a figure which would not be known to the Edinburgh Conservative group. Of course, my action on the rate fund contribution, including the precise amount in rate poundage terms of the reduction I required, was initiated before the local Conservative group was even involved in budget-setting at all.

Secondly, the council is critical of the guidelines against which its expenditure has been judged. Those guidelines are based on client group assessments built up service by service on the basis of discussions with the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities. The assessments are, of course, not perfect and are being refined in consultation with the convention. However, Edinburgh is not being expected to budget at its client group assessment. Many hon. Members might wish that their local authorities were similarly treated. Its guideline is fixed at 7·7 per cent. above it in recognition of its 1984-85 expenditure level and to give it a realistic target. Its 1985-86 guideline was described recently by an independent academic commentator as "generous", and is 11 per cent. more in cash than last year—an increase well above the rate of inflation, which again many other authorities in Scotland would be glad to have.

Thirdly, Edinburgh complained of the other authorities with which it had been compared. Those were chosen on the same basic method as we used to choose comparators in 1982-83 and 1983-84 as authorities whose expenditure need was most like that of Edinburgh, taking account of factors that have been found to affect expenditure. In its representations, Edinburgh compares itself with the other three cities. However, even on that basis, Edinburgh is still well out of line. It is planning to spend £114 per head. That is 34 per cent. more than the average of the three cities, which is £85 per head. It is also planning to spend more than each of the other cities individually.

We are now asking Edinburgh to bring its spending down not to guideline but to about 3 per cent. above it. In terms of last year's budget, that is about 3·5 per cent. less in real terms than the planned level of spending for 1984-85. Thus, it cannot be said that we are proposing huge reductions in basic services. If such massive reductions happen, it will be because of the course followed by the council of ignoring all the signs and pressing on with spending plans well above that level until it has no choice but to look for major economies in existing services.

However, behind all those figures are the ratepayers. Edinburgh's rate for 1985-86 is 22·7p. If it had budgeted to spend at guideline and in line with its rate fund contribution limit, that figure would have been cut by a third. That is a measure of the cost of Edinburgh's plans to its own ratepayers. What is more serious, perhaps, is the effect that Edinburgh council's activities have on the businesses is the city and those considering expanding or coming into the city to create jobs. Rates push up business costs and force businesses to look at ways of cutting down on staff. High rates discourage firms considering setting up in Edinburgh when they know that one of their main costs is in the hands of an unpredictable high-spending council.

At present, on the information available to us, Edinburgh is spending regardless of the action which has been taken against it and building up its expenditure to ever higher levels. I should like to take this opportunity to give Edinburgh a serious warning about the dangers of the course it is following. The longer Edinburgh takes to recognise the consequences of the action being taken against it and start reducing its expenditure, the harder it will be for that city.

Every month's delay, indeed every week's delay, means progressively sharper cuts when cuts eventually are made, as they will have to be. The longer the decision to cut is put off and the longer the build-up of unnecessary expenditure, the smaller will be the number of months available over which the required savings will have to be made. It is clear that, even if Edinburgh takes action at the end of July, it will still have to spend at a level of 4 per cent. below its guideline for the remainder of the year if it is to keep within the expenditure level implied by the rate reduction I propose.

If Edinburgh delays that decision for another month until the end of August, it will have to spend 10 per cent. below guideline for the rest of the year. Another month's delay would make the situation even worse, as it spends inthe first half of the year the money that is meant to last the whole year. That raises the prospect of Edinburgh being unable to provide proper services and inflicting damage on the city and on its own employees. Defiance and delay will only damage the citizens of Edinburgh and the employees of the council in a way which could do lasting harm to Scotland's capital city.

The figures I have quoted make it abundantly clear that Edinburgh is planning excessive and unreasonable expenditure. The consequences of that for ratepayers are serious, and what I propose in this report by way of a rate reduction of 5·2 p will provide welcome relief to them. I am not asking the council to make unreasonable reductions, only to come down to a reasonable and still above-average level of spending.

This debate is not about a complaint by me or my hon. Friends that Edinburgh is spending more than last year or that it is spending more than we think it ought to. Edinburgh is entitled to do that if it wishes to do so. The debate is about a level of spending which is so extreme, unreasonable and excessive that by any level of calculation something must be done about it. I hope we shall get a clear statement from the hon. Member for Garscadden not only that he deplores any attempt to defy the law, but that he does not support this extreme level of overspending. I hope that we shall have a clear statement from the Liberal party and, if possible from the Social Democratic party about their position; and whether or not they support the interests of the ratepayers of Edinburgh. If ever an argument was put before the House for excessive and unreasonable expenditure requiring action to be taken, it is before us this evening, and I ask the House to support the order.

10.4 pm

Mr. Donald Dewar (Glasgow, Garscadden): I regret that we are having this debate at a rather late hour, crushed into a slot at the fag end of the day. However, it has its consolations. I particularly welcome the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office, the hon. Member for Edinburgh, Pentlands (Mr. Rifkind), who has made an unexpected appearance in Scottish affairs. I suspect that he is practising. We shall watch developments with interest. We are facing a confusing situation, and that applies in particular to Edinburgh district council. This order is the result of a quite extraordinary exercise in misplaced ingenuity. It is part of what may be described as an obsessive campaign. Sometimes one tends to forget that because of the milk and water and rather limp style of the Secretary of State and the matter of fact way in which he performs at the Dispatch Box. But there is a ferocity of purpose, and we have seen what can fairly be described as a vendetta not just against Edinburgh but against local government in Scotland.

A battery of assault weapons has been deployed. They came creaking forward and were laboriously manoeuvred into position over a number of parliamentary Sessions. Now they are in place and the Government intend to use them to try to bombard and destroy the budget of Edinburgh district council.

First, the rate fund contribution limitation order asks that £5·8 million be taken out of the rate fund contribution. It sounds a formidable excess, but, of course, it is an excess over a limit which was chosen arbitrarily by the Secretary of State. It is simply an effort to ensure that, in a city where rents are already considerably above the Scottish average, they are forced even higher. It is extraordinary brass neck for the Secretary of State to say, "It is all right, because the courts have said that my order is reasonable." What the courts said was that Parliament for good or ill has pronounced and they could do nothing about it. His statement that that is an argument in favour of what he is doing shows the complete poverty of his case. It is monstrous that, as a friendly interim gesture, the Secretary of State has clawed that £5·8 million out of the capital fund for housing. I hope that that will be repaid if and when the rate fund contribution target is met.

Secondly, the general abatement represents a penalty of £9,455,000, which neatly excises Edinburgh's entire rate support grant for 1985-86. One problem is that about £2 million has already been paid. During Scottish Question Time recently, the Secretary of State said that he is pondering how to get the money back. I do not know whether he has reached a conclusion, but I hope that he has more constructive and important matters about which to worry than that.

If the Government force through this order tonight, the £16·3 million that will be clawed back will, in any event, largely eliminate the general abatement. It will be reduced from £9·5 million to about £1 million.

That underlines the fact that this is a nasty and remarkable case of overkill, because, in addition to the two matters to which I referred, we have the section 5 clawback, which is embodied in this order, of £16·3 million or the equivalent of 5·2p on the rates. The position is remarkably confusing, and it has not been helped by the Secretary of State's speech. He seems to work on the assumption that, since he is right and everyone else is wrong, he need not produce an argument or an intelligent case in support of the order.

The product of the Government's proposal is clear. If we combine the rate fund contribution order and the order that we are discussing tonight, Edinburgh is being asked to make cuts of about £23 million well into the financial year. Whatever else we may disagree about, it is clear that that will be a painful and damaging process. I hope that Ministers recognise that.

The Secretary of State tried to justify his position with a flurry of figures. He paraded his disapproval in his usual prim fashion, as though he was discussing some unacceptable conduct with a member of his family. But the position is much more serious than that, and the case that he has made, even on his figures, is nothing like as conclusive as he wishes us to believe. The tragedy is that, in the eyes of the Under-Secretary of State—the hon. Member for Edinburgh, South (Mr. Ancram)—and his colleagues, we have almost reached the point at which every job that is created in local government is a sin, every facility that is opened is an offence and every additional collection or service is an indiscretion. That is not a sensible conclusion.

The comparisons that have been used in Edinburgh's case are bizarre. Kyle and Carrick and Edinburgh have something in common — they are in Scotland — but beyond that it is difficult to understand why they have been linked. Many of the figures quoted by the Secretary of State sound massive in percentage terms, but we should remember that Edinburgh started from the low base inherited from the previous authority. If we consider the figures for 1983-84 for expenditure per head and employees per 1,000 of the population, we see that Edinburgh started from a low base compared with other Scottish cities.

Of course, Edinburgh has set out to try to improve services. It had a mandate to do so. There was no dishonesty or deceit. In the election campaign, the Conservative group consistently campaigned on what it described as the irresponsibility of the Labour programme, but the people of Edinburgh voted for it. There is no doubt that the district council has a mandate to which it is entitled.

Mr. Younger: Can the hon. Gentleman refer to any pre-election programme put out by the Labour party which said that rates would be going up by 79 per cent.?

Mr. Dewar: The Labour group fought an honest campaign in which it stated its plans for services. Indeed, if the right hon. Gentleman is saying to me that people in Edinburgh were not aware of the consequences of voting Labour, then he is passing an enourmous vote of no confidence in the political efforts of his own party.

Mr. Michael Hirst (Strathkelvin and Bearsden): Is the hon. Gentleman prepared to do what the leader of his party is not prepared to do—support the gross overspending of Edinburgh district council? Will he stop equivocating and give the House a straight answer yes or no?

Mr. Dewar: The hon. Gentleman will have to wait until I have completed my speech. If I may say so, every month he sounds increasingly more pompous. He will have to watch that.

This should be taken as a serious debate. One matter that Conservative Members should consider is the criteria that ought to apply. We are certainly not being invited to set ourselves up as a surrogate district council. We should not be asked to vote on the basis of whether we would have introduced such a budget. That is not the test that should be applied on this occasion.

If we consider the figures per head for cleansing services, environmental health, leisure and recreation or libraries and museums—we can give the figures if hon. Members want them—and compare them with those of other cities, in some areas Edinburgh is spending more and in others less, but ultimately it is not a gap which any reasonable man, in my view, would say justifies the extraordinary action that we are being invited to take in terms of the excessive and unreasonable expenditure contained in the order.

I do not believe there is anything inherently wicked in decent, humane services. It may be that the electorate of Edinburgh would want to vote to cut services and to have lower rates. On this occasion, the electorate voted to increase services. I do not believe that it is the job of Parliament to prevent the Edinburgh district council from carrying out that mandate and answering ultimately for what it does at the ballot box. That is the nature of local government. Except in the most extraordinary circumstances, we should not interfere. I do not believe that we have reached that point.

The recreation budget, for example, is £21·2 million. If the Secretary of State has his way, that will be cut to £13·2 million. It is not just a matter of forgoing over £3 million of growth—perhaps the Tories would say that there should be no growth in difficult times — it is finding where to make cuts of over £3 million, which will hurt. I do not believe that it is the business of the House to interfere in that way.

We could have endless arguments about the figures, but this goes beyond one budget. I believe that the machinery being used is fundamentally wrong. We are discussing a matter of principle. As we have said, the essence of local democracy is that directly elected councillors exercise their judgment, try to meet the needs of their areas and make a count at the end of the day. We are being invited to contemplate a system whereby periodically the Secretary of State imposes a form of direct rule because he disapproves of the policy of the council. I believe that there is sometimes merit in a pluralist society in having centres of power which compete. I do not believe in this kind of bully boy tactic and riding roughshod over local democracy in Scotland.

This is not a necessary exercise. It is said that it must be done to control public expenditure. In a strange way, Edinburgh has been rejected by the public purse. It has been hived off. In 1980, Edinburgh had a housng support grant of £12 million. It is now nothing, and this year there will be no rate support grant. It will be a city supported by rents, rates and charges. It will be a vision — the ultimate privatisation, in a sense, for the Adam Smith Society—if the Government have their way.

It is a crazy form of economics to say to the city of Edinburgh, "Forgo £23 million of services to get £9 million of rate support grant." That is a thieves' bargain. It is a land of make believe into which the Secretary of State has stumbled.

As I have said before — I repeat it so that the Secretary of State may understand it—my hon. Friends and I did not seek this confrontation. It has been a potential confrontation; but it is now an immediate crisis. It is a travesty for the Secretary of State to give the impression that the district council has been inflexible, unreasonable and absolutist.

Mr. Michael Forsyth (Stirling): rose——

Mr. Dewar: I shall give way to the hon. Gentleman, if he wishes to challenge me, when I have developed the point.

Even those who disagree with Edinburgh district council have been aware from the beginning, and have said repeatedly in public statements, that the council's budget is not sacrosanct and that they are prepared to discuss the matter and to negotiate. The last-ditcher, the person who has not been prepared to give an inch and who has seen settlement in terms of capitulation, has been the Secretary of State, and he knows it. He has been saying, in effect, that the only basis on which to achieve a settlement is to ask this directly elected council to accept the budget of the discredited and defeated Tory group. That is inflexibility taken to the point of obstinacy in a way that we should not tolerate.

Mr. Bruce: Is the hon. Gentleman suggesting that the members of the Labour administration in Edinburgh have not proceeded with their budget, knowing that the amount was likely to be cut and that they would suffer penalties? In those circumstances, can he justify why yesterday they voted to add another £400,000 to the budget, knowing that this measure would be presented today?

Mr. Dewar: I am sure that during the debate the hon. Gentleman will perform the splits in the way that he usually does on issues such as this. The district council said that it would compromise and go to the negotiating table. The Secretary of State said that the only form of settlement was unconditional surrender. None of us can accept that.

For the Secretary of State to say that he is doing it in the names of the ratepayers, when the principal cause of discontent on the part of ratepayers has been the persistent cuts in rate support grant by the right hon. Gentleman, represents confounded brassneck on his part. He is doing it not for the ratepayers but for the Treasury. He knows that, and so does everybody else.

In the polls the right hon. Gentleman has the support of 15 per cent. of the people of Scotland. In May 1984 he led his party to unprecedented defeat in the district council elections and lost control of Edinburgh. He now purports to act as though that defeat never took place. The local authorities in Scotland have every right to fight by every legitimate means available to them. They have the backing of public opinion and it is clear what would happen if there were by-elections in Edinburgh—[Interruption.] Would the hon. Member for Edinburgh, South welcome a by-election in his constituency? He would get the result that his record deserves—summary execution—and the same would apply to the rest of the Tories.

There is a total lack of credibility about the Government's position, and they know it. I imagine that most Conservative Back Benchers — this is the achievement of the Secretary of State from the point of view of his party—have ringed April 1988 as the date that they want for the next general election, on the principle that they should put off the evil day for as long as possible.

The real problem is how to find a solution to the difficulty, and we should at least turn our minds to that. I regret that this matter has ended up in the courts. There is now an order for specific performance from the Court of Session. I understand the temptation to defy that, but it is a temptation that should be resisted. The court order should be observed. I have no doubt about that, speaking for myself. We are the parliamentary Labour party, and we believe in the democratic process. We have a right to argue and to continue to argue, but the order is there and it would not be sensible to make the central issue—apart from the point of principle—the authority of the courts. The central issue, which the Secretary of State should not escape, is what he has been doing to the services and to the local democratic processes in Scotland.

Mr. Younger: It may have been a slip of the tongue, but when the hon. Gentleman said that he was repudiating what had been done, he said that he was speaking for himself. Will he make it clear that he is speaking for his colleagues in deploring what has happened?

Mr. Dewar: I am speaking from the Dispatch Box. I make it clear that while I regret that the Secretary of State has forced us into this position, the court order should be observed. There is no dubiety about that. That is no victory for the right hon. Gentleman. There is no credit to a bully for his actions.

It is not for me to try to save the Secretary of State from his prejudices and folly. I hope that he remembers what happened in 1980-81, when Lothian was in hot water with the Scottish Office. A similar order was introduced under section 5 of the Local Government (Scotland) Act 1966 to drop £47 million from Lothian region. It was bulldozed through the House, as this one will be. However, having worked out his aggression and gone through his ritual war dance, the Secretary of State then had to face his responsibilities. He realised that he could not expect Lothian region to make such big cuts, so he settled for £30 million. He forwent £17 million of that penalty.

In the cold light of day, when he comes to look at what he is doing and the realities of the situation, the Secretary of State will realise that he has set an unreasonable target and he will have to forgo some of the penalty that he is trying to exact. He should forgo all of it. That is why we shall vote againt the measure. It is wrong in principle.

Even allowing for the fact that the Secretary of State takes a different view, he will have to go back to the negotiating table and make the concessions that, if he had made them several months ago, would have prevented this crisis. That is a fair summary of the position. The right hon. Gentleman should think long and hard, because he is doing a great deal of damage to the structure of government. His course of action is counterproductive and he should desist from it.

Behind the Secretary of State there is a great deal of private dismay and in the country there is a good deal of public dissension among Tory local government representatives. That is reflected in the polls and in recent local government by-election results in Scotland. I have no doubt that the right hon. Gentleman will win the vote tonight. I am a realist about that. However, it will be a pyrrhic victory, and the real victims will be not only many of his hon. Friends when they have to face the electorate but, more seriously, local government in Scotland and its services, which are as important in Edinburgh as in every other part of Scotland.

I know that the Secretary of State will not retreat now. However, he is committed to a harsh vendetta of which he will repent, unless he is prepared to rethink his position and take account of the realities of Edinburgh district council's position and the interests of public opinion in Edinburgh and throughout Scotland.

Rates (Edinburgh)

Lord James Douglas Hamilton (Edinburgh, West): As always, I listened with the greatest interest to the hon. Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar), but his support for the Labour group on Edinburgh district council was the most lukewarm that I have ever heard from a shadow Secretary of State for Scotland.

On 22 May my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State initiated action and asked Edinburgh district council to reduce its rate. He was absolutely justified to take that action to protect ratepayers. The council was given three weeks in which to comment and, as it has failed voluntarily to reduce its rate, it has become necessary to lay this report.

I remind the hon. Member for Garscadden that the precedents were laid down by Labour Governments. Section 5(b) of Labour's Local Government (Scotland) Act 1966 provides that, if the Secretary of State is satisfied that "the expenditure of any local authority or joint board has been excessive and unreasonable, regard being had to the financial and other relevent circumstances of the area or areas concerned . . . the Secretary of State may reduce the element of the grant accordingly."

The principle of the Government having predominance in local authority matters was accepted by Lord Ross of Marnock, as he now is, when he was Labour Secretary of State of Scotland. On 15 December 1975 he said:

"restraint on spending by local authorities in the years ahead has to be of a stringency hitherto unheard of, certainly in recent times. That is necessary in the interests both of Government and of ratepayers. We have to try to keep down the level of expenditure and the level of the rates."—[Official Report, 15 December 1975; Vol. 902, c. 1100.]

Besides, local authorities owe their existence to the Local Government (Scotland) Act 1973. In the last resort, Parliament, acting in the interests of the nation, is entitled to take the grievances of ratepayers into account.

Edinburgh's budget is 48·3 per cent. in excess of my right hon. Friend's guidelines and well above the district average of 2·7 per cent. At £114·40 per head, planned expenditure is well above the average of £62·71 for all district councils. The report will reduce the average domestic rate of £494·84 by about £39.

There is evidence of substantial overspending by Edinburgh district council. It has established a women's committee at a cost of £150,000, in the interests of the promotion of women. I suggest that my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has done far more, by becoming the first woman Prime Minister, to advance and promote the interests of women than has that committee.

There have been leaflets, posters, car stickers and window bills at a cost of more than £42,000, which I consider to be Labour party propaganda and unnecessary. They have been paid for, not out of Labour party funds, but by Edinburgh district council. Moreover, three advertisements by Edinburgh district council in the local Evening News cost no less than £10,000. If Edinburgh district council is so confident about its policy of improving services why does it have to spend countless sums of money propagandising the electorate and advertising all over the city?

Mr. Dave Nellist (Coventry, South-East): The hon. Gentleman is talking about propagandising and advertising. Would he care to reveal how many millions, if not hundreds of millions, were spent on advertising and propagandising the privatisation of British Telecom by the Government whom the hon. Gentleman supports?

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I should like to check, but I think the hon. Gentleman will find that the funds were provided by British Telecom. The hon. Gentleman will also find that the programme has been enormously successful in giving a great many working men a stake in the industry in which they work.

Recent accounts provided by the finance department show that Edinburgh district council intends to spend £52,000 on policy promotion.

I should like to give another example. Banners are flying outside the city chambers, the Usher hall, the Assembly rooms, the Meadowbank stadium and elsewhere which cost more than £6,000. The flaunting of the red flag over the city chambers was unimportant in itself, but it was symbolic of something much deeper.

Mr. Hirst: Does my hon. Friend agree that many of the actions of the Edinburgh district council were taken in the face of advice by the chief executive, and that Edinburgh district council had no interest in setting a reasonable budget but was determined to have a head-on confrontation with the Government?

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The officials of the Edinburgh district council are very worried that their salaries may not be paid. If this kind of activity continues indefinitely. It was noticeable that the hon. Member for Garscadden did not support to the hilt the Labour party on Edinburgh district council, because he knows that it is grossly overspending.

I shall give another example of unwise spending namely, that of £10,000 having been spent on T-shirts. Most of my constituents who buy T-shirts do not think automatically of Edinburgh district council as the best source for their production. Furthermore, the 5,000 T-shirts which have been produced were to be sold for £2 each, but rumour has it hat they are not sufficiently popular and that some will have to be sold for £1·50.

Another example is the expenditure of £35,000 during the miners' strike, including £2,000 for a city arts centre exhibition. This sum had, I understand, been set aside for the families of miners. Whether or not it should have been spent for this purpose has been the subject of substantial political debate. I want to raise only one point, which was mentioned in The Scotsman on 19 November 1984 in an article on Bilston Glen:

"many men make accusations about money and food parcels reaching only pickets, not the majority of strikers."

Mr. Norman Buchan (Paisley, South) rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): Order. We cannot have two hon. Members on their feet at the same time.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The allegation which I have quoted comes from The Scotsman in an article about Bilston Glen. I want to make absolutely clear what its source is, and I repeat the allegations made in the article: "many men make accusations about money and food parcels reaching only pickets, not the majority of strikers." If the £35,000 did not reach the miners' families, but went only to pickets, there would be grounds for very substantial complaint by the ratepayers. If money was voted for the families of miners and then was given merely to pickets, it would be entirely unjustified.

Mr. Tom Clarke rose——

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I shall give one reason before I give way to the hon. Gentleman.

> "Picketing . . . became a means of coercion, a substitute, an alternative for winning minds. The moral ascendency, by which I mean that overwhelming sense of decency and fair play, which should characterise all struggles of the workers, was abandoned right from the start."

Those are not my words, but those of a distinguished socialist, Mr. Jimmy Reid.

Mr. Tom Clarke: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that the hon Member for Strathkelvin and Bearsden (Mr. Hirst) met the district council at Strathkelvin and sympathised with it, because, he said, the districts were dealt with more harshly than the regions?

Did the hon. Member for Edinburgh, West (Lord James Douglas-Hamilton) meet Edinburgh district council to hear its views on these matters? Is he willing to emulate his hon. Friend the Member for Strathkelvin and Beardsden and promise to fight for Edinburgh district council and against deprivation in Edinburgh?

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I have met members of the Edinburgh district council and have corresponded with them. The circumstances of Strathkelvin and Edinburgh district councils are entirely different. I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Strathkelvin and Bearsden (Mr. Hirst) that there is a case for fundamental reform of the rating system.

Questions have been raised by my constituents about whether the £35,000 reached those for whom it was intended. I am entitled to ask what accounts were kept, which families received money and what receipts there were. Those facts have never been put before the electorate of Edinburgh. It is in the public interest that the electors should know.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Will my hon. Friend accept that the corruption by the district council in this matter goes further? It was not even representing the interests of its own electors. The vast majority of miners in the council's areas were working during the strike. The council was supporting a minority of the miners in its area.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: It would be useful to have full information about exactly where those funds went. The electorate likes to know that funds go to those for whom they are intended.

It is in character that the Labour group on Edinburgh district council should be financially supporting "the Chilean Democratico." The sum involved is £2,855, including a grant of £1,000 for a Chilean group and a charge of £300 for a public meeting. I suggest that Chilean politicking is not in the interests of my constituents.

Mr. Dewar: Will the hon. Gentleman accept that he is doing his case no good? Those of us on both sides of the argument who are interested in the serious constitutional innovation which the use of the order represents will be saddened by the trivia with which the hon. Gentleman insists on defacing the debate.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: As the hon. Gentleman failed to tell us whether he supports the budget of the Labour group on Edinburgh district council, I discount his intervention.

The council's accounts include £4,500 which, it is believed, went to an organisation called LOSS. The electors may take the view that it is a case of one dead loss supporting another.

There is a more fundamental reason for supporting the report than all those that I have given. When Lothian region put up rates substantially some years ago, a forest of "For sale" signs went up in shops in Princes street and George street. It is essential for Edinburgh's retail trade —the small shopkeepers and business men—to have reasonable rates. It is vital for Edinburgh's capacity to attract business.

I am particularly anxious about the financial sector—banking, accounting and insurance. Edinburgh is about to promote itself in the European Community and in the United States. The financial sector in Scotland employs about 100,000 people and is a growth sector. I believe that it will provide more jobs. That can be arranged only by a helpful attitude from both central and local government, and heavy rates show an unhelpful attitude towards business.

Similarly, tourism is a major employer. Edinburgh needs new facilities from the private sector, including a conference centre, another big hotel and a major leisure centre. That will require private investment, and the Secretary of State's actions are necessary to prevent investors from being irrevocably frightened away. The visual signs of alarm are now in abeyance because investors believe that the Secretary of State will go through with the report tonight with the necessary support.

Mr. Hirst rose——

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Perhaps my hon. Friend will have a chance to speak later. I should make progress and give other hon. Members a chance to speak.

It is also necessary to build on the expertise in technology within the universities. We need more high technology companies in Edinburgh, which will have to work closely with the universities. Developments along those lines will lead to more employment in service industries. Incomers are frightened away by both high rates and a negative attitude to business. The chamber of commerce believes that Edinburgh should have better services, and the way to achieve that is to expand the economic base of the Edinburgh community so that its income is higher and the city can afford better services. The way to do that is to create more jobs in the private sector. Business men in the private sector require confidence, which is partly determined by the attitudes of local government, and greatly by those of central Government.

Finally, if the Edinburgh district council Labour group chooses to defy Parliament's decision, it will become increasingly hard within a limited period to effect the necessary economies. The Labour group must understand that it can no more overturn the democratic decisions of this House than a community council can overturn those of the Edinburgh district council. Many have sought to defy Parliament in the past, but Parliament has always won in the end.

Mr. Gavin Strang (Edinburgh, East): On 14 May 1984 a report in the Edinburgh Evening News was headlined "Squalid Horror". A family had taken Edinburgh district council to court because of its living conditions, and it won its case. The sheriff said:

"I can say at once, that the evidence which I heard satisfied me beyond all doubt that the conditions in which they had latterly had to live were utterly appalling . . . It is difficult to find words to describe the squalid horror which was to be seen when the court had a view of this house."

The debate tonight is about that squalor. The cut in the general services order will make it much more difficult to meet housing needs, as the Under-Secretary of State knows full well.

The Secretary of State made great play of what he called excessive and unreasonable expenditure. He based his judgment almost entirely on the guidelines. What about the guidelines? They were changed. The idea was that the client group approach was more objective and independent, but it is not. In the letter sent to Edinburgh district council on 22 May, appendix A states:

"Up until 1981-82, guidelines were largely based on historical patterns of expenditure but since 1982-83 they have been based on the client group assessments of the relative expenditure needs of local authorities . . . Adjustments have been made to the client group assessments to arrive at guidelines for each year. While the adjustments have varied from year to year the aim throughout has been to provide attainable targets for authorities having regard to previous levels of expenditure."

That is the reality. If the Tory Government's 1983-84 Budget had been within the guidelines—it was not—this year's guideline for Edinburgh would have been £2 million less. When we discuss guidelines, we talk about the disastrous neglect of housing and services in Edinburgh, which has been the consequence of years of inadequate expenditure.

I am aware that others wish to contribute to the debate, so I shall eschew quoting some of the figures which I had intended to draw to the attention of the House. It is ridiculous for the Secretary of State to talk about Falkirk, Kirkcaldy, Aberdeen, Kyle and Carrick and Renfrew as comparable authorities. It is nonsense to refer to guidelines and objectivity when talking about a previous year's expenditure. It is grotesque to pay civil servants to produce such nonsense when the authorities have been specially selected to make out the Secretary of State's case.

If we are to make comparisons with other authorities, let us compare the four cities. I have with me the expenditure on general recreation for the four cities from 1976-77 to 1983-84. There are 32 figures, as there are four cities and eight years. Edinburgh was the lowest spender each year on general recreation. I remind the House that Edinburgh has to put on the Commonwealth games and that it has the Meadowbank Stadium and Commonwealth swimming pool. These major sporting facilities are for Scotland and not just Edinburgh but we are expected to spend less each year on recreation, and sometimes much less, than the other cities per head of population.

The same is true of libraries and museums. Again I have 32 figures in front of me for the years of Tory administrations. What has the abysmal expenditure in Edinburgh meant? Instead of opening new facilities—for example, providing new bowling greens and tennis courts — the old facilities have been shut. Bowling greens are very important to my constituents fifteen tennis courts have been closed in the past 10 years and four have been privatised. Fourteen bowling greens have been closed during the 10 years of Tory control.

Edinburgh has some of the worst housing conditions in Scotland. They are disgraceful. Our services have been run down. The response of people of Edinburgh was to elect a Labour council. Labour has been the largest party in Edinburgh before, but this is the first time that the city hs had a majority Labour council.

Contrary to the Secretary of State's impression—I can remember this vividly listening to the Leader of the Labour group on local radio—the Labour party spelled out that the election of a Labour council would mean rates increases. It was made clear that extra money could be found only by forcing up the rates. Rating was an issue during the election campaign and the issue was put to the people fairly and squarely. What has been the response?

Mr. Hirst rose——

Mr. Strang: I shall not give way, as I am aware that others want to participate in the debate. The Labour party was elected in Edinburgh on the clear mandate of reversing the appalling neglect and misery that was the legacy of Conservative administrations. The people wanted the council to start re-opening bowling greens and tennis courts instead of closing them, and to raise standards in the area.

The Government's response was to impose on the elected council of Edinburgh a budget which was defeated by the council on 5 March. The minority Tory budget was defeated by 40 votes to 22. As the Secretary of State knows, the proposed cut is identical to 0·1 of a penny. The cuts in the housing revenue budget and the associated rate cut and the cut in the general service rate would have reduced the rate from 22·7p to 15·7p which was the precise figure submitted by the Tories.

Mr. Robert Hughes (Aberdeen, North): Which parties voted to defeat that district council budget?

Mr. Strang: A Scottish Nationalist party representative and an alliance representative certainly voted in that way. It is a constitutional outrage to impose that defeated Tory budget on the Edinburgh people. These cuts are massive. This measure is much more drastic than that faced by Lothian. It is true that Lothian regional council said that it would have to make massive lay-offs, and that it managed to avoid doing that. If the Government do not realise that this measure is much more severe than that, they should talk to Edinburgh district council officials. I hope that the Government will recognise the enormity of what they are trying to impose on the Edinburgh people.

The Secretary of State said, in a curious remark, that Edinburgh district council had not suggested in its submissions that a lower level of expenditure would be acceptable. The right hon. Gentleman implied that the council was not prepared to settle on a figure between the minimal Tory figure and the figure outlined in the budget. Every hon. Member knows that that is not true. The leadership of the council asked the Secretary of State for a meeting, and got it. The Government's position was in black and white—an order was laid in the House—and it was clear that they were not prepared to discuss the position with Edinburgh district council in a reasonable way. The Government were satisfied that they would force the minority Tory party's budget on the Edinburgh people.

[Mr. Strang]

This report is about democracy and a constitutional outrage, but it is also about the quality of life. I have had the privilege to represent an Edinburgh constituency for more than 15 years. some of the poorest parts of the city lie within my constituency, and Ministers know that. During the past five years I have seen the decline in housing and the people who once had a chance of getting a house, but now have no chance. I have seen the squalor of parts of the city. The majority of young people leave school with no prospect of getting a job. Facilities have been closed and football pitches and bowling greens have been shut. The Labour council wants people to be able to get work. It wants to give them hope and and to start to reverse the decline in housing decline.

We want to improve the houses, to open the bowling greens and to improve facilities. The Government want to force up charges, we want to let the people use the facilities. The Tories forced up prices at the Jack Kene centre in Craigmillar so high that the people could not afford to use the centre. We cut the charges, and the people are starting to use it. This is what the debate is about—an Edinburgh Labour council trying to help the people confronted by the new hard Right, the authoritarian Right-wing Tory Government. That is why, at the end of the day, the Government will lose, no matter how the House votes tonight.

Mr. Nicholas Fairbairn (Perth and Kinross): I am pleased to follow two Edinburgh Members — my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, West (Lord James Douglas-Hamilton) and the hon. Member for Edinburgh, East (Mr. Strang) — and to give a slightly less introverted view of the position in Edinburgh.

Mr. Nellist: They would never call the hon. and learned Gentleman "introverted" in those trousers.

Mr. Fairbairn: I do not know whether the hard Left understand what tartan is all about. I doubt that it does. If those hon. Members understood the kinship and civility that it represents, they would not sit there as a sort of shadow of eagles above the shadow Secretary of State for Scotland who did not dare state his true opinion and clung to the Dispatch Box as his only friend.

The hon. Member for Edinburgh, East started with a piece of sentimentality about a story in the Edinburgh Evening News. I notice that Opposition Members believe the reports in the Evening News, but they mocked the reports that my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, West quoted from The Scotsman. They believe what they want to believe.

Similar absurd sentimentality was directed towards me when I stood for Edinburgh, Central. False stories of squalor were spread. If the hon. Member for Edinburgh, East wants to see squalor and humility, he should come to the country. He will see the services provided for those who live in the country, but they do not complain because they are not manipulated by politicians.

I have great respect for the hon. Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar), the shadow Secretary of State for Scotland. Tonight he was not the shadow Secretary of State for Scotland; he was the shadow of the shadow Secretary of State for Scotland. Only a lawyer could have given a so pellucidly false defence of a rotten case in which he clearly did not believe. If it had not been for the fact that the clients were behind him warning him that he had better pretend that he was in favour of the Edinburgh mafia, he would not have done so.

I should like to ask the hon. Gentleman what doctrine of law or morals of politics it is when he says, "Speaking for myself." I am surprised that he did not get off the Front Bench and go behind himself to speak for himself, then in front of himself and say to himself, "Me and the Dispatch Box, believing in one another, have a private opinion which we believe is acceptable to us and our conscience but which we must not share with the shadow Cabinet or the rest of the party behind me." I have never heard of a doctrine by which he can say that he believes in law and order and say, "Speaking from the Dispatch Box, and the Box and I, both being made of wood, understand one another." The leader of the Edinburgh council is also called Wood. "We are in league. We understand one another, and I shall not extend my responsibilities to my colleagues because I know that they would not share them." I regard that as disgraceful. I am amazed that it came from the hon. Member for Garscadden.

Mr. Dewar: I am grateful to the hon. and learned Gentleman. I use the word "learned" only as a courtesy of the House. May I make it clear to him and to any other hon. Gentleman who wishes to listen, and I hope to put it beyond misrepresentation, that we believe that the court order must be observed.

Mr. Fairbairn: Who is "we"?

Mr. Dewar: The Labour party believes that the court order must be observed. It should not be ignored. I want to make that clear. That is part of the demomcratic process in which we all operate. A court order exists and that is something that we and everyone must take into account. That statement is unambiguous and made without any caveat. In two or three years we shall have a different Government and different laws, but I am sure that he would want to obey court orders, as we obey them at the moment.

Mr. Fairbairn: If, as is unlikely, in two or three years it were to be a Government of the hon. Gentleman's persuasion, we should not seek to say that we obey the law only so far as it suits us, and call only for the Dispatch Box as our ally. If the hon. Member for Garscadden is not willing to allow me the courtesy of the title to which I am entitled, and does so only out of courtesy, that demonstrates the pellucid fallacy of his arguments and judgment.

The rating and voting system which Opposition Members care to call democracy have always been of great benefit to Socialists. It has always amazed me that the English gentlemen here tonight have never seen the advantage that can so easily be taken of the system.

Of the electorate who provide local funds, the industrial third has no vote and the commercial third has no vote. Of the domestic sector which has a vote, more than 50 per cent. benefit from increased expenditure without having to contribute to it. It is an absolute mug's paradise. If I had been a Socialist, I would have taken advantage of it long ago. I would have been spending through the roof, because votes can be bought. One can have any number of bowling greens and one can besmirch a city with notices saying,

"We are providing services with jobs." [Interruption.] If hon. Members would listen rather than shout, they might learn something.

The hon. Member for Edinburgh, East raised a very important point. Edinburgh is about to have to service the Commonwealth games. I am informed, from the most impartial sources of all persuasions, that those who would have been contributing to the Edinburgh Commonwealth games are ceasing to do so because of the policies of Edinburgh district council. [HON. MEMBERS: "Name them."] People can be given free bowling greens in Craigmillar; but what is provided in an equivalent part of Edinburgh, in Pilton? That is real prosperity. Instead of being run by a local authority as a housing encampment, the houses in Pilton have been privatised and sold off, and jobs and services are coming from those sales.

Not only on the present inequalities of the voting system does extravagance pay. If I had been a good Socialist I would have noticed that extravagance has paid hand over fist. The Secretary of State has announced tonight that he will not even ask Edinburgh district council to come down to its guideline. He will not even ask it to come within £1 million of its guideline. As a result of its extravagance last year, the guideline of Edinburgh district council is infinitely higher that it was. The Secretary of State rightly said that it would be impossible to make the council come reasonably within its guideline, so he will meet the council half way. But the guideline of responsible authorities, such as Perth and Kinross district council, is kept miles below where it should be. So Edinburgh district council, in this great battle, will discover, as the Secretary of State has just announced, that it will be allowed to spend miles above its guideline and to benefit from it for the second year running.

I understand that Labour Members know how to work the system. If I were with Mr. Wood and his little clique of Marxists, I would do the same.

Mr. David Lambie (Cunninghame, South): What about the legal aid system?

Mr. Fairbairn: If the hon. Member for Cunninghame, South (Mr. Lambie) wishes to question legal aid, he can do so; but let him remember that legal aid in Scotland did not start for criminal matters until I had been at the Bar for five years and I had defended without fee 17 people who were in line for the death penalty. If the hon. Gentleman wishes to say that people at the Bar are on the gravy train, let him say it to the shadow Secretary of State, the hon. Member for Garscadden, who is a solicitor. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will not raise that matter again.

Edinburgh's income comes from its commerce and from a few of its citizens, and that commerce and those citizens are being driven out. Edinburgh is destroying the goose that lays the golden eggs. It may have a few more bowling green attendants and people who paint banners and hang them up, and, when they are torn down, hang them up again; it may have people who work in the legal department in order to get round the fact that they do not have planning permission to besmirch the city; but it is defying by extravagance, because the people who are doing it believe it to be to their electoral advantage. They are spending other people's money to promote their hideous doctrine. The Labour Government introduced the system, but, as the Secretary of State said tonight, one cannot feed from the ratepayers.

11.6 pm

Mr. Ron Brown (Edinburgh, Leith): Being a member of the Leith Labour party and not the Edinburgh Labour party, I may be allowed to say that this is a timely debate and sums up many things happening in this country. Democratic, basic rights are under attack: that is what this debate is all about. The Secretary of State is, in effect, a governor-general. He is imposing the diktat of Whitehall, the diktat of a discredited regime, and whatever he says will not wash in Scotland, not even in the Tory press. That is an indication of what the electorate in Scotland thinks of the Conservative party.

Despite all the comments in the past about the Tories being concerned to see less interference in local affairs, less government, more freedom, we see now that the mask has dropped. Not only has this Government double standards, they are two-faced, because in reality they represent a police state. One has only to look at the catalogue of laws they have brought in since they came to office in 1979. It is sheer hypocrisy for Conservative Members to talk about cutting public expenditure. During the Government's term of office, they have cut over £1 billion from the rate support grant in Scotland. That is not money saved, because it has been transferred elsewhere. It has been invested, so called, in Trident and in a new breed of nuclear weapons. That is hypocrisy, and I use that term advisedly.

The Government have priorities, but they are not interested in the people of England or Scotland or wherever. One recalls the old reactionary slogan of guns before butter, but today the slogan is missiles before life, before health. [Interruption.] We hear a lot of criticism in this debate of Labour councils, but we know from looking at the record, that those councils do not throw money around: they do not have it to throw around. Given a chance, they invest in their communities, they invest in people, because they are the greatest asset and resource we have. Some of my colleagues are in Edinburgh, and they are defending jobs, services, and living standards. Some Conservative Members seem to think that that is a crime nowadays.

All local authorities have mandates, which they must follow. To do otherwise would mean that they were doing the Tory party's dirty work, and our colleagues in Edinburgh certainly do not intend to do that. In some newspapers, including The Sun, the Daily Express and the Daily Mail, my colleagues in Edinburgh are called doctrinaire extremists. If that is the case, let us have more of it. I prefer to call it sticking to principles, which is important in politics nowadays.

In case Conservative Members have forgotten it, the Labour party won last year's local elections with a record swing—[Interruption.]

Mr. Michael Forsyth: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I apologise for interrupting the thread of the hon. Gentleman's argument, but is it in order for him to use the Chamber of the House of Commons as a flyposting board to display his propaganda? Should he not be asked to remove that banner?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: As a mere Englishman, I have not seen or heard anything that is out of order.

Mr. Brown: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Before I was so rudely interrupted, I was saying that the Labour party won last year's election with a record swing in support. Why did that happen? Was it simply a fluke that Labour took control of Edinburgh? Of course, we know the reason. Edinburgh, like Britain, is in a mess because of the Tory administration. The so-called Athens of the north had become the slum of the north, and the Labour party had to move in and deal with the problems.

To follow what my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, East (Mr. Strang) said, may I remind the House that the Labour administration in Edinburgh inherited a housing waiting list of 13,000 families, and a backlog of sub-standard local authority housing? About 6,000 houses were without baths. I am sure that some Conservatives Members have several baths in their houses. Thanks to Tory maladministration, Edinburgh had litter-strewn streets, and libraries without books — not even the Dandy or the Beano. Recreation facilities were closed.

All that happened in a city which talks about a festival——

Mrs. Anna McCurley (Renfrew, West and Inverclyde): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Mr. Brown: —for the middle classes and the rich. It talks about hosting the Commonwealth games. It talks about many things—[Interruption.]

Mrs. McCurley: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Is it in order to decorate the Opposition Benches with — [Interruption.] I see that the banner has just come down, so I withdraw my point of order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I dealt with that point of order earlier. May I remind the House that this is a short debate, and that the Minister hopes to reply at 11.20 pm.

Mr. Brown: Much more could be said about the Tory record in Edinburgh. Indeed, much more should be said about it. We had criminals operating in Edinburgh for a long time, not doing the jobs that they were elected to do, but working contrary to the interests of Edinburgh's citizens. We hear about the two nations of the Conservative party. In Edinburgh, we have two cities. Visitors to Edinburgh notice better than anyone that, in the new town, there are fine new buildings. They see Bute house, where the Secretary of State resides in all his finery and with his 10 baths. If one goes there, one is very impressed, that is, until one goes to the new houses.

To give the Secretary of State his due, he does occasionally come out of his fantastic mansion. He came out of his tied cottage, for example, a year or so ago when he went to West Pilton to visit some friends who had acquired, thanks to the Tory council, a number of houses which had been modernised. Of course, the houses were bought at a knock-down price. The houses were being sold off to the private sector for a record profit. The right hon. Gentleman quite naturally goes to see his friends, the building fraternity. After all, they are very good at financing the Tory party. They are very generous at putting money into the coffers. One company alone in Edinburgh, Smart the builders, in one year gave £30,000 to the Tory party, so quite naturally the Tories look after their friends.

Talking about kick-backs, we can observe this on the Government Benches, because the Secretary of State and the Tory party know all about kick-backs.

Mr. Tom Clarke: Does my hon. Friend recall that when the Select Committee on Scottish Affairs visited Edinburgh, we were discussing the serious problem of dampness? Does he recall the appalling conditions that we found? Does he recall that the then Conservative convenor of housing, Councillor Drummond-Young, appealed for more capital to be invested in Edinburgh? Is not one of the most appalling features of the order the fact that that capital is going to be reduced?

Mr. Brown: My hon. Friend makes a valid point. The former councillor to whom he refers, Councillor Drummond-Young, was obviously very concerned about the situation. He was an extreme Right-winger. I do not know whether he is still around these days. He lost his seat, quite naturally, in the last local elections.

I think that that sums up the role of the Tory party. Even within that Tory group, there was concern about the indifference of its own Government. Undoubtedly, Councillor Drummond-Young made that point to the Select Committee. I am sure that this could be repeated throughout the country. No doubt we would hear the same in Liverpool.

Mr. Robert Parry (Liverpool, Riverside): In the last session of Parliament, I represented Liverpool, Scotland. I fully support the fight which my hon. Friend is making on behalf of the people of Edinburgh. I can assure him, on behalf of my hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool, Broadgreen (Mr. Fields) of the support of the Liverpool people. I note that the Secretary of State is shaking his hands, but he is the monkey grinder for Mrs. Thatcher, like the Secretary of State for the Environment — [Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Interventions must be brief.

Mr. Parry: It appears that in the battle in Edinburgh in Scotland and in Liverpool in England, the cold hand of the Prime Minister is behind the Secretary of State for Scotland and the Secretary of State for the Environment.

Mr. Brown: I thank my hon. Friend for his intervention. What he says can be summed up in this way. What the Tories are saying is, take it or leave it. That is the message being given from the Dispatch Box by the Secretary of State, who knows full well that his political role is to support big business. It is to redistribute wealth from the working class to the bosses. That is his job. He does it in a certain way, and he tries a little flannel, but he does not con many people. He may suggest that in better times it is possible to be more generous, and it is true that in good times in the past a few crumbs were given to the working class. Now they are being taken back.

Why is this action being taken against Edinburgh? Is it because the Secretary of State is vicious and vindictive? [Interruption.] The real reason is that there is an almighty crisis in the economy and the Tories want to take back all the gains that the working class has won since the war. They want to reduce real wages, attack the welfare state and reduce the social wage. That is why they are having a go at Edinburgh, which is sticking its neck out and is in the front line. The Government feel that they must challenge that position.

Some say that what is happening is the result of monetarism. Let us be clear that that is not a new word. Monetarism was tried years ago, especially in the 1920s, when, like today, the working class was told that the nation had to save money, and there were calls for a return to the gold standard. That resulted in attacks on jobs and living standards, and the working class suffered.

Despite the setback of 1926, when the working class was let down badly because of weak-kneed individuals —the TUC of that period—in the local authorities there were individuals such as George Lansbury in Poplar who led the way forward. I say in all modesty — [Interruption.]—that Edinburgh typifies the Poplar spirit, the spirit of Lansbury. If we are to learn from history, we must look back to what was achieved by the individuals of the time, because the same can be achieved now.

Conservative Members may smile at what I am saying, but in Edinburgh the members of the Labour group are still concerned with fighting injustice, although the Secretary of State is bound to disagree with anything that we say on behalf of the working class. He and his hon. Friends will continue to jump up and down and assert, "We represent parliamentary democracy," and pontificate on what that means. When Conservative Members speak about democracy, they do so as a front for the capitalist system, a system that is unfair, inefficient, corrupt and dangerous.

It is unfair because wealth is concentrated into fewer hands; it is inefficient because it creates massive unemployment and results in foodstuffs, like industries, being destroyed; it is corrupt because it fosters the black economy and harbours, for example, the Vestey family; and that it is dangerous was demonstrated by the conflict in the south Atlantic.

For all those reasons, the capitalist system is condemned. My advice to my colleagues in the Public Gallery—[Interruption.]—is that they should stick to their guns. It is not simply a question—[Interruption.] —of breaking the law. Laws can be made and they can be unmade. Laws made by the Conservatives are not designed to improve society but to destroy the decent things in life. If Tory Members speak to working class people they will have that explained, though I am beginning to wonder whether they would even want to speak to Conservative Members.

Why not bend the knee, and let things develop? Why not concede certain things? That would not be just a gesture, of the sort that many in this place are used to. It would mean that services and jobs would be decimated. One could not consider what would happen as a result. If we described what would happen, we would be describing a real horror story. Somebody could make a video of it, and sell it off to ITV.

We must emphasise that the order does not cover housing, although it has been mentioned, because housing policy has been decided in the other place.

Mr. Martin Flannery (Sheffield, Hillsborough) rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the hon. Member for Edinburgh Leith (Mr. Brown) giving way?

Mr. Brown: Yes, I am.

Mr. Flannery: Does my hon. Friend agree that the struggles against the Tory party by Labour Members, cities such as Sheffield, Edinburgh and Liverpool and boroughs such as Lambeth, have resulted, whether the Tories like it or not, in the latest Gallup poll? It shows that the Tories are third at 28 per cent., with the alliance taking 32 per cent. of the poll, and the Labour party 38 per cent. The Tories will read this in the Daily Telegraph tomorrow, and realise where their policies are taking them.

Mr. Brown: I thank my hon. Friend for his important point.

It was interesting that earlier on, the hon. Member for Edinburgh, West (Lord James Douglas-Hamilton) attacked the Labour group for flying the red flag. I assume that he would prefer the stars and stripes, or a white flag, but for us, the red flag is a nice colour and quite appropriate. He thinks that the members of the Labour group in Edinburgh are extremists, but far from it. Even the figures produced by the Government show that Edinburgh is spending £9·1 per head of population, compared with the Scottish average of £11·04.

If the rate support grant of 1974 were paid today, Edinburgh would be £2 million better off, but because of the repeated cuts, Edinburgh has suffered.

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I appeal to you to have regard to the provisions of standing order No. 3(1)(b), bearing in mind that the confrontation that is going on is likely to have the effect of excluding my hon. Friend the Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce) from expressing the views of 25 per cent. of the people of Scotland, who have as much claim as anybody else to take advantage of the debate. Therefore, I ask you to rule that, because of the importance of the subject matter, the time for debate has not been adequate, and under the provisions of the standing order, you will allow the business to stand over until the next day's sitting.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I realise that a number of hon. Members on both sides of the House will not have the opportunity to speak in the debate, but I am not prepared to exercise my discretion in that regard, and I intend to put the question at 11.30.

Mr. Dalyell: Further to the point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Is the hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce) to take precedence over those of us who represent some of the district under discussion?

Mr. Brown: It has been suggested that Edinburgh councillors want confrontation. It is the Government who want confrontation. They are on a loser if they think that electors do not back the councillors. If the Secretary of State knows anything about Edinburgh — when he occasionally goes there he no doubt reads the Edinburgh Evening News—he knows that the Evening News is not a revolutionary newspaper and that it carried a poll——

It being half past Eleven o'clock MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER put the Question, pursuant to Standing Order No. 3 (Exempted Business).

Resolved,

That the Rate Reduction (City of Edinburgh District) 1985-86 Report, which was laid before this House on 3rd July, be approved.

Rate Rebates (Scotland)

11.42 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Michael Ancram): I beg to move,

That the Revaluation Rate Rebates (Scotland) Order 1985, dated 9 July 1985, a copy of which was laid before this House on 10 July, be approved.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce (Gordon): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. In the debate that has just ended, the arguments that could be advanced by the parties representing 25 per cent. of the electorate in Scotland were not heard. The mess that Edinburgh faces is the direct result of the confrontation between the Conservative and Labour parties. We have been denied the right to contribute to this debate. In those circumstances, although we oppose the actions of the Government, it was impossible for us to vote when we had no opportunity to explain our views. Is this a democractic Chamber, or is it not?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): Order. I understand the hon. Gentleman's point. Equally, I understand that a number of hon. Members on both sides of the House, including one Minister, were disappointed in the last debate. The Chair always does its best in the limited time available.

Mr. David Steel (Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. [Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Of course I will take the right hon. Gentleman's point of order, but I hope that he realises that time taken up by points of order now is taking valuable time out of this debate, which can last only for an hour and a half.

Mr. Steel: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I hope that this will be helpful to the Chair — [Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I want to hear this point of order.

Mr. Steel: Under Standing Order No. 3(1)(b), where the occupant of the Chair is of the opinion that "because of the importance of the subject matter of the motion, the time for debate has not been adequate, he shall, instead of putting the question as aforesaid, interrupt the business, and the debate shall stand adjourned till the next sitting (other than a Friday)."

May I suggest that when the Front Benches have taken so much time, when an hon. and learned Member from well outside Edinburgh has taken so much time and when one Edinburgh Member has spoken for 25 minutes, the only discipline available to the occupant of the Chair is the use of that Standing Order to make it clear that hon. Members who try to occupy the time of the House in that way will not get away with it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I have dealt with the issue raised in that point of order; I am not sure whether the right hon. Gentleman was in the Chamber at the time. I exercised my discretion. That is the duty of the Chair on such occasions.

Mr. Robert Maclennan (Caithness and Sutherland): Further to the point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. In your response to my hon. Friend the Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce), you referred to the disappointment of a number of hon. Members in all parts of the House, but I hope that you were not suggesting that the disappointment felt by Back-Bench Labour or Conservative Members could be compared with the frustration of two political parties that represent a quarter of the electorate—a disappointment which is compounded by the fact that in his opening speech the Secretary of State specifically invited contributions from my hon. Friend the Member for Gordon and from myself.

The Government side took 52 minutes of the debate, the Labour party took 58 minutes and they excluded third party opinion. The procedures of the House were grossly abused and it was noted that there were no suggestions from the Chair about the desirability of short speeches. In the latter part of the debate, remarks strayed very far from order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. Gentleman has made his point. I hope that we can now get on.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. If those roles are to be invoked, do not matters of geography become relevant? Why does an hon. Member from 300 miles to the north think that he can take precedence over some of us who represent the area concerned? I make no complaint about not being called, but let it be recorded that if there is to be precedence, hon. Members who represent the area should take precedence over those from a long way away.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I think that the House now realises very well that the Chair is sometimes in the middle of the crossfire.

Mr. Ancram: The order is the last link in the statutory chain needed to bring into effect the relief for ratepayers which my right hon. Friend announced to the House on 14 May. The powers enabling the order to be made are prescribed in the Rating (Revaluation Rebates) (Scotland) Act 1985 which was given a Second Reading on 3 June. After a speedy passage—I am glad to record our thanks for the co-operation given by the Opposition—the Act received Royal Assent on 26 June. It comes into force on 26 August, which is also the date of coming into operation of this order.

The order is also the latest measure by the Government to mitigate the most severe effects of the 1985 revaluation. As the House knows, we increased the domestic element of rate support grant, first, on the basis of early estimates of the new values, when it became apparent that the domestic sector as a whole would have to bear a substantially greater share of the rate burden and, secondly, to the unprecedented level of £102 million after local authorities had determined their rates and it became clear that an intolerable burden on the domestic sector was being imposed by the effects of revaluation, together with high spending plans. I am bound to say there have been some irresponsibly high spending plans, in one case so wildly irresponsible that my right hon. Friend has been obliged to take the selective action approved by the House tonight.

Relief for the domestic sector and adjustment of the effects of revaluation through reduction of industrial derating from 50 to 40 per cent. were possible by using powers already available to us. When later information became available for individual ratepayers of the combined effects of revaluation and high rates, it became clear that something more needed to be done, in particular for commercial ratepayers for whom our earlier average figures had indicated that the effect of revaluation was broadly neutral. Once the rolls were published, we learnt that there were many individual cases of horrifying rate increases. They seriously jeopardised the ability of many commercial ratepayers to continue in business. The powers that the Government already had did not enable us to meet the circumstances, hence the need to seek the powers which are now enacted in the Rating (Revaluation Rebates) (Scotland) Act 1985.

The House may find it helpful if I briefly remind it of those powers. The Act enables my right hon. Friend to provide by order for rating authorities to grant rebate of rates on property where the 1985-86 rateable value is more than three times the 1984-85 rateable value. Property valued by formula or by order, property occupied by the Crown or local authorities, and industrial and freight transport subjects benefiting from industrial derating are all excluded. An order may be made for the current financial year or any year thereafter. The order before the House exercises those powers for 1985-86.

Articles 1 and 2 are the normal provisions dealing with citation and commencement, and with interpretation.

Article 3 simply provides for rating authorities to grant rebates to lands and heritages which qualify under the Act.

Article 4 provides for the amount of rebate to be calculated by comparing old and new values for the same property. Rates payable after rebate will be as if the new rateable value were no more than three times the old value.

There is also provision that, in calculating rebate, no account should be taken of any reduction in the amount of rates payable when any valuation appeal is pending. Until an appeal is settled, a ratepayer is required to pay only 90 per cent. of his rates, or such lesser amount as the rating authority may agree. The effect of the provision in article 4(2) is that the 90 per cent. rule is not taken into account when determining a rebate. It might be thought that it is unnecessary to give a ratepayer the benefit of both a rebate and the 90 per cent. concession on the amount payable while a valuation appeal is pending. But it is important that the new rebate scheme does not encourage ratepayers from appealing if they think that the valuations are wrong.

My right hon. Friend and I have made it clear that the rebate scheme should not be regarded in any way as a substitute for going ahead in the normal way with an appeal where the ratepayer disagrees with the assessor's valuation. We therefore think it important to retain intact and separate the "upfront" incentive of 10 per cent. off the amount payable, without having it confused by being subsumed in the revaluation rebate at this stage. Obviously, once the appeal is determined one way or the other, the result will be the basis of the final entitlement to revaluation rebate, if any. Thus, someone who is in due course successful in his appeal, to the extent that his revised valuation would not have entitled him to as much revaluation rebate, will have his account adjusted, in accordance with article 6.

Article 4(3) is a provision restricting the rebate for any one property to £10,000. The intention is to focus relief on the small ratepayer and especially smaller businesses. We recognise that there is some rough justice in this provision. There is an obvious disadvantage for the large one-shop business as against the large business which operates many small shops. But resolving anomalies of that kind would seriously complicate the scheme and there is no guarantee that any solution would not itself produce further anomalies. A restriction of £10,000 for each rebate is considered the simplest method of targeting relief on small businesses.

Article 5 first places a duty on rating authorities to ascertain those lands and heritages which qualify for rebate and to grant the appropriate rebate by 16 September 1985. This provision is based on the advice we received from officials of the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities and of rating authorities and assessors whom we consulted about the practical application of the scheme. Briefly, they advised that the scheme would operate more smoothly if rating authorities determined from their records who was entitled to rebates and calculated and awarded the appropriate amount. Modern systems make this much easier than obliging ratepayers who think they may be entitled to rebate to lodge a claim. We are grateful for that advice, which we were glad to accept, and for much other sound advice which those bodies gave which has been taken into account in the order. The deadline of 16 September should allow any ratepayer to make payments by instalments of rebated rates within the prescribed arrangements.

Rebates may be granted either by a payment to the ratepayer or by reducing rates payable. Given the numbers involved it is not improbable that, because, for example, records are not completely up to date, some ratepayers may not be granted a rebate by the due date. Provision is therefore made for claims by ratepayers who have not been granted a rebate.

Rating authorities are required by 23 September 1985 to advertise in the press informing ratepayers that they may claim rebates within 28 days of publication of the advertisement. A form of claim is contained in the schedule to the order. Rebates must be granted as soon as an application is accepted. If it is refused, the applicant has to be informed immediately in writing. If the rating authority fails to determine an application within 28 days of it being submitted, it shall be deemed to have refused the application. The ratepayer then has 28 days from a determination or deemed refusal in which to appeal against these to the sheriff. The procedure for such appeals, which was a matter of some debate when the Bill was before the House, is set out in article 7. There is also provision in article 6—which I have already mentioned—for rebate to be reassessed where values or rates are altered.

According to the latest return which COSLA has obtained from all Scottish rating authorities, some 133,000 domestic and 62,000 non-domestic, including commercial, ratepayers will qualify for rebate and the total cost of the scheme is estimated at about £30 million, which is a considerable and unprecedented figure. But the scheme is demand-led and the final cost will only be known once all rebates are settled.

As I pointed out in my opening remarks, the order applies to the current year only. Further rebate orders may be made for subsequent years. We have thought it right to go no further for the present than provision for 1985-86.

Mr. Dalyell: Has any rough estimate been made of the cost? It cannot be cheap.

Mr. Ancram: Various estimates have been made. It is thought that the cost will be under £1 million. I made it clear when the primary legislation was passing through the House that the expenditure would be disregarded for penalty purposes in future years.

Decisions on local authority expenditure and grant are normally made in the autumn of the year preceding the financial year to which they will apply. Any extension of this rebate scheme beyond 1985-86 falls to be considered along with the other relevant matters for that year in question and most appropriately provided for at that time.

Mr. Archy Kirkwood (Roxburgh and Berwickshire): Can the hon. Gentleman tell the House—if not this evening, at the earliest possible opportunity—whether the provisions will continue next year? What arrangements are being made to reimburse local authorities for administering the scheme? I expected that important aspect to be covered in the hon. Gentleman's description of the order.

Mr. Ancram: I thought that I had made it clear that the cost of administering the scheme would be disregarded. That would be local authority expenditure which the local authorities would bear themselves. It would be disregarded for the purposes of guidelines. I appreciate that it is in the interests of ratepayers and others to know the intentions for the following years as soon as possible. Those decisions, and decisions on the domestic element of rate support grant, are announced and taken in the House. We hope to make those announcements in November or December this year.

The order will bring much needed relief to those ratepayers in Scotland who face greatest hardship from increases in values and in rate bills in the current year. It is a practical expression of the Government's concern. Although there will still be people who face massive rate increases, we will have met the worst of the burdens that have been created by some elements of the revaluation. That is what we undertook to do when we were passing the legislation. The process has been completed by the order, and I commend it to the House.

12.12 am

Mr. Jim Craigen (Glasgow, Maryhill): The Under-Secretary of State has acknowledged the assistance rendered by the Opposition during the passage of the enabling legislation. There was a problem in the commercial sector, especially for many small businesses.

The generosity of the £50 million in new money has been shown to be more apparent than real. The Under-Secretary of State referred to the order as the "last link," but there seem to be a few lost chords. A shortfall of £20 million is a considerable underestimate of the cost. By refusing to lower the threshold below the three times factor, the Government have effectively denied many ratepayers the assistance that they might have thought would be available, given the Younger declaration at Perth on 9 May. So many figures have been cited for the number of commercial and domestic ratepayers who will benefit under the order that they would have been wiser to rely on COSLA's figures, on which the Government now rest their case.

I am encouraged to look at the order by the reply that the Under-Secretary of State gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) in a letter on 15 July 1985, in which he said:

"Now that the rebate scheme's main features have been enacted I think it would be best if we were to get on with putting it into practice."

[Mr. Jim Craigen]

Given the embarrassment that the order has caused, I concur with the Under-Secretary of State.

There were two significant developments in the enabling legislation — the duty imposed on a rating authority to give the rebate and the payment by the Secretary of State to the rating authority for its payments, but not the costs that it incurred in making them.

Does the Minister expect most rating authorities to make a payment or merely to deduct the amount of rebate that might be due? I ask that question because he is giving local authorities that discretion.

Will the Minister say something about some of the problems that may arise following successful appeals where the ratepayer has to pay back a rebate that he or she has been given?

Will the Minister also tell us how the order is to be uniformly advertised? He will be aware that the Scottish information office was busy at the time of revaluation trying to soothe ratepayers' anxieties about the effects of rising assessments. My hon. Friend the Member for Garscadden has elicited the fact that about £3 million of the £30 million will go to the owners of poster sites. I wonder whether Saatchi and Saatchi will be involved in the promotional aspects. Rating authorities will be advertising in the press, but ratepayers will have more general anxieties about the order.

In Tayside, for example, 7,900 lock-up garages figure among the 12,700 subjects that will benefit from the order.

Mr. Bill Walker (Tayside, North) rose——

Mr. Craigen: I shall give way to the hon. Gentleman. He and I spent many hours together on the Rating and Valuation (Amendment) (Scotland) Act 1984. I pay full tribute to the part that he played in achieving the derating of commercial reed beds. I described it as the "Bill Walker benefit Bill." I wonder whether we are now seeing the lock-ups of Tayside coming into the same category.

Mr. Walker: The hon. Gentleman will be aware that in Tayside, especially in Angus, the revaluation has hit badly commercial premises. A substantial number of those premises will benefit from this measure. I acknowledge that lock-up garages are included. The fact that the majority of the shops, especially in Forfar, will benefit is welcome. Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the answer to the problem is to get rid of this iniquitous rating system?

Mr. Craigen: I find the hon. Gentleman's comment about Forfar interesting, because I was reading in a newspaper only the other day about the devastating effect that the problems have caused in Forfar.

I understand that one of the aspects of the rebate scheme that might disappoint many people is that domestic ratepayers may receive only a small rebate. In West Lothian 50 per cent. may receive £10 or less, and for one in three of the beneficiaries who receive more than £1 it will be in respect of lock-up garages. The Government could have assisted by lowering the threshold from the three times factor.

The Government have a duty to reimburse the payments that arise from the order, but the rating authorities are anxious about the effect that the order will have on their cash flow, especially in respect of interest charges that may be incurred. I wonder whether, in the 50 per cent., 45 per cent., 5 per cent. arrangement that the Minister is proposing, he is giving adequate recompense to the local authorities. They will have to fork out the £1 million cost of operating the order, and also the interest charges involved.

The point made earlier by my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) is of importance, because there is a value for money aspect. On the basis of that £1 million and the £30 million that the order will cost, we are talking about 3 per cent. for administrative and interest charges, the rating system itself collecting about £1,700 million. The Minister gave me a figure of £16 million, approximately the equivalent of 1 per cent., for the entire cost.

Will the Minister say something about the appeals procedure? There is concern among the assessors that the detailed advice that the Scottish Office finance division put out should answer many of their queries. I know, for example, that the Fife regional assessor is a little perturbed about the terms "lands" and "heritages". I believe that there have been discussions between the Scottish Office and COSLA about the matter, but the regional assessor in Fife is concerned that there are possibilities for litigation in a change of description, from, say, "store" to "warehouse". He feels that many points of litigation could arise unless the Scottish Office spells out in considerable detail some of the anxieties that can arise from the order.

The regulations are, of course, brought to us in the form that we take them or leave them, because we cannot amend them. The Government have been singularly at fault in the way that they have calculated the costs. They have been mean-minded in not agreeing to recompense the local authorities for the costs that they will incur. I hope that tonight, and in the ensuing Scottish Office circular, the Minister will clarify various points and prevent more people from feeling that they have been rather hard done by because of the way in which the order will operate.

12.13 am

Mr. Malcolm Bruce (Gordon): I am grateful, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for the fact that I have caught your eye rather early in the debate. It is interesting to note the rather changed structure of the participants. The great bosom pals of the hon. Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar), who were backing him to the hilt in the last debate — the hon. Members for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) for Coventry, South-East (Mr. Nellist), for Liverpool, Broadgreen (Mr. Fields) and for Sheffield, Hillsborough (Mr. Flannery)—seem to have decided that this debate has not the same interest as the previous one. In the circumstances, perhaps one can understand their choice of priorities and the issues on which they choose to intervene.

Mr. John Home Robertson (East Lothian): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Bruce: Not for the present.

The order is one which the Minister, a few months ago, might have led us to believe was the salvation of the ratepayers to Scotland, and the salvation—more to the point—of the seats of his hon. Friends. The order as it appears tonight is a long way short of that. The money that will come back to the ratepayers of Scotland now looks like being a little over half of what was originally promised.

The Government have refused to contribute to the cost of the administration of the scheme by the local authorities, and the Minister has already told my hon. Friend that he is unable to give any kind of indication whether anything will be carried forward into next year, leaving many businesses in particular, as well as domestic ratepayers, in a position of considerable uncertainty as to whether they have real relief or just a stay of execution. The running sore of rates in Scotland is causing deep and considerable embarrassment to the Conservative and Labour parties.

In spite of its willingness to attack the Government, the Labour party is not willing to declare exactly where it stands in relation to the budget in Edinburgh, nor, indeed, where it stands on the future of the rating system. That is not surprising, because if the hon. Members for Coventry, South-East or for Liverpool, Broadgreen were here, they might say they were in favour of rates, because they recognise that the majority of Labour voters do not pay the same level of rates as the majority of voters for other parties. It is therefore a good way of buying votes on the cheap, and the Labour party has not yet come clean about where and how it will reform the voting system.

Mr. Home Robertson: The hon. Member has talked about coming clean. Has he made up his mind about how he would have voted if he had not had a fit of pique before the last Division?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): Order. I have been listening very carefully to the debate. It is a short debate, and I remind the House that remarks should be addressed to the adequacy or otherwise of the amounts of rebates and their calculation. Hon. Members should not stray into the debate that ended an hour ago.

Mr. Bruce: I am grateful to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I am addressing my remarks to the inadequacy of the order.

The Government have come forward with a botched-up, temporary expedient, which has been announced in a flush of glory. When it is closely analysed, it does not live up to the spectacular announcement made in front of the television cameras at the Conservative party conference. When we get down to the nitty-gritty, we find a squalid and cheap situation, in which the Government are not prepared to give the ratepayers of Scotland the funding which they said they would give back. Nor will they give a firm commitment that such rebates will continue in the future, and that is the only solution which can help to alleviate the problems of Scotland's ratepayers.

One of the problems facing Scotland is that too many local authorities are squeezed by Government policy. Their rate support grant is cut, and that forces them to increase the rates. In addition, the revaluation effect is proving an even greater problem. The tragedy for the Government is that as a result of revaluation the public have finally discovered that the game is a bogy. The Government claim that they have the interests of ratepayers at heart, but that has been shown to be empty, shallow, and a sham. Their policies over the last five years have meant that the ratepayers of Scotland have paid, year in and year out, more and more for less and less.

This relief will not cause widespread rejoicing. It just means that ratepayers will be forced to spend more and more for still fewer and fewer services. It is no great relief to ratepayers to be told they will have to pay rate increases of 30, 40 or 50 per cent., and no great relief for them to know that they may yet have to pay rate increases of 200, 300 or 400 per cent. next year. The ratepayers of Scotland now know that, and any short-term recovery which the Government achieved by producing this deus ex machina has evaporated, as the polls in Scotland clearly show.

After the next election the Minister will not be able to hold up his head in Scotland, because he and his colleagues will be swept out of office and the city of Edinburgh will return alliance Members of Parliament. They will, of course, be drawn equally from Conservative and Labour-held seats. The Minister would be well advised to take away this squalid order and to return with one that gives to Scottish ratepayers the £50 million which the Secretary of State promised at the Conservative party conference earlier this year. If he cannot do so, I and my hon. Friends will force a Division and vote against the order.

Mr. Gordon Wilson (Dundee, East): I shall follow the spirit of the debate and speak only briefly. Since you invited us, Mr. Deputy Speaker, to address our remarks to the method of calculation, it is strange that the Minister did not explain to the House why £20 million was missing. At the Conservative party conference, the Secretary of State promised that £50 million would be available——

Mr. Ancram: No; £40 million.

Mr. Wilson: The Minister says £40 million, but I had the impression that he promised £50 million. Even so, £40 million is still £10 million above the figure that the Minister now says will be available. It is remarkable that, after it was suggested that £50 million would be made available, only £30 million will be provided.

If the Government could convince us that this was a speculative calculation, that they had to keep the amount within the £50 million limit, and that they were not sure how much they must shell out, I could understand the need to be cautious and not to incur the wrath of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. But they have estimated that the cost of the aid will be about £30 million. If they can estimate what a multiplier of 3 will produce, surely they could adjust that multiplier so as to increase the number of people falling within the net and therefore honour the promise made by the Secretary of State.

If the Government were trying, in desperation, to attract a modicum of political support by promising this aid to ratepayers, it is strange that they have back-tracked on that promise. That sort of thing would undermine confidence in any political party. Indeed, had the Government been floating a company on the basis of that prospectus, they would have ended up in the dock because of promises made but not honoured. The entire procedure is a swindle. The only joy is that this £30 million is £30 million more than ratepayers might have received. However, that will be of no consolation to the ratepayers —including, I suspect, some hon. Members—who had hoped to benefit to a small extent, but who have discovered that they fall just short of the multiplier and will not so benefit. Tens of thousands of ratepayers will be deeply disappointed.

I cannot understand why the Government will not pay the administrative costs of the scheme. It is a simple matter. If they have so much spare cash, they should give £1 million to our hard-pressed local authorities. Indeed, it is an insult to say that local authrities will not be penalised for implementing the Government's scheme. It was a remarkable piece of effrontery by the Minister to say that, given the small sum involved and the fact that the Chancellor had already agreed in principle to give that £1 million to local authorities.

It is deeply disappointing that the Government have not introduced a new multiplier that would reflect the need to spend the £50 million that was originally offered. Instead, they have restricted aid to £30 million and so lost much of the benefit that this move might have brought.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): My hon. Friend the Member for Falkirk, East (Mr. Ewing) and I would like clarification on one issue. We understand the Chancellor of the Exchequer to have said that this is a one-off operation, and is not to be repeated.

Mr. Ancram indicated dissent.

Mr. Dalyell: The Minister shakes his head, but I think that he had better clarify the matter, because what the Chancellor said is at odds with my understanding—and of course I will give way and be corrected—of what he said.

Mr. Ancram: I cannot, and obviously would not, without reference to reports of what the Chancellor said, try to quote him exactly. What he was saying was that new money which was available this year would not necessarily be available next year. That does not preclude this scheme being financed in other ways.

Mr. Dalyell: In what other ways?

Mr. Craigen: In the same way as the £38·5 million in regard to the Health Service.

Mr. Ancram: I have said to the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) that these are the matters which are for consideration, and we have to consider all the decisions which we make about expenditure — in particular the matters relating to local government finance, which take place in the autumn. I am not being discourteous to the hon. Gentleman in saying that at this time of the year, before those decisions are taken and before consideration is given to the implications of them, I am not in a position to answer the question.

Mr. Dalyell: We will look forward to see what happens when autumn leaves are falling.

Mr. Craigen: I think my hon. Friend should take it that the Chancellor in effect was saying that this is an unrepeatable offer and that, if the scheme continues, it will be at the expense of the general body of ratepayers.

Mr. Dalyell: I think that we might want, as soon as Hansard is printed, to write to the Treasury and try to get a view from Treasury Ministers, because this is important.

I am not at all happy about the sheer administrative costs of this operation. If this money were available, there are certain other things in the Lothian area which ought to be done. First, I speak here as much as a Member of Parliament representing Lothian as the member for the main organising committee of the Commonwealth games. Is it understood in regard to the Royal commonwealth pool that the roofing work, unless £750,000 is spent, could become dangerous? I have checked and rechecked this. If the money is simply not available for a basic site for the Commonwealth games, where is the money going to come from to do necessary structural roofing repairs to the Commonwealth pool?

Secondly, is it true that £130,000 is needed urgently for Meadowbank and the James Kane centre and that, if this is not done, both those places may close?

Thirdly, the Edinburgh commarket, which is to——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am finding great difficulty in relating this to the order.

Mr. Dalyell: I am sorry, Mr. Deputy Speaker, it is quite legitimate to talk about alternative uses of this rebate.

With regard to the Warrender baths, which are closed, £100,000 is urgently needed if they are to be re-opened. If they are not re-opened, training facilities for the 1986 games will be open to considerable question. This is very relevant. If the Minister cannot answer now, perhaps he could write to me about it. Paying back comparatively small sums of money with these disproportionate administrative costs is not a very sensible way of conducting our affairs.

12.30 am

Mr. Ancram: Many points have been raised in the debate and I shall answer as many of them as I can, beginning with those raised by the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell). The question of capital allocations for the types of subject to which he referred are also matters for consideration in the autumn, when the Government consider what allocations can be made available. We consider seriously the bids that are made and the priorities put forward by local authorities and try, within available resources, to ensure that, so far as possible, those priorities are met.

I take issue with the hon. Gentleman to the extent that he feels that the £30 million rebate, which effectively is the cost of the order, is unnecessary and unhelpful, because there are situations — hon. Members will recognise them in their constituencies — where, for instance, commercial organisations, such as small shops, might find themselves faced with rate increases, because of severe revaluations, which could put them out of business. The purpose of the order, as I have previously pointed out, is to try to mitigate the worst effects of revaluation without undoing revaluation itself.

Mr. Kirkwood indicated assent.

Mr. Ancram: The hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood) recognises the value of the order, because originally he asked the Government to provide £4 million or £5 million, and he sees the amounts that the Government are providing are generous. I hope, therefore, that the hon. Member for Linlithgow will reflect on some of the people whose problems and burdens will be considerably relieved by the action that will take place under the order.

The hon. Member for Dundee, East (Mr. Wilson) raised again the question of the £50 million and what he referred to as the missing £20 million and the multiplier. In fairness to my right hon. Friend, it is important to recall what he said at Perth, when he announced the sum of £40 million for commercial or non-domestic ratepayers. He referred to a scheme, the cost of which would be about—

Mr. Dewar: Not "about," but "at least."

Mr. Ancram: He may have said "at least." I do not have the exact quotation with me, and the hon. Gentleman will appreciate that I would not want to be held to a quotation without having the reference before me. It was clear from that time on that we were talking about a certain cost. That cost, on the best estimates that were available to us at the time, was £40 million for the commercials and, as we announced the following week in the House, another £10 million for the domestics. Those estimates were on the high side. We accept, as more work has been done on the valuations, that the cost will be considerably less.

The hon. Member for Dundee, East criticises the three times multiplier, but we had to take account of setting a level of multiplier at which eligibility for benefit would begin and which would not, of itself, undo revaluation completely. I am sure that he accepts, as an ex-practising solicitor—he may still be practising—who in the House has previously expressed certain expertise on valuation and admiration for revaluation, that it would not have been sensible for the Government to have undone one side of revaluation—the losing side—while leaving the other side untouched.

We had to set a level which we believed dealt with the worst effects of revaluation. It is, interestingly, a level which is below the average multiplier of revaluation in the previous revaluation. We believe that it was the right figure, and the cost, as I said works out at £30 million.

Mr. Wilson: I find the Minister's attitude somewhat ingenuous. If Ministers and the Scottish Office were successful in screwing out of the Treasury £50 million, that money should have been made available to ratepayers who are finding it extremely difficult under the three times multiplier to meet increased rate demands for which they have had no opportunity to budget. That extra money would have alleviated the distress that many people are feeling.

Mr. Ancram: The hon. Gentleman uses the rather indelicate phrase, "screwing £50 million out of the Treasury." It was not like that. The Government arrived at a scheme that involved the three times multiplier, and the cost followed that. That has been the position from the beginning, and it remains so. Opposition Members who, from the end of March and through April, were calling for sums of £4 million or £5 million, now find it difficult to accept that the Government have given a generous provision to aid ratepayers.

Mr. Craigen rose——

Mr. Ancram: I shall give way to the hon. Gentleman, even though we have been through this so many times before.

Mr. Craigen: I have the words spoken by the Secretary of State in Perth. He said that he expected the scheme would help the 50,000 ratepayers who are most badly affected, and that it would cost £40 million. As 62,500 are to be helped over the three fold threshold, why was there that miscalculation in Perth?

Mr. Ancram: I am sure that if the hon. Gentleman talks to assessors, he will find that the analysis takes place over time, and that the evidence presented to us by COSLA, which led to us accepting that the figure would be £30 million, was not given to us until 12 June, because it was also working on the figures. The hon. Member for Glasgow, Maryhill (Mr. Craigen) has confirmed my recollection that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State had agreed to a scheme then and gave an estimate of the cost.

The hon. Member for Maryhill asked a number of questions. He asked about the reimbursement of rebates. We have in mind, as my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State told COSLA, that 50 per cent. of the estimated amount of rebates will be paid at the end of September. Most of the balance will be paid at the end of December, with the remaining 5 per cent. awaiting a more final figure from the authorities. That met one of the requests made to us by COSLA.

The hon. Gentleman also asked about advertising and the publicity that would be forthcoming from the Scottish Office. Again, we shall give some national publicity to the order, so that eligible ratepayers know that they need to claim, unless they have not heard from their local authority by the time that the local advertisement appears in the press, on or before 23 September. It is important that it is done that way round, because it was decided on the advice of COSLA that the order should be administered in this way.

The hon. Gentleman also asked about the sheriff court appeal and the assessors' concern. The basis of the order is comparison between old and new rateable values on the same property. It is up to local authorities, which are best placed to decide, whether the property is the same. The Scottish Office guidance circular will be discussed with COSLA before we issue it.

The hon. Gentleman asked whether the authorities would deduct the rebates from the rates or pay the rebates in cash. Some authorities advise us that they will do one thing, and others the other. It depends on their procedures. There is provision for both those procedures in the order.

Finally, the hon. Gentleman asked about the rebate payments that might have to be made after a successful appeal. After any valuation appeal is decided, some payment to or from a ratepayer has to take place. If he loses, he has to pay the 10 per cent. that he has deducted from his bill; and if he wins, the authority arranges for him to be credited or paid back. The order provides in article 6 for the revaluation rate to be recalculated, and for this recalculation to be part of the adjustment to the ratepayer's account, which will have to happen anyway. To put it more simply, it will all come out in the wash when the final adjustment is made.

The hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce) made a singularly unconstructive speech. He is obviously still labouring under the impression that giving aid to ratepayers is some form of warped priority, to use his words, on the part of the Government. It became clear that he would rather not have the order, nor the help that is being given to the ratepayers. He told us that he and his hon. Friends will vote against the order unless the three times multiplier is changed. He knows full well that that is in the primary legislation, not in the order, and is not capable of being changed tonight. It was fully debated when the primary legislation went through, and he did not vote against it then. He has shown his true colours today. He has shown, as Liberals so often do, that all they are out for is the main chance. When it becomes clear to the ratepayers of Scotland that the Liberal party was prepared today to stand up and say that it would rather that the ratepayers of Scotland did not get this £30 million, the ratepayers will be able to judge which party has their interests at heart.

Mr. Bruce rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): Has the Minister sat down, or is he giving way?

Mr. Ancram: I have finished, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Resolved,

That the Revaluation Rate Rebates (Scotland) Order 1985, dated 9th July 1985, a copy of which was laid before this House on 10th July, be approved.

EUROPEAN COMMUNITY DOCUMENTS

Motion made, and Question put forthwith pursuant to Standing Order No. 80(5) (Standing Committees on European Community documents).

FOODSTUFFS

That this House takes note of European Community Documents Nos. 6707/85, a proposal for a Council Directive concerning the examination of animals and fresh meat for the presence of residues, and 4793/84, a proposal for a Council Directive concerning sampling and analysis for the monitoring of foodstuffs for human consumption; and in respect of 6707/85 supports the Government's approach in seeking cost-effective arrangements which will benefit consumers and meat traders and in respect of 4793/84 supports the Government's endeavours to reach an acceptable agreement on the proposal.

FUEL

That this House takes note of European Community Documents Nos. 9153/82 and 6544/83, draft Directive and Amendment on crude oil saving through the use of substitute fuel in petrol; and Nos. 8369/83 and 7959/84, draft Directive and Amendment on rationing for commercial road transport between Member States in the case of fuel shortage; and supports the Government's intention to seek implementation of the principles contained therein.—[Mr. Peter Lloyd.]

Question agreed to.

Hospital and Welfare Services (North Down)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Peter Lloyd.]

12.51 am

Mr. James Kilfedder (North Down): I am glad, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that I was successful in obtaining this Adjournment debate, even though it is taking place at nine minutes to 1 o'clock in the morning after a fiercely fought Scottish debate.

Over the years I have taken many opportunities to draw attention to the parsimonious attitude of the Eastern health and social services board to the hospital and welfare services in the North Down area, and I make no apology for doing so once again. However, it is necessary for me to point out that in addition to the other parts of County Down, the Eastern health and social services board also takes within its jurisdiction the whole of the city of Belfast. Throughout the years this ridiculous situation has worked to the detriment of the people in my constituency and elsewhere in County Down. If it were a parliamentary constituency, the authorities would be accused of gerrymandering, because the boundary of the Eastern health and social services board is so eccentric. It works to the disadvantage of the health of those who live outside the city of Belfast, and it works particularly to the disadvantage of those living in the North Down area—an area of ever-increasing population which has already outstripped the available hospital facilities. This is due principally to the drain of finance and resources away from North Down and into west and north Belfast, two areas of declining population.

I blame the Eastern health board and the Department of Health and Social Services for the decline in hospital facilities in the North Down area, but in fairness to both it has to be said that the former Stormont Government began the rot. Direct rule is blamed nowadays for nearly every mishap which occurs in the Province, but we must never forget that it was the former Government at Stormont who agreed that Belfast should be included in the area of the Eastern health board, with North Down, Ards, Downpatrick and other parts of County Down.

The former Stormont Government decided in the early 1970s to build the enormously expensive tower block at the city hospital in Belfast. The cost of that development escalated from £14 million to £60 million. I cannot say that all that money would have gone to the rest of the Eastern health board area if the tower block had not been built, but I am certain that substantial sums and a new hospital have been denied to the North Down area because the tower block voraciously ate up a vast amount of the money available to the Eastern health board.

The former Stormont Government also agreed vast additional capital expenditure for the upgrading of existing hospitals in west and north Belfast, where the population has been declining for years. As a result of those decisions, severe limitations were imposed on the financial resources of the Eastern health board. That is reflected in the cheeseparing of the budgets for Ards and Bangor between 1983 and 1985.

The direct treatment costs at Belfast city hospital total about 55 per cent. of all its costs—about the fifth highest proportion in the Eastern health board area. So far, no estimate has been made of the consequences of bringing the tower block into partial use later this year and into full use next year. If the experience of other hospitals is a good guide, we can expect the direct treatment costs to increase as soon as the new building is brought into daily use. The hefty running costs of the tower block will drain more vital money away from the North Down area, which desperately needs financial help to improve the health, welfare and hospital services of local people.

The people of North Down and Ards live in the fastest growing and most urbanised area of Northern Ireland, and everyone in Northern Ireland recognises that fact. The North Down area plan envisages growth continuing well into the next century. Everyone knows that the proportion of elderly people in the area has increased and is expected to continue to increase for the next few decades.

It is common knowledge that insufficient money has been spent over many years on hospital services for the elderly. I have drawn attention many times to the failure of successive Governments to recognise what is happening to the age distribution of the population, but no action has been taken to ensure that a sensible reallocation of funds is made to take account of the situation.

A few years ago plans were announced for an extension to the geriatric unit at Crawfordsburn hospital, but nothing has been heard of that recently. The plans have been quietly pushed aside and conveniently forgotten by bureaucracy, yet the proper care of the elderly is urgently required in the North Down.

While the Government are preaching that more of the elderly should be cared for at home, the health board's officials are announcing the curtailment of meals on wheels services, the closure of day centres and the cutting of other services intended to encourage our senior citizens to remain in their own homes.

Some people have made representations, as I have, to the Government on behalf of the elderly. We should pay tribute to the contribution to the community that elderly people made over the years of their active lives. I should like to think that in their declining years others would fight their battles for them to ensure their right to a decent life and adequate provision.

I do not oppose the report of the joint review team in its entirety, as some people do. It contains a few good and sensible ideas, but it has its limitations. Some of its proposals are wholly unacceptable, such as the envisaged community hospitals to replace the existing hospitals at Bangor and Ards. During the seven years that the team took to report, millions of pounds were spent on carrying out new building programmes and on equipment in the north and west Belfast areas. Those programmes helped to consolidate the outmoded policies and thinking which had already deprived North Down of a proper hospital service.

The compiling of the report began seven long years ago. It alleges that it deals, not with the cost of hospital services, but solely with the hospital requirements for the next 20 years, and how the assessed needs can or should be met within that period, on the basis of the physical resources presently available and which can reasonably be made available.

I do not believe that the joint review team had costed the availability of finance and general economic trends at the fore when it considered the facilities required for the area. Central to the thinking of the report is the concept of the community hospital. The fact that that concept has not yet been fully accepted or properly thought out has not deterred the team from relying on it. I have not come across one general practitioner in North Down who sees himself helping to staff such a hospital in future. Some doctors, if they have the time available from general practice, are prepared to visit their patients in hospital, but they are not prepared to mislead their patients into believing that a community hospital with the type of profile envisaged by the joint review team report is as good as the present hospital services—bad as those facilities may be in the Bangor hospital.

One of the most valuable aspects of general practitioner services at present is home visiting by consultants. The family doctor finds that sort of support invaluable. It is available because consultants are located in the local hospitals. If changes are made and the consultants then become located in large teaching hospitals, home visiting will be continued with great reluctance. Moreover, visits to local health centres will eventually come to an end.

The financial reality is that the Bangor, Ards and Downpatrick hospitals cost considerably less than any of the hospitals in west and north Belfast. The Royal Victoria group of hospitals consistently overspends its allocation. The Mater hospital now costs more per patient than the Ulster hospital at Dundonald. The waste of money that continues at the Royal Victoria hospital can be gauged from the document entitled the "Redeployment of Resources", which was published in July 1985.

According to the report, the Royal Victoria hospital has been asked to reduce its overspending by £1·5 million. If any further proof were needed to show that the Royal Victoria is the most incompetently managed hospital in Northern Ireland, the report provides it. Yet it is the cost-effective hospitals of the North Down area that are being compelled to make yet another large saving this year, to the grave disadvantage of the people of the North Down area, who deserve better from the Eastern health and social services board.

The board has been less than honest with the report of the joint review team. It has said repeatedly that the report is not a statement of policy and that it is a consultative document only. The consultation period is stated to last until 30 September. That is what the board says, but in his latest letter to me of 5 July the Minister rather gives the game away. He says that he cannot intervene to stop the board taking irreversible decisions. It appears from his letter, however, that he is happy to accept the main thesis of the joint review team's report and that he actually supports it. I hazard a guess that since 1977 the Minister's departmental officials have been pushing that line of hospital development which the report advocates.

Mr. John David Taylor (Strangford): Will the hon. Gentleman give way on that point?

Mr. Kilfedder: As I have told the Minister, I have a great deal of ground to cover.

Mr. Taylor: It is on that very point.

Mr. Kilfedder: I have told the Minister in correspondence that I do not believe that the report of the joint review team is impartial, unbiased or genuine in its examination of the hospital needs of the North Down area over the next——

Mr. Taylor: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Kilfedder: —20 years. I urge the Government to guarantee adequate hospital facilities at the Bangor hospital and the provision of a casualty department. It is extraordinary and unacceptable that there is no casualty department in an area with a high density population, and a population growing year by year.

I urge the Government to provide a new acute hospital in the area between Bangor and Newtownards for the people of North Down. Until such a hospital is built, I urge the Government to designate the Ulster hospital at Dundonald as the hospital for the people of Dundonald and the North Down area. That will prevent patients from being sent to the Belfast hospital, which causes even greater difficulty and stress for their relatives in their efforts to visit them.

The saddest aspect of all recent public expenditure cuts has been the shabby treatment of the elderly in our society. It is indefensible for the Eastern health and social services board to contemplate closing Crawfordsburn hospital, which provides vital geriatric beds in the area. More geriatric beds should be provided at the Ulster hospital at Dundonald, but only in addition to those provided already at the Crawfordsburn hospital.

It is lamentable that the board, which has the Government's backing, has failed to provide sufficient opportunities to give relief to unmarried daughters who have sacrificed their lives for the sake of their elderly parents, looking after the parents when they are no longer able to look after themselves. Those supportive daughters would benefit from a holiday if their relatives could make regular, short-term stays in a geriatric bed in a hospital.

The savage reduction in the home help service has meant that elderly people living on their own do not have sufficient help to enable them to manage. One of the many letters that I have received on the subject of home help and welfare provision for the elderly states:

"My wife suffered a severe stroke 2 yrs. ago, she is now 75 yrs. old, she was in the hospital for a time, until she was over the worst. The stroke left her without power in her left side . . .

We have no home help, only a nurse coming once a week to bathe my wife . . . I will be 80 yrs. old next month and 3 months ago I hurt my back while attending to my wife."

That letter describes the agony and strain suffered by many people who need assistance.

The cuts in the meals on wheels services and the closure of a number of vitally needed community centres for the elderly in North Down will make life more difficult for our senior citizens, who deserve better from bureaucracy and society. One senior citizen wrote me a letter stating:

"Dear Mr Kilfedder

The senior citizens of Kilcooley,"—

in my constituency in Bangor—

"who attend the centre, in Carnalea Meth Church hall, have been told that the centre is closing down. They only have a few hours on Wednesday, and enjoy the activities and lunch (50p) provided. At the moment, they have a quiz going and have got into the finals and are pleased at this achievement, a simple pleasure which costs nothing, so they are to be deprived of even that" by the Eastern health board. The lady mentioned that most of the folk in the centre are in their 70s and 80s.

The public expenditure cuts have not even left out the mentally handicapped in North Down who need more money. The chairman of the Bangor and District Society for the Mentally Handicapped, Mr. Matt Murray, sent me a letter regarding the summer activities scheme at Clifton school for the mentally handicapped at Bangor. The school was told that the health board had decided to cancel the scheme. The chairman of the health board stated:

"The Board regrets any reduction in services to the mentally handicapped but, as you are aware, the Eastern Health and Social Services Board is required to make efficiency savings on an ongoing yearly basis. The Board is doing its upmost to protect priority groups like the mentally handicapped but it is not always possible for them to totally escape the effect of savings."

Eventually, as a result of offers from Barnardo's, it was possible for arrangements to be made for a shorter and less adequate period of summer help. That help is needed by parents to enable them to have a holiday during the nine weeks' summer holiday when their mentally handicapped children would normally be at home. The parents need that period of respite to renew themselves to look after their relatives.

I plead with the Under-Secretary of State to help the people of North Down, who desperately need proper hospital facilities and welfare services.

1.14 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Mr. Chris Patten): The hon. Member for North Down (Mr. Kilfedder) has covered a lot of ground, and I do not have much time in which to reply. He has dealt not only with the long-term proposals for development of hospital services in the area of the Eastern health and social services board, contained in the report of the joint review team, but with the more recent proposals of the Eastern board contained in its consultation document, "Redeployment of Resources." In both cases he has quite understandably concentrated on the effect on the North Down area, which he represents with such distinction.

The first point that I wish to make concerns the status of the different proposals. The development of hospital services in the Eastern board area is essentially a matter for consideration in the first instance by the Eastern board itself. The board is seeking to establish a pattern of hospital provision which will meet the needs of the people of its area in the years ahead, and to that end it is considering the development of hospitals throughout its area, including North Down. The JRT report deals with those long-term considerations and makes a number of recommendations. The board is consulting on those recommendations, and those consultations will continue until 30 September, after which the board will reach decisions on future hospital provision in its area.

The hon. Member referred to what I had said to him in a letter. He was selective in his quotation, because I said that where any decisions taken by the Eastern health board involved the closure or change of use of existing facilities, the formal approval of the Department of Health and Social Services would be required. Where the board decides to close a hospital, there are formal procedures that must be gone through.

Meanwhile, the board has certain financial responsibilities. In common with the other health and social services boards, it is responsible for balancing its budget, for deciding priorities and for living within the available resources. To enable it to live within its enhanced financial allocation for 1985-86, the Eastern board has decided that it needs to look for additional economies. Proposals for achieving them are contained in the document "Redeployment of Resources," and, again, comment from interested parties has been sought by 30 September 1985. It is reasonable to consider both sets of proposals at the same time. It would have been curious had the board decided act in any other way.

I should like to deal, first, with the recommendations in the JRT report specifically—to give it its colloquial name — specifically those which affect the hon. Members constituency. In doing so, I should say once again that these are not proposals of the Eastern board; they are recommendations of the joint review team upon which the Board is currently consulting.

The review team has recommended that Ards and Bangor hospitals should cease to provide acute care and that the main specialties presently provided should transfer to the Ulster hospital at Dundonald. Both hospitals would adopt a supporting role to the Ulster hospital and fulfil the broad functions of community hospitals providing post-operative treatment and convalescent care. In addition, they would provide day surgery and outpatient clinics. Minor casualties would continue to be treated at Ards hospital, but all major casualties would go to the accident and emergency department at the Ulster hospital.

The hon. Member for North Down has talked about the drift of population away from Belfast to areas such as North Down and argued that as a consequence acute hospital facilities should be provided as close as possible to the areas where they are needed. I agree. It is of course, a fact that extension of the catchment population of the Ulster hospital—a point that he mentioned—to include most of the North Down and Ards local government districts is one of the recommendations of the joint review team. The Ulster hospital is accessible to the people of the North Down area. With increasing efficiency in the utilisation of available beds in other Belfast hospitals—a point he properly made — it will surely be a natural development for the Ulster hospital to take an increasing proportion of its work load from the North Down and Ards area.

On the question of geriatric provision, the hon. Member has rightly drawn attention to the importance of providing an adequate number of geriatric beds for the North Down area. In proposing that Crawfordsburn hospital should close because of its unsuitability for the care of long-stay geriatric patients, the joint review team recognised that the inpatient services currently provided there would have to be relocated at the proposed community hospitals in Newtownards and Bangor, and that capital investment might be required to provide some new accommodation for geriatric patients. That recommendation is included in the consultative process which the Eastern board is currently undertaking.

Perhaps in the two minutes that remain I can make some general observations on what the hon. Gentleman said. It is completely untrue for people to suggest that the Health Service or the personal social services in Northern Ireland in the past few years have been subjected to cuts. We have seen a real increase in expenditure on the health and personal social services of about 8 per cent. Per capita spending on the health and personal social services in Northern Ireland is 25 per cent. higher than it is in England and Wales, and in the Eastern board area it it 25 per cent. higher than the average for Northern Ireland. We have maintained capital spending in Northern Ireland over the past five years. None of that suggests cuts.

We have to make more efficient use of the money that we spend on the health services. There is at present an imbalance between acute care and community services.

[Mr. Chris Patten]

We have 30 per cent. more acute care beds in Northern Ireland than on this side of the water. I am very keen to see us develop acute care facilities so that they are nearer to patients, and I am keen to see us develop the role of community hospitals.

I think that whoever stands at this Dispatch Box answering debates such as this for the next 10 years will be making much the same point—that we need to get a better balance between acute care and community services. That is in the interests of the people of the hon. Gentleman's constituency and in the interests of people throughout Northern Ireland. I believe that even if the hon. Gentleman were making this speech — as he might perhaps one day—he would be driven to precisely the same conclusions as I have reached this evening.

Question put and agreed to.

Oral Answers to Questions

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Agricultural Land

1. Mr. Nicholas Baker asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he has received representations about the loss of agricultural land in southern England.

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mrs. Peggy Fenner): I have received no such representations.

Mr. Baker: Is my hon. Friend aware that agricultural land is being lost to development in the south of England at a wholly unacceptable rate? Is she further aware that every acre so lost diminishes our environment and contributes to greater pressure on farmers? Will she add her weight to ensure that that deplorable trend is reversed?

Mrs. Fenner: The Government have a commitment to the protection of agricultural land, and I attach great importance to the protection of such a finite national resource. I am, however, always ready to examine critically the precise methods of implementing the Government's policy in this area.

Mr. Meadowcroft: Does the Minister accept that in southern England, as in Leeds, housing policies have a great deal to do with the loss of agricultural land——

Mr. Speaker: Order. That is what I was hoping would not happen.

Mr. Meadowcroft: I will rephrase my question, Mr. Speaker. For every three old houses demolished, only one can be built, and that inevitably pushes out development. What talks has the Minister had with the Minister for Housing and Construction——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question is about agricultural land.

Consultancy Fees

2. Mr. Stephen Ross asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he has made any studies on the impact of consultancy fees on small farmers.

Mrs. Fenner: I have recently commissioned an independent survey designed to provide information by farming type and size on the industry's current and future use of advisory and related services.

Mr. Ross: Does the Minister accept that the work of the Agricultural Development and Advisory Service over the years has been much appreciated by agriculturists in general? When does she expect to introduce the proposed scale of charges? Will she give us an assurance that the charges will not be unnecessarily high and will not include bureaucratic, fastidious extras?

Mrs. Fenner: Professor Bell, in his report, made a point about the excellence of ADAS, but recommended that the beneficiaries of the services provided by ADAS should contribute to the cost of those services. Detailed work on the implementaion of Professor Bell's report is in hand, and my right hon. Friend hopes to be able to make a further statement on progress before the summer recess.

Mr. Andy Stewart: Does my hon. Friend agree that last year alone we spent £53 million on agricultural education and another £8 million on farm training supported by the agricultural training board? Does she agree that it is a misconceived belief held by Opposition Members that all farmers are thick and welcome such unsolicited advice?

Mrs. Fenner: I am sure that our advice and training services are excellent and of great help to our agriculture industry.

Food and Drink Federation

3. Dr. Twinn asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many meetings he or his officials have had with the Food and Drink Federation in the last 12 months.

Mrs. Fenner: My right hon. Friend or his colleagues have met federation representatives at their invitation five times in the last 12 months. Throughout this period there have been frequent and continuing contacts between my officials and the federation. The most recent meeting at senior level took place on 11 July.

Dr. Twinn: When my hon. Friend next meets members of the Food and Drink Federation, will she be able to give them good news about the imminent introduction of a national voluntary code of practice for nutritional food labelling? Is she aware of the anxiety of people in the industry that the introduction of retailers' schemes, although welcome as a sign of intent, could cause confusion because there is no common standard?

Mrs. Fenner: I am aware that too many systems will confuse the consumer. Comments on the Government's grant guidelines are being evaluated. The Government have already said that they will consider laying regulations concerning the format of nutrition labelling.

Cereal Prices

4. Mr. Latham asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the latest position regarding the negotiations over cereal prices in the Common Market.

5. Mr. Heathcoat-Amory asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he is satisfied with efforts to reduce the European Economic Community grain surplus.

The Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. Michael Jopling): The Agriculture Council earlier this week was again unable to reach agreement on cereal prices. The Commission, however, stated that for the coming marketing year it would apply prices for cereals based on an abatement of 1·8 per cent. It also stated that it would be authorising member states to make an end of season payment for common wheat and rye of breadmaking quality and putting proposals to the management committee to reduce the delay in the payment period for cereals bought into intervention and to operate a special intervention measure for breadmaking wheat towards the end of the 1985-86 marketing year.

The Council will return to the question of cereal prices at future meetings and, in addition, the Commission has said that it intends to bring forward proposals in the autumn for modifying the cereals regime so that decisions on the future of the regime may be taken by the end of 1985.

Mr. Latham: What sort of Fred Karno outfit is it when the non-elected bureaucrats arbitrarily fix cereal prices because the elected Ministers cannot agree? Surely our farmers and consumers deserve a better arrangement.

Mr. Jopling: I agree that this is an uncertain area. The Commission claims that the Council's failure to take decisions is contrary to its obligations under the treaty and that the Commission has a duty to fill the gap as far as possible. The Government do not think that it would be profitable to add to the uncertainty. The price reduction of 1·8 per cent. will therefore be applied in the United Kingdom, pending a final decision by the Council.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: As technology and improved techniques will continue to boost cereal production throughout Europe, is it not vital to have an enforceable and realistic policy of controlling surpluses? As the 1·8 per cent. price cut will not do the trick, and as my right hon. Friend must have a realistic policy, can he tell us what it is?

Mr. Jopling: My hon. Friend has heard me say time and again that discipline by price is the best way in which to control surpluses. The combined result of the Commission's decisions is that the support price for 1 tonne of wheat will fall by an estimated 7 per cent. in real terms in 1985-86. That follows a reduction of more than 9 per cent. in real terms during the previous three seasons.

Mr. J. Enoch Powell: Is the Minister satisfied about the legality and propriety of the method by which the 1·8 per cent. abatement is being made?

Mr. Jopling: As the right hon. Gentleman knows, there is a precedent for the Commission moving in, in circumstances such as these, when there is a legal vacuum. The Government do not think that it would be profitable to add to the uncertainty.

Mr. Torney: Is the Minister aware that this country has a surplus of 4 million tonnes of grain and 3 million tonnes of wheat used mainly for animal feed, which is not required? Is he further aware that putting goods into intervention costs the British taxpayer £40 million a year? What is he going to do about that appalling situation?

Mr. Jopling: I would have hoped that the hon. Gentleman would applaud the efforts that I have been making to apply even stronger cereal price cuts. I should have thought that he would agree with me that it was a significant step forward over the past three years to have had a reduction of 9 per cent. in real terms. The Commission's decision for this year implies a reduction of a further 7 per cent. in real terms.

Mr. Deakins: As an important principle is at stake here—whether the Commission has the power to overrule and override the veto of a member Government—will the Minister confer with his colleagues about the possibility of having the matter referred to the European Court of Justice for a ruling?

Mr. Jopling: It is not the Government's intention at the moment to refer this matter to the court. Under the guarantee threshold arrangement, this year there should have been a reduction of 5 per cent. There is, therefore, a strong argument for saying that there should be a reduction in cereal prices this year, although I wish that the reduction was more than 1·8 per cent.

Mr. Parris: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the failure to reach a decision, however looked at, is disastrous for the Community? Can he explain what will happen about storage, given that there is already a record amount of grain in intervention store in this country and that a record amount of cereals has been planted and is about to be harvested? What will happen to the new crop?

Mr. Jopling: My hon. Friend is a brave man to assert that there will be a record harvest. That is not a certainty. I hope that he will reflect on the fact that over the years there has been a major change in the attitude of the Council of Ministers and the Commission, and that although three years ago we were talking about a double digit increase in cereal prices, this year there will be a fall of 7 per cent. in the price of this season's wheat in real terms.

Mr. John: Does not the fact that Ministers were talking about a two-figure price increase so recently mean that the position is desperate? Will he confirm that the Commission's report reckons that the profit margin on cereals throughout the Community is between 20 and 30 per cent. and that this year's end of season stocks will be 10 million tonnes higher than last year? What hope do we have that in the autumn, or at any other time, the Commission will be less feeble and Ministers less faint-hearted than they have shown themselves to be this summer?

Mr. Jopling: I hope that the hon. Gentleman will give me credit for having been the most robust Minister in arguing in the Council of Ministers for reduced prices. I was the only member of the Council of Ministers who argued consistently that cereal prices should be reduced by the full 5 per cent. that was implicit in the guarantee threshold. I shall continue to argue in that way.

Sea Fisheries Committees

6. Mr. Patrick Nicholls asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the operation of Sea Fisheries Committees byelaws.

Mrs. Fenner: Sea fisheries committees, through the application of byelaws, can make a valuable contribution to fisheries conservation at local level. We are satisfied with the operation of those byelaws, but we recognise that the procedures governing their confirmation, set out in a statutory instrument dating from 1938, need to be brought up to date. A revision is now under discussion with the SFCs.

Mr. Nicholls: Will that revision take into account the circumstances in which scallop fishermen in my constituency can find themselves, namely, that their licences have been revoked by the Southern sea fisheries committee and that the advertisements giving notice of that intention are put into newspapers which the committee knows do not circulate in the area in which those fishermen live? Does that not amount to a substantial injustice? Will the Minister consider using her powers to revoke that byelaw, because an injustice has resulted?

Mrs. Fenner: I appreciate the difficulty with the present statutory advertising procedures for fishermen outside the district covered by that sea fisheries committee. Those advertisements were placed in seven local newspapers, and the committee met the statutory requirement. However, I do not accept that the restrictions imposed to safeguard scallop fisheries in the southern district were unjust. We are considering whether it would be advantageous to require SFCs to advertise in the trade press, which is widely read in the industry.

Dr. Godman: To what extent is the north-east England drift net fishery shaped by sea fisheries committee byelaws? The Minister must know that there is a growing demand in Scotland for that fishery to be outlawed. Will she ensure that the interests of those fishermen are not harmed by any changes in the law?

Mrs. Fenner: We are considering the net fisheries in the north-east area, and future arrangements for it are under review. We hope to announce our conclusions soon. A later question on the Order Paper may also relate to that matter.

Mr. Beith: Does the Minister recognise that the Northumberland sea fisheries committee is an extremely experienced body in the operation of its byelaws? Will she take good account of its advice on the matter raised by the hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman), and on the Scottish Office's proposed regulations on the carrying of monofilament nets by boats? Will she ensure that the advice of the Northumberland sea fisheries committee is taken fully into account?

Mrs. Fenner: We always listen to the wise advice of the sea fisheries committees.

Mr. Soames: Does my hon. Friend agree that the sea fisheries committees could take a notable lead by banning the use of monofilament nets, as has already happened in Scotland? Why will the Ministry not do the same for England and Wales?

Mrs. Fenner: We have no evidence that monofilament nets cause any more damage to fish escaping than do mutlifilament nets. We have no intention of introducing a general ban.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Where sea water netsmen for salt water species find that their interests come into direct conflict with those of anglers on rivers, how does the Minister propose to resolve that dilemma? Is she aware that in west Cumbria it is almost impossible for sea netsmen to lay their fixed engine nets and that the law no longer favours them, although it should favour both sides?

Mrs. Fenner: The Ministry can review all such fisheries. As I said earlier, we are examining the north-east net fisheries for that very reason.

Mr. Mark Hughes: Will the Minister think again about monofilament nets? All the evidence shows that they are a disgrace and should be banned throughout our inshore fishing areas. Does she accept that the Opposition would welcome an urgent revision of all sea fisheries committee byelaws and the necessary statutory instrument to bring that about?

Mrs. Fenner: I assure the hon. Gentleman that the Ministry's directorate of fisheries research keeps the effect of those nets under constant review.

Food Manufacture (Transport Costs)

9. Mr. Thurnham asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will provide figures for 1984 for the percentage cost of the transport element of food manufacture costs in the United Kingdom and the European Economic Community.

Mrs. Fenner: On average, transport costs probably represent about 5 per cent. of food manufacturers' costs in the United Kingdom, but there will inevitably be considerable differences between manufacturers. I am not aware of the position being markedly different in the European Community as a whole.

Mr. Thurnham: I thank my hon. Friend for her answer. Is she aware that the CBI has said that transport costs in Britain are twice as high as those in the rest of the EC? Will she consider those differences further?

Mrs. Fenner: The evidence that I have described does not show that to be the case, but any evidence that United Kingdom manufacturers are being disadvantaged because of transport costs should be passed to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport.

Mr. John: Does not the huge concentration of food processing plants in the south-east of England involve a double journey of food from the growing areas to the processing plants and back again to be sold? Should we not encourage food processing plants to be dispersed throughout the regions, thus avoiding such extra expense?

Mrs. Fenner: There has been some reallocation of food processing plants through the regional programme. The Centre for Physical Distribution Management, in a survey of distribution costs in the United Kingdom last year, found that transport costs of food, drink and tobacco manufacturers were on an average 5·77 per cent. of sales. The figure varied tremendously between firms, from 0·35 per cent. to 9·97 per cent.

Aujeszky's Disease

10. Mr. Freud asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how much has been paid in compensation to pig farmers for losses incurred because of Aujeszky's disease in each of the last three years; what is the aggregate loss to farmers; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. Jopling: About £25·3 million has been paid to owners in compensation for slaughter of pigs affected with the disease — £21·5 million was paid in 1983, £3·4 million in 1984 and £350,000 so far this year. In addition, I understand that Pig Disease Eradication Fund Ltd. paid about £3·7 million for disruption costs. It is not possible to give a total figure for farmers' losses in the campaign.

Mr. Freud: I thank the Minister for that reply. Will he show some sympathy to the industry, which tried to follow his philosophy of helping itself, only to find that the costs were vastly in excess of the estimates? Is it right for the Government to escape completely from the consequences of what the Standing Committee called at least a failure of communications, and at worst maladministration?

Mr. Jopling: The hon. Gentleman will recall that this scheme was started at the express wish of the industry, and it was on the absolute understanding that it was to be producer-financed. As the hon. Gentleman has been honest enough to acknowledge, the figure of £6 million was an estimate. I remind him that my Department has already contributed more than £3 million in veterinary and administrative resources and in laboratory testing. I remind him as well that the Select Committee, in paragraph 23 of its report, said:

"it does not appear that MAFF has any contractual obligations to bail out the industry".

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop: Is my right hon. Friend aware that although no Standing Committee has reported on this matter, contrary to what the hon. Member for Cambridgeshire, North-East (Mr. Freud) has said, the Select Committee on Agriculture has done so? Does my right hon. Friend accept the obligation which the House knows falls upon him and the recommendations of that Select Committee report? Does he not have a statutory duty to take an effective interest in the prevention of animal disease in this country for the benefit of the nation as a whole, not just of agricultural producers? If my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland can get £50 million a year to reduce the rates burden, cannot my right hon. Friend the Minister for Agriculture, Fisheries and Food get a few more million pounds to help to put the eradication fund back into solvency?

Mr. Jopling: The Select Committee report makes it clear that

"it does not appear that MAFF has any contractual obligations to bail out the industry".

Estimates were made, and it was made clear that one could not be precise about how much this disease would cost. I am bound to draw to the attention of my hon. Friend, although he may know it already, that the fund's overdraft of £14 million has been made a good deal higher because of the just short of £4 million of extra costs represented by consequential losses, which were paid out by the fund against my Department's advice. I do not believe that, in spite of the Select Committee's report, there is a duty on my Department to bail out in this case.

Mr. Haynes: Is the Minister aware that I get the distinct impression that he is standing at the Dispatch Box bragging about how much the Government are paying in compensation? What sort of effort are the Government, especially the Minister, making to stamp out the disease? That is what my farmers want to know. Let us hear about it.

Mr. Jopling: I am delighted to hear of the hon. Gentleman's great interest in the matter. Since the scheme began in March 1983, 500 herds, including 420,000 pigs, have been slaughtered. Since June 1984, only 17 cases have been confirmed, compared with 92 in May 1983 at the height of the campaign. There are likely to be a few remaining foci of infection, and the efforts of the state veterinary services are geared to identifying those few remaining cases.

Mr. Key: Does my right hon. Friend agree that pig farmers are not financial experts, that the sum is modest compared with the rest of the agriculture budget, and that he is setting a dangerous precedent if he says that the Government will not be responsible for parts of the agricultural sector, if farmers have agreed otherwise, even if there is a risk of disease? One can, in particular, foresee antibiotic problems in fish farming.

Mr. Jopling: In this case we had a scheme to deal with a disease, on which the industry placed high priority. The scheme was embarked upon at the specific request of the industry, on the absolute understanding that it was to be producer-financed and that Government money would not be involved. In spite of that, my Department has spent more than £3 million monitoring the programme. That is an extremely generous sum.

Mr. Mark Hughes: Does the Minister accept that to hide behind the absence of a contractural obligation is unacceptable to the farmers, that animal health is his responsibility, and that ultimately he must pay for the good health of our pig population?

Mr. Jopling: I do not accept that. The industry said that it wanted to operate the scheme and would finance it. We said that the cost would be at least £6 million, and it has cost more than that. We made it clear that estimating how much it would cost was an unpredictable science. We should not pay any more towards the scheme on top of the £3 million.

Confectionery Exports

11. Mr. Gregory asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what value are the United Kingdom's exports of confectionery for the last year for which figures are available.

Mrs. Fenner: Overseas trade statistics for 1984 provisionally value exports of sugar confectionery, not containing cocoa, and chocolate confectionery at £239,039,000.

Mr. Gregory: In view of the importance of that key sector of the economy, will my hon. Friend, who represents the sponsoring Ministry, hold discussions with the representatives of overseas states which seek to restrict the import of confectionery? They are fixing artificial barriers to a leading food export product, and the sooner they understand that those artificial barriers are not in the interest of world trade, the better.

Mrs. Fenner: We are well aware of the industries involved. My hon. Friend discussed the matter with the Cocoa Chocolate and Confectionery Alliance at a meeting on 26 June, and it was the subject of an Adjournment debate on 24 May. We made it clear that we would continue to take every opportunity to dissuade United States authorities from imposing restrictions. Meanwhile, we remain in close touch with the United Kingdom trade and the Commission.

Mr. Hardy: Does the Minister accept that the British confectionary industry is excellent and should be enjoying a greater share of the export trade? Will the Government ensure that both the United States of America and our Common Market partners are not allowed to erect artificial barriers, so enabling the industry to maintain and achieve the markets that it deserves?

Mrs. Fenner: I hope I made it clear that we shall argue the case strongly and in every forum that we can. The Government are committed to promoting exports and assisting exporters.

Mr. Greenway: What is the value of our imports of confectionery? In view of the high standard of our industry, why do we need imports?

Mrs. Fenner: I cannot find the figure for the value of imports. I can tell my hon. Friend only that the value of our exports is £40 million to the United States alone.

Mr. Meadowcroft: Is not one of the constraints imposed by other countries the requirement for much more detailed listing of the sugar content of confectionery? Is that not a perfectly proper thing to do, which we would value in this country, so that people may choose what they eat?

Mrs. Fenner: We are not convinced that that is a perfectly proper thing to do. That is the case that we are making.

Common Agricultural Policy

14. Mr. Marlow asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will estimate the cost of levies and duties to the average family of four due to the common agricultural policy arising from the difference between farmgate prices and cif to the United Kingdom port prices plus port charges, but excluding all European Economic Community tariffs and duties, for major traded agricultural commodities.

Mrs. Fenner: In 1984 the United Kingdom collected some £387 million of levies and duties on imports of agricultural products from countries outside the European Community, equivalent on average to about 53p per week for a family of four.

Mr. Marlow: As my hon. Friend knows, agricultural support before we joined the Community was paid through taxation. Now agricultural support is paid through the common agricultural policy and through the infinitely higher price that Community produce sustains compared with world market prices. Effectively, that is a food tax on the consumer. I am sure that my hon. Friend would like eveybody to know what the factors are in the argument. Will she develop that theme so that we may know from week to week and month to month what food tax consumers in this country are paying?

Mrs. Fenner: Any question that my hon. Friend wants to table about the effects of levies similar to the one that I have just answered will, of course, be answered. However, I know my hon. Friend's views on Europe. Security of supply in Europe is valuable, too, although we are confronted with some surplus now, and there are other very good reasons for our membership of the Community.

Milk Quotas

15. Mr. Colin Shepherd asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will issue advice to dairy farmers with milk quotas who wish to acquire further quota by means of leasing or purchase.

Mr. Jopling: I am actively pursuing in Brussels changes to the Community regulations to allow quota to be transferred separately from land. There is resistance, however, and I cannot predict the outcome of our negotiations at this stage.

Mr. Shepherd: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for that reply. Does he agree that one of the fundamental planks of the solution to the problem is knowing how long the quotas will stay, or whether quotas will be taken off or revised? Will my right hon. Friend press that point so that the industry is given the underlying confidence to enable it to plan?

Mr. Jopling: As my hon. Friend knows, quotas were introduced for a period of five years, with a review at the end of three years. I was interested to see recently that the National Farmers Union issued a press statement saying that it hopes that quotas will remain. I understand that it would be an important matter if there were a free sale of quotas separately from land, but I do not believe that we shall be able to move towards taking a view one way or the other at least until the review at the end of the third year.

Mr. Geraint Howells: I am sure that the Minister is well aware that many dairy farmers in Britain are in dire financial trouble because of the Government's policy. He is well aware that he introduced a policy that was unacceptable to the people. Does he accept that many dairy farmers are trying to advise the Government to introduce a scheme to look after the interests of those who were severly hit in 1983-84?

Mr. Jopling: I congratulate the hon. Member on what appears to be his reappointment as agricultural spokesman for the Liberal party. I note what he said about milk quotas. Travelling around the country as he does, I am sure he has discovered that farmers are becoming increasingly accustomed to working with milk quotas and seem to be attaching some importance to their continuance.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: Will my right hon. Friend accept that the acquisition by lease or straightforward purchase of an additional quota by dairy farmers is the only way that some of them will be able to remain in business and avoid having to sell some of their land or perhaps the whole farm? Will he give some guidance on, and inject some urgency into, the problem along the lines of the question asked originally by my hon. Friend the Member for Hereford (Mr. Shepherd)?

Mr. Jopling: My hon. Friend takes a close interest in these matters. He will know that I have said repeatedly that I should like to move as soon as possible to the leasing and sale of quotas. That will be done when we can get more support from other member states and from the Commission. At the moment, it would mean major changes in both Community and domestic legislation, and the Community and some member states are strongly resisting a sale and purchase scheme. It therefore follows that changes will be difficult to achieve, and I cannot predict the outcome of negotiations. I am pressing as hard as I can to get a leasing of quotas to meet the problem to which my hon. Friend has drawn our attention.

Mr. Nicholson: Will the Minister give serious consideration to the plight of the young dairy farmer who is in a position neither to purchase nor to lease a quota? Will he consider giving such people a start on the bottom of the ladder so that they may have a future? Without young dairy farmers coming in, the industry will eventually die.

Mr. Jopling: The hon. Gentleman will have heard me say many times that because of the problems of the young man starting in the dairy industry it is important to get more flexibility into the system. I have said that from the beginning, and I shall continue to do what I can to secure that flexibility.

Sir Hector Monro: Does my right hon. Friend agree that it would be most helpful if we could get a united front in this country? Does he think that it would be a good idea to bring together the Country Landowners Association and the NFU so that they can reach a common decision? Does he further agree that the Liberal spokesman is probably away discussing the rating of agricultural land?

Mr. Jopling: Events are moving so fast that I am not sure who is to be the Liberal spokesman on agriculture.

We are doing what we can to get a united view among all interested parties about how quotas could be made more flexible.

Mr. John: We cannot be sure who many of the party spokesmen will be in the autumn.

Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that one of the problems with quotas is that in the Community more milk is being produced than is being consumed? Will he bear in mind that that is an urgent problem which needs to be faced by the Council of Ministers? If it is not dealt with, we shall have another panic measure in a few years' time.

Mr. Jopling: The hon. Gentleman has put his finger on a most important point. Many people tend to forget that this year we shall produce about 98 million tonnes of milk and consumption will be about 85 million tonnes. That is why the Commission is currently examining the possibility of another buy-out scheme financed either wholly or partly by the Community, in order to cancel that quota and reduce the 13 million tonnes surplus.

Beef Industry

16. Sir John Farr asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the level of returns in the beef fattening industry.

Mr. Jopling: In the first half of 1985 producer returns, taken as market price plus variable premium for finished beef cattle, were slightly lower than in the corresponding period of 1984. This reduction was, however, partly offset by lower prices of compound feedingstuffs.

Sir John Farr: I congratulate my right hon. Friend on his efforts to retain the beef premium scheme, which has made so much difference to the industry, but does he agree that the business of beef fattening and finishing has now become so unprofitable that there is a real risk of the English beef joint disappearing from the Sunday dinner table?

Mr. Jopling: I am grateful for what my hon. Friend said about the variable premium payments, which are worth between £2 million and £3 million a week to the industry. Intervention has played a greater role since the introduction of the carcase classification grid last year. The United Kingdom intake is now running at about 1,000 tonnes of forequarters per week. The suckler cow subsidy was doubled to £24·74 per cow last year. This year, the hill livestock compensatory allowances have become available in marginal areas for the first time. In addition, private storage aid was made available earlier this year.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Mr. O'Brien asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 18 July.

The Prime Minister (Mrs. Margaret Thatcher): This morning I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in this House I shall be having further meetings later today.

Mr. O'Brien: Is the Prime Minister aware of the hardship and suffering that her Government are causing all people, but patients especially, because of the restricted drug list in the National Health Service? Is she aware also that old people now have to pay between £7 and £10 a week to obtain the drugs that they require, for which there are no alternatives? Will she shake up the Department of Health and Social Security, which admitted in a letter dated 17 June that it had not the resources to reply to the letters of complaint that it was receiving, to make sure that hon. Members can obtain information about what is likely to happen in the future? Will she take steps to make sure that the Department is overhauled and that the restructured list is extended?

The Prime Minister: I do not accept what the hon. Gentleman said about the prescribed drug list. Every penny that is saved by prescribing generic drugs instead of specific named drugs goes back into patient care and therefore enables more medical services to be supplied. I should have expected the hon. Gentleman to be grateful for that. I shall look into his complaint about the Department's failure to reply to letters.

Mr. Neil Thorne: Will my right hon. Friend find time today to condemn all racial harassment? Will she condemn especially those who jump to conclusions about these issues in advance of police investigations, especially in the Kassam case in my constituency?

The Prime Minister: I gladly join my hon. Friend in condemning unreservedly all racial harassment. It should not occur in a country such as ours. If it does, it must be dealt with. I agree with my hon. Friend that the specific case to which he refers is a matter for investigation and that it is not for us to jump to conclusions.

Mr. Hattersley: Since the Department of Health and Social Security now concedes that it possesses figures for both gainers and losers under the Government's new social security plans, why did the Prime Minister pretend that no such figures existed?

The Prime Minister: I have made it perfectly clear in the House that illustrative figures will be published at the right time when decisions have been taken on the White Paper and that no effective figures could be published until then.

Mr. Hattersley: If the figures had only this minimal importance, why was the paper which included them withdrawn from civil servants for destruction, on instructions from the Department, immediately after the Prime Minister made her dubious statement to the House a month ago?

The Prime Minister: I have made it very clear that the time to publish a range of figures is when decisions have been taken on the structure at the time of the publication of the White Paper. Other figures would be purely speculative. I note that the right hon. Gentleman has nothing more significant to ask.

Mr. Hattersley: The Prime Minister must know that she is wholly unconvincing when she tells us that the Department of Health and Social Security called in a paper and had it shredded for figures that were wholly speculative. Is it not more likely to be the case that she wanted to suppress the figures because they demonstrate that under her proposals 1·8 million families will lose housing benefit altogether, and 600,000 families will be denied supplementary benefit?

The Prime Minister: The right hon. Gentleman will recall that, when the Leader of the Opposition was asked about his figures, he said:

"I am not going to put figures on two or three years hence."

If we wished to conceal figures, we would hardly have undertaken to give an illustrative range of figures in the White Paper this autumn. We could hardly have wanted to be concealed that which we intend to reveal when the time is appropriate.

Q2. Mr. Michael Brown asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 18 July.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Michael Brown: With over 40 per cent. of tax revenues coming from those on below average income, does my right hon. Friend agree that, if we are to help the low paid, tax cuts must be the priority in her deliberations with her Cabinet colleagues?

The Prime Minister: Yes, I accept that tax cuts are a priority. As my hon. Friend is aware, we have done a great deal to increase the tax-free allowances. We have put up the tax-free allowances in our time by 20 per cent. in real terms. There is more to be done because, as my hon. Friend is aware, some 40 per cent. of pensioners come into the range of income tax and, as he has already said, many people below average earnings pay far too much income tax.

Mr. Steel: Will the Prime Minister deny the reports that were circulating last week that, instead of attending the world conference of Finance Ministers with the IMF and the World Bank in October, the Chancellor of the Exchequer will be attending the Conservative party conference at Blackpool? Does she agree that it is time for British leadership on issues such as interest rates, currency stability, the fight against recession, Third world development, and debt, and will she tell her right hon. Friend that he really ought to go to the world conference?

The Prime Minister: I am surprised that the right hon. Gentleman thinks it surprising that the Chancellor should think it important to be at a party conference. I wonder whether the right hon. Gentleman would not put off certain engagements to be at his own party conference.

Mr. Parris: With so many more newsworthy issues facing my right hon. Friend, will she not forget the problems that face agriculture as we go into the summer still with no agreement on cereals, and with a regime on dairy products which faces with ruin many small dairy farmers in hill and marginal land?

The Prime Minister: I am indeed aware that many small farmers have been placed in difficulty. As my hon. Friend is aware, we had to take action on the common agricultural policy, but it does not make sense to pour more and more money into surpluses. Therefore, we are taking action steadily to bring down the surpluses. I think that that is correct.

Q3. Mr. Wareing asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 18 July.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Wareing: Would the right hon. Lady care to define to the House and to the 11,000 people who had their homes repossessed last year because they could not pay their mortgages, 40 per cent. of whom went into arrears because of unemployment, the term "property-owning democracy"?

The Prime Minister: A record number—over 60 per cent.—of all people in houses own their own homes. That is excellent, and is in no way counteracted by the fact that a very small percentage have had their homes repossessed. The number of people having difficulties in meeting their mortgage payments is still well under 1 per cent. of the total.

Q4. Mr. Michael Forsyth asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 18 July.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Forsyth: In view of my right hon. Friend's reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes (Mr. Brown) recognising the vital importance of tax cuts in generating economic growth and job creation, will she consider introducing an accelerated programme of disposal of state assets in order to support significant cuts in tax rates over a number of years? Will she recognise that that would have the added benefit of restoring much more of the economy to the disciplines of the competitive private sector?

The Prime Minister: Yes. It is important to go ahead with the privatisation programme for its own sake. It improves the performance of former nationalised industries, it enables many people working in those industries to come into share ownership for the first time and it enables managers to manage on a commercial basis. All those are good things in themselves and they help to reduce taxation.

Mr. Torney: Will the Prime Minister give further consideration during her busy day to her decision to abolish wages councils for workers aged under 21? I represent the Union of Shop, Distributive and Allied Workers, which has a mass of members who come under the wages councils. Will the Prime Minister realise, as those people do, that her Government, having created mass unemployment, are using it to cut the standard of living of thousands of young workers throughout the country, including members of my union who know that their conditions will be worsened by the Government's action? Will the Prime Minister reconsider her decision and not abolish the wages councils?

The Prime Minister: No. The decision announced by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Employment yesterday will, I believe, improve the employment prospects of young people and will be a further step towards relieving the burden of regulations on small businesses. I remind the hon. Gentleman that 16 wages councils have been abolished since 1969, and 14 were abolished by Labour Governments.

Q6. Mr. Jim Spicer asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 18 July.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Spicer: My right hon. Friend will be aware that the major problems in famine areas are the provision of transport and lack of infrastructure. Will she take advantage of next week's meeting in Washington of party leaders of the International Democrat Union to press for better co-operation in those areas, if necessary, by the secondment of NATO military personnel to the United Nations?

The Prime Minister: I am reluctant to try to do that centrally through the United Nations, as I do not think that it would be the best way. There is a United Nations relief co-ordinator in the stricken areas, including Ethiopia. We co-operate through him and he asks for bilateral military aid where it is required. As my hon. Friend knows, we have been giving considerable help in Ethiopia through the Hercules and by other means. I think that that bilateral action, through the United Nations local special co-ordinator, is the best way to continue.

Mr. Hume: In the light of the Prime Minister's statement to the American Bar Association earlier this week that no ransom would be paid for kidnapped people in this country, will she tell me why the Government have never taken action against insurance companies in the City of London which conduct a multi-million pound business providing insurance cover against ransoms after kidnaps? Does she agree that the existence of such policies is an encouragement to kidnapping, as is proved by the fact that everybody kidnapped in Britain and Ireland by terrorists over the past number of years held such policies?

The Prime Minister: I tend to agree with the hon. Gentleman that the existence of such policies is conducive to kidnapping and can encourage the kidnapper in his terrible work.

Q7. Sir Fergus Montgomery asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 18 July.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Sir Fergus Montgomery: Has my right hon. Friend noticed that a CBI report forecasts that 370,000 new jobs will be created in 1985? Does she agree that if that is realised 1 million new jobs will have been created since the last election? Is that not something to give hope to the unemployed?

The Prime Minister: The CBI report certainly gives hope. I hope that young people will be encouraged by the fact that 640,000 new jobs have been created in the last two years. As the news from Eurostat shows, more new jobs have been created in Britain in the last year than in the whole of the rest of the European Community.

Mr. Willie W. Hamilton: Now that the House is about to go into recess, will the Prime Minister give a message of comfort to the nation and the House that she will not undertake any official visits during the recess?

The Prime Minister: Many people who have made important invitations would take considerable discomfort from such a reply.

Business of the House

3.31 pm

Mr. Roy Hattersley (Birmingham, Sparkbrook): May I ask the Leader of the House to state the business for next week?

The Lord Privy Seal and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. John Biffen): Yes, Sir. The business until the Adjournment will be as follows:

MONDAY 22 JULY — Consideration of Lords amendments to the Social Security Bill, the Interception of Communications Bill and the Sporting Events (Control of Alcohol, Etc.) Bill.

Remaining stages of the Bankruptcy (Scotland) Bill [Lords].

Motion on the House of Commons Disqualification Act 1975.

Motion on European Community Document No. 9427/79 draft directive on the approximation of the laws, regulations and administrative provisions of all member states concerning liability for defective products.

The Chairman of Ways and Means has named opposed private business for consideration at seven o'clock.

TUESDAY 23 JULY—A debate on a Government motion to approve the statement of changes in immigration rules laid on 15 July (House of Commons Paper No. 503).

Motion relating to the statement of changes in immigration rules, Cmnd. 9539.

Remaining stages of the Child Abduction and Custody Bill [Lords].

WEDNESDAY 24 JULY — Motion for the summer Adjournment. It will be proposed that the House should adjourn until Monday 21 October.

Proceedings on the Consolidated Fund (Appropriation) Bill.

THURSDAY 25 JULY—Motions on orders and regulations relating to the uprating of social security benefits and other related matters.

Motion relating to the Housing Benefit (Miscellaneous Amendments) Regulations. Details of relevant documents will appear in the Official Report.

FRIDAY 26 JULY — Debates on the motion for the Adjournment.

European Community documents to be debated:

Monday 22 July

Relevant documents

9427/79 Liability for Defective Products Explanatory Memorandum by the Department of Trade and Industry dated 1 July 1985

Report by the Government Actuary on the draft of the Social Security Benefits Uprating Order 1985, Cmnd. 9567.

Uprating of mobility allowance Statement prepared pursuant to section 37A(4) of the Social security Act 1975 as amended by Section 3(2) of the Social Security Act 1979

(House of Commons Paper No. 491)

Mr. Hattersley: May I ask the Leader of the House two specific questions? In the light of today's publication of the report by the Select Committee on Defence about the future of the royal dockyards which unanimously condemns the Ministry of Defence's approach to privatisation and the Ministry's failure properly to consult, may we be categorically promised an early debate and that no action will be taken until the debate is held? Secondly, after the Sporting Events (Control of Alcohol, Etc.) Bill is passed — I hope that it will be and that my hon. Friends will ensure that it is—are we to hear no more about violence and safety at football grounds? Is it a fact that after the Prime Minister made the headlines in Downing street two months ago we are to be left simply with that wholly inadequate measure?

Mr. Biffen: Public order legislation has been promised for the next Session of Parliament and doubtless will feature prominently in our discussions then. We shall consider the right hon. Gentleman's first point through the usual channels.

Sir Anthony Grant (Cambridgeshire, South-West): Has my right hon. Friend seen early-day motion 895?

[That this House believes that, in the interest of obtaining better value for money, local authorities should be required by law to submit to competitive tender a wider range of their functions and services.]

It stands in my name and those of no fewer than 191 of my colleagues. It seeks to compel feeble local authorities, in the interest of ratepayers, to submit their contracts to competitive tender. Although I accept that there may not be time to debate this matter before the House rises for the recess, can my right hon. Friend assure us that the Government have not lost their nerve on this issue, even if some local authorities have?

Mr. Biffen: My hon. Friend is a touch pessimistic in the sense that there are a number of opportunities during the week ahead when that matter might be debated. I shall certainly draw the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment to that point.

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed): Will the Secretary of State for Education and Science make a statement next week on the Prime Minister's proposal to reintroduce direct grant schools and student loans, or does the Secretary of State need more notice of these proposals, in which case he might prefer to make the statement after the recess? Why will the debate on Tuesday on the immigration changes be taken on a Government motion rather than on a prayer tabled by my colleagues? Are the Government so desperate to get their word in first?

Mr. Biffen: It is a sign of the seriousness that the Government attach to this matter that the subject will be debated on a Government motion. I am surprised that the hon. Gentleman finds anything extraordinary in that.

Of course I shall draw the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science to the hon. Gentleman's first point. I am sure that he will not have overlooked the fact that Tuesday is Question Time on education matters.

Sir Kenneth Lewis (Stamford and Spalding): Is my right hon. Friend aware that many Conservative Members support what my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister said about direct grant schools? It is extraordinary that the hon.

[Sir Kenneth Lewis]

Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) had the nerve to raise that matter since it was the president of the SDP, when she was in the Labour party, who did away with those schools. If we cannot bring back direct grant schools, will the Cabinet realistically discuss some means of increasing the number of free places that are available in public schools and make all public schools give some free places to children who do not have the chances that I had as a boy when I went to grammar school?

Mr. Biffen: My hon. Friend has clearly shown that Parliament will have a lively debate on this topic, and dare I suggest that it might start on Tuesday.

Mr. James Molyneaux (Lagan Valley): Can the Leader of the House confirm that, following consultations through the usual channels, the Nursing Homes and Nursing Agencies (Northern Ireland) Order will not be moved tomorrow so that further discussions can take place?

Mr. Biffen: That is perfectly true. I am grateful for the representations that were made last week which gave rise to that change.

Mr. Ivan Lawrence (Burton): Is my right hon. Friend aware that I am grateful that the Water (Fluoridation) Bill was not included in the Government's timetable while I was in Moscow with the Select Committee on Foreign Affairs? This shows that the Government are open to further argument on the matter. Is the reason why that legislation is not included in next week's business the fact that the Government may be having second thoughts because Mrs. McColl has been granted full legal aid to go to the European Court of Human Rights and that the Government wisely consider that it is better to hear the results of the court's findings before jumping too quickly into legislation?

Mr. Biffen: While my hon. and learned Friend was getting a preliminary sense of Siberia, a number of Conservative Members made the most powerful representations to the Government to ensure that the legislation reached the statute book.

Mr. James Hamilton (Motherwell, North): Is the Leader of the House aware that all Scottish Back Benchers, with one exception, are very much concerned about the corporate plan for steel? Will he give the House a categorical assurance that no decision will be taken on the corporate plan until the House resumes after the summer recess? Will he assure us also that there will be no inspired leaks and that hon. Members will have all the rights in the world to discuss the corporate plan?

Mr. Biffen: I understand the hon. Gentleman's point and the importance of the decisions for Scotland that will be implied in the corporate plan. I shall ensure that his views are conveyed to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry.

Sir Dudley Smith (Warwick and Leamington): In view of the anxieties that are being expressed by the Confederation of British Industry and other representative elements of industry about product liability and the directive which will probably be issued from Brussels in the near future, does not my right hon. Friend think that it is time that we had a debate about this matter because of its very wide ramifications?

Mr. Biffen: I wholly sympathise with my hon. Friend if he nodded during the litany that I announced for Monday's business, which includes precisely the debate that he seeks.

Mr. Dave Nellist (Coventry, South-East): Given the generosity of young people, particularly last weekend at Wembley and in Philadelphia, is it not time that the Leader of the House arranged a debate to illuminate the hypocrisy of his Government, and in particular the hypocrisy of the Prime Minister who on Monday and Tuesday attempted to bask in the reflected glory of the actions of young people over the weekend and then on Wednesday turned on those same young people and removed those under the age of 21 from the protection of wages councils, as if lads and lasses in hairdressers earning £33·40 a week were responsible for the 5 million unemployed in this country?

Mr. Biffen: I always enjoy the contributions of the hon. Gentleman. They are a lively reminder that consensus, thank Heaven, will never reign here. The points that he has mentioned could well be raised either on the motion for the summer Adjournment, or on the Consolidated Fund Bill, or on the Adjournment debates. I wish him well in raising that point on any of those occasions.

Mr. Michael Latham (Rutland and Melton): In preparing his speech for the Adjournment debate next Wednesday, will my right hon. Friend be asking the Departments concerned, particularly the Treasury, for all the reasons why between now and Wednesday there should be a further fall in interest rates?

Mr. Biffen: The last time I had to make this speech I took the precaution of not accepting briefs from any Government Department, and nobody noticed the difference.

Mr. Jeff Rooker (Birmingham, Perry Barr): Will the Leader of the House seek to add to next Thursday's business on the uprating of social security benefits the latest report of the Public Accounts Committee on the system of paying benefits so that this House can reject early enough, to stop people from worrying, the idea that millions of pensioners should be bribed to stop using post offices to collect their pensions?

Mr. Biffen: It is not within my competence to judge whether it would be in order to make those points in next Thursday's debate, but the hon. Gentleman is probably skilled enough to try—and to try with success.

Mr. Nicholas Soames (Crawley): While my right hon. Friend is casting around during the summer recess for matters to debate upon our return, will he consider providing Government time for a debate on small businesses and upon the many excellent moves that the Government have made to encourage them?

Mr. Biffen: I shall bear that request very much in mind, but it is not for me to say what will be the disposition of ministerial personnel in the autumn. I have no doubt, however, that in the light of the Queen's Speech there will be plenty of opportunities for my hon. Friend to make exactly the speech that he seeks to make.

Mr. Willie W. Hamilton (Fife, Central): Following the question of the hon. Member for Cambridgeshire, South-West (Sir A. Grant) on an early-day motion urging the increased privatisation of local authority services, since the hon. Gentleman is not obliged to declare his own financial interest in these matters, will the Leader of the House give urgent consideration to a debate in Government time on the recent report on the outside financial interests of hon. Members?

Mr. Biffen: Yes; that is a very fair request.

Mr. Eric Forth (Mid-Worcestershire): Will my right hon. Friend give an undertaking that no decisions will be taken or commitments made, particularly those of a constitutional nature, at any inter-governmental conference that may take place between now and the return of the House after the summer recess before the House is given the fullest possible opportunity to debate the proposals?

Mr. Biffen: The best that I can do is to refer my hon. Friend's request, for which I have a lively sympathy, to my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary.

Mr. Eddie Loyden (Liverpool, Garston): Can the Leader of the House say what provision will be made for the recall of Parliament during the summer recess to deal with the problems facing certain local authorities—for example, Liverpool, Lambeth and Edinburgh? Is it not a fact that Parliament would have to be recalled to make a decision before anything could be done? Can he say what will be his intentions during the long summer recess to deal with this very important question?

Mr. Biffen: At this stage I am trying to get to the point where I can recommend to the House that it adjourns. Unless and until I have got that far I would not want to think about its premature recall.

Mr. Harry Greenway (Ealing, North): Will my right hon. Friend say when we might expect to hear the Government's intentions in relation to the House of Lords amendments to the Education (Corporal Punishment) Bill? Will he bear in mind the widespread objection that there would be in the country to making that Bill an abolition Bill?

Mr. Biffen: That is still under consideration, and at this point I have nothing further to add.

Mr. Ron Brown (Edinburgh, Leith): Bearing in mind that a poll organised by the Edinburgh Evening News—not a Socialist paper—indicated 65 per cent. support for the so-called rebel Labour council, will the Leader of the House arrange another debate next week so that the alliance especially may show its support for the Government? It is clear that locally the alliance supports the Tories. Will the Leader of the House ensure that democracy speaks and that the alliance explains its true position?

Mr. Biffen: Last night's debate on the affairs of Edinburgh was rather enjoyable, and things are never quite as good a second time round.

Mr. Richard Holt (Langbaurgh): My right hon. Friend will not be surprised if I return to the theme of law and order and say that throughout the country there will be great disappointment that once again there is not to be a full debate on the subject in the House of Commons, particularly in the light of the remarks this week of the Prime Minister and the Police Federation. Will my right hon. Friend accept that, whether he wants to debate it or not, it is probably the second most important subject that the people of Britain want to have debated in the House?

Mr. Biffen: I note what my hon. Friend says. I am sure that he, meanwhile, will be considering how best he can ensure that the matter comes before the House during the Consolidated Fund debate on Wednesday.

Mr. Tom Clarke (Monklands, West): In view of the decision of the House of Representatives in the United States on South Africa, and South Africa's invasion of Botswana, can the House look forward to a debate on South Africa before the recess?

Mr. Biffen: Clearly there will be no debate in Government time, as is indicted by the programme of business that I have announced for next week. I accept at once the seriousness of the situation, but I am sure that it is a topic that will await us in the autumn.

Mr. Peter Bruinvels (Leicester, East): Although the House is to be very busy next week, will my right hon. Friend give serious consideration to having a debate on the workings of the local DHSS branch offices in Leicester, which in the past week have been working to rule? Some of the civil servants and members of the Society of Civil and Public Servants have refused to handle my constituents' claims on the ground that the union is fighting to have no more overtime and no casuals allowed to help. Is not that a shocking situation? Should not my right hon. Friend provide time to protect my constituents who need to have their claims answered?

Mr. Biffen: My hon. Friend has outlined a thoroughly unsatisfactory situation. He may well find that there will be opportunities in the Adjournment debates, or in the debate on the Consolidated Fund, for the matter to be raised.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): In the light of the loss of the Unborn Children (Protection) Bill of the right hon. Member for South Down (Mr. Powell), will the Leader of the House, during the course of Cabinet meetings in the recess, impress upon his Cabinet colleagues the need to introduce a Bill based on Warnock, or some related measure, during the next Session of Parliament, and for its inclusion in the Queen's Speech?

Further, may we have a debate on genetic engineering in the first month of the next Session?

Mr. Biffen: I can give no undertaking to provide time for a debate on genetic engineering in Government time. The hon. Gentleman will appreciate that in no sense can I anticipate what might be in the Queen's Speech.

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough and Horncastle): Has my right hon. Friend noticed that, on Tuesday afternoon, I shall be seeking leave to introduce the Local Government (Prevention of Political Corruption) Bill under the ten-minute rule procedure in the light of widespread abuse under sections 137 and 142 of the Local Government Act 1972 by Labour local authorities passing ratepayers' money to their political supporters and advertising pet political causes? If I am fortunate enough to be given leave to introduce my Bill, will my right hon. Friend give it Government time?

Mr. Biffen: It would be the denial of any prudent sense of optimism if I were to encourage my hon. Friend to think that he could do other than get a propaganda coup on Tuesday.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): Will there be a debate or a statement on the policy to withdraw the Hercules from Ethiopia?

Is the Leader of the House happy that there will apparently be no further statement on the Government's role in regard to Johnson Matthey Bankers? Does he think it satisfactory that Sir Patrick Sargeant and others can, on the radio, publicly cast the most serious aspersions by implication on the professional competence of the officials of the Bank of England? Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that some of us do not believe that Mr. Kit McMahon and others in the Bank of England did not at least consult officials before acting in regard to Johnson Matthey Bankers? May we be told when the Prime Minister and the Cabinet Secretary were warned from circles relative to the bullion market and the gold market that there was possible fraud in relation to Johnson Matthey Bankers?

Mr. Biffen: The hon. Gentleman raises issues that go very wide. In respect of Johnson Matthey Bankers, the matter might be ventilated on the Consolidated Fund debates and the Adjournment debates on Friday. As for the use of the Hercules for famine relief in Abyssinia, I shall refer the hon. Gentleman's points to my right hon. Friend the Minister for Overseas Development.

Mrs. Ann Clwyd (Cynon Valley): Will the Leader of the House ask the Secretary of State for Wales to make a statement next week about rising unemployment in Wales, especially as the National Coal Board has today announced the closure of yet another pit in my constituency? My constituency already has the highest male unemployment in Wales—28 per cent.—and it will now rise to 33 per cent. As Wales is continually being denied investment by the NCB, will the right hon. Gentleman ask the Secretary of State for Wales to say how he intends to increase employment prospects in Wales, especially in my constituency?

Mr. Biffen: Although I do not accept the implications of what the hon. Lady is arguing, I realise that the matter has a real constituency consequence and I shall most certainly pass on her request to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): Is the Leader of the House aware that, on 29 May, the Home Secretary imposed a visa restriction on all people wishing to leave the Commonwealth country of Sri Lanka to travel to Britain? Is he further aware that it is unprecedented for such an imposition to be made on a Commonwealth country? In answer to successive questions, the Leader of the House has given an undertaking that the matter will be debated before the summer recess and that it will be debated and voted upon at the same time as the immigration rules next Tuesday. May we have an assurance that this issue will come up next Tuesday and that there will be a separate discussion and vote on this aspect of Government attacks on people seeking refuge and asylum in Britain?

Mr. Biffen: The second item of business that I announced for Tuesday was the motion relating to the statement of changes in immigration rules, Cmnd. 9539. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will be able to make his speech then.

Mr. Robert Parry (Liverpool, Riverside): Will the Leader of the House ask the Prime Minister to visit Liverpool during the long recess to meet councillors, trade union leaders, the unemployed, the sick and pensioners to see what damage the Government's policies have done to the city? Will she do that before she agrees to a commissioner being sent in to Liverpool and the possible gaoling of elected councillors?

Mr. Biffen: As the request has been put to me, I shall of course pass it to my right hon. Friend.

Mr. Greville Janner (Leicester, West): In view of the attacks made in the House on the devoted people who work in the understaffed offices of the DHSS in Leicester and elsewhere and who are sick to death of being blamed for their inability to serve the public, which is caused entirely by the Government's reduction in resources, when may we have a debate which will let it be known how deeply we deplore those attacks on such excellent public servants?

Mr. Biffen: I am sorry that the hon. and learned Gentleman, whom I have known all these years, should be so nettled by the advocacy of my hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Bruinvels). I suggest that the hon. and learned Gentleman, no less than my hon. Friend, should look to the occasion of the Consolidated Fund.

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): Will the Leader of the House use his best endeavours to ensure that a statement is made next week on safety at sports grounds? Will he confirm or deny the fact that Mr. Justice Popplewell's interim report into the Bradford fire disaster is with the Home Secretary or will be within a few days? As that report may contain important lessons for football clubs throughout the country, does the right hon. Gentleman agree that it would be intolerable if we were to go into the recess without having an opportunity to put questions to the Government on that important matter?

Mr. Biffen: I recognise that there is a widespread desire that, if Mr. Justice Popplewell's interim report is available, the House should have a chance to hear a statement on it.

Mr. Robert N. Wareing (Liverpool, West Derby): In view of the United States' continuing threat of aggression against Nicaragua and the participation by Right-wing extremists from this country, including the vice-chairman of the Federation of Conservative Students, who have gone on patrol with the Contra terrorists in that country, is it not about time that we had a full debate on the problems in Central America?

Mr. Biffen: I suspect that the Federation of Conservative Students frightens me much more than it frightens the Sandinistras. The hon. Gentleman's other request will of course be considered.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): Does the Leader of the House agree that Scottish Question Time should appear more frequently in the parliamentary timetable?

Mr. Biffen: However I answer that question I shall be crucified. It is a very ungenerous question to put in the closing days of the Session.

Consolidated Fund Bill and Summer Adjournment

3.57 pm

Mr. Speaker: I have a short statement to make about arrangements for the debate on the motion for the Adjournment which will follow the passing of the Consolidated Fund Bill on Wednesday 24 July.

Members should submit their subjects to my office not later than 9 am on Tuesday 23 July. A list showing the subjects and times will be published later that day. Normally the time allotted will not exceed one and a half hours, but I propose to exercise a discretion to allow one or two debates to continue for rather longer, up to a maximum of three hours.

Where identical or similar subjects have been entered by different Members whose names are drawn in the ballot, only the first name will be shown on the list. As some debates may not last the full time allotted to them, it is the responsibility of Members to keep in touch with developments if they are not to miss their turn.

In addition, I remind hon. Members that, on the motion for the Adjournment of the House on Friday 26 July, up to eight Members may raise, with Ministers, subjects of their own choice. Applications should reach my office by 10 pm on Monday next. A ballot will be held on Tuesday morning and the result made known as soon as possible thereafter.

Estimates Day

[4TH ALLOTTED DAY]—considered

ESTIMATES 1985-86

Department of Trade and Industry

CLASS IV, VOTE 4

Motion made, and Question proposed,

That a further sum not exceeding £39,501,000 be granted to Her Majesty out of the Consolidated fund to defray the charges which will come in course of payment during the year ending on 31st March 1986 for expenditure by the Department of Trade and Industry on export promotion, trade co-operation, regulation of trading practices and consumer protection, and other services including grants in aid and international subscriptions, and other grants.—[Mr. Channon.]

Mr. Speaker: I remind the House that the debate should relate to United Kingdom trade with China following the approval by the House of the recommendations of the Liaison Committee.

3.58 pm

Mr. Kenneth Warren (Hastings and Rye): I wish to speak on the motion on class IV, vote 4, because it is clear from the report which the Select Committee on Trade and Industry had the honour to present to Parliament on Monday of this week that we are worried about the adequacy of the vote and wish it to be examined during today's debate, and further examined by the Government in the light of the contributions that I am sure hon. Members on both sides of the House will wish to make.

As Chairman of that Committee, I express my thanks to the hon. Members who helped in the preparation of the report, who were assiduous in carrying out the investigation and who conducted themselves extremely well during our visit to China to examine the problems and opportunities of trade with that country. I hope that it is not inopportune or out of order for me to say that the clerks and staff of the Committee performed an excellent task. Although they are not often praised in the House, may I also thank the printers, Greenaway Harrison Ltd., who not only last Friday produced a proof of the report, but had it on the desks of the Committee's members at 10 o'clock on Monday morning.

We visited China as the guests of the financial and economic committee of the National People's Congress of the People's Republic of China, and had the honour of being met by Vice-Premier Li Peng. The embassy of the People's Republic in London and our embassy in Peking rendered tremendous service to us, and we wish to thank Sir Richard Evans and his staff, especially Mr. Charles Haswell, who accompanied the Committee on its tour. We also wish to thank Mr. Christian Adams and Mr. Andrew Seaton of the British Trade Commission in Hong Kong for the assistance that they gave us.

The House may already have sensed from what I have said that the tone of our report is one of earnest desire, and the belief that it is possible to co-operate with the People's Republic, to the benefit of everyone in Britain, through advancing our trade. Our Committee is solution-oriented. The reports that we have published demonstrate that it is not problem-dominated. All our reports to the House—I cannot promise that this will continue — have been unanimous and have sought to be constructive, but we have not hesitated, as Ministers from the Department of Trade and Industry will know, to confront them when we believed that such confrontation would be constructive.

China is a buyer's market. It is also the last great untapped market in the world. It is a difficult market, and we praise British exporters for the quality of their products and the success that they have already achieved. However, if I tell the House that, if one travelled through China and saw 1 million people a week, it would take 20 years to see the entire population, hon. Members can gauge the size of the market, the country and, I hope, the opportunity.

Most people talk about the high technology goods needed in countries such as China, but there are many opportunities for exporting what could be called low-technology goods. We could also export what I could call, without wishing to denigrate the value of the products, second-hand goods, because China is moving up the scale of economic development and needs many of the products and processes that were common in the west 10, 20 or 30 years ago.

The Chinese market does not only present opportunities to export hardware. The Chinese need advice in accountancy, banking, insurance and international trading practices. They also need product support to meet the priorities that they have designated as the lead tasks of the next five-year plan, which will be launched in January 1986. Those tasks are designed to meet their needs in energy, transportation and communications.

I must report that the position of our sales to China is less one of accomplishment than one of opportunity. Britain is a long way down the list of OECD countries that export to China. It supplies only about 3 per cent. of all exports to China, which compares badly with Japan and the United States, which together supply about two thirds of China's imported goods and services. We are outranked by Japan, whose exports are worth £4·5 billion a year, the United States at £2 billion a year, West Germany and Canada at £700 million a year each and Australia at £500 million a year. Britain's exports are worth only £300 million a year. The Committee believes—I am sure that this will be endorsed by other hon. Members — that Britain is not exploiting all the available opportunities. Whatever the Government can do to make such exploitation possible will not only benefit employment and profit in Britain, but will give pleasure to the Chinese Government who, after the signing of the Hong Kong agreement, wish to trade with us. I am sure that we could take advantage of that.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): One of the most important industries in Scotland is the offshore oil and gas construction industry. That industry must be export-minded in its approach to further developments. Does the hon. Gentleman believe that enough is being done in China to persuade the Chinese to purchase such high-technology hardware from the United Kingdom?

Mr. Warren: We discovered that, although a great deal is being done in all industries, it is not enough. When we met representatives of operators in the South China sea and in the Bohai sea, we discovered that in many cases the Chinese were eager for the most basic help, such as writing specifications to determine the quality of goods that should be demanded of those who supply them. Bristow Helicopters is already there, and British Petroleum is already drilling. The expertise of BP in the Forties field is directly applicable to the opportunities that lie in the deeper waters to the south of China.

During our visit to Canton, we met representatives and the general managers of the companies which, under the Chinese Government, are responsible for the exploitation of those oil reserves. Although no deal of significant commercial quality has yet been struck, British representatives still believe that they will be successful. I hope that the other members of the Committee will agree with me when I urge those who have that unusual expertise in deep-water oil exploration off the Scottish coast to get together with their Chinese colleagues. As the House knows, in offshore engineering, the ability to supply products and services immediately is paramount. No lead time is available. Companies must be there on the day that oil is struck. I value the hon. Gentleman's intervention and commend it to the House.

The Select Committee members were not the only people to express the views set out in our report. I hope that the House will be glad to hear about a letter sent to me on 5 July 1985 by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, following the visit of the Chinese Premier to Britain. She said:

"The Chinese Government share our view that the opportunities for expanding our trade and economic links have never been better. I believe the committee have chosen an opportune moment to investigate this important subject."

As we travelled extensively throughout China, we were given shopping lists of Chinese requirements in every city and plant that we visited. Without doubt, the leadership of China has created eagerness and a dedication to economic growth at all levels of authority, and the wish to succeed is strong in the Chinese people. On a personal note, I should add that it was rare to come across people of such universally high intelligence in whom good sense is a common quality.

Until recently, Chinese financial reserves were strong, but they have been spending quickly. However, it was evident from our discussions in China and from discussions held with our visitors when the Chinese Premier came to Britain that they are conscious that their rate of spend must be matched to their ability to replenish their resources.

Recently, they have imposed certain constrictions on the way in which goods are handled for imports, but, on the other hand, they have opened up military facilities to make sure that waiting time does not attract a penalty in delivery for goods that have already been contracted. None of my hon. Friends will accuse me of being a sympathiser with Communism, but I sense that there was an economic pragmatism there in the best interests of the Chinese people in terms of what they were trying to do to develop their country.

I was also impressed by the way in which young science and business technocrats of the post-cultural revolution generation are the allies of the old guard in economic development and take an active part in policy discussions. These youngsters are causing an interesting ratchet effect. They believe that forward is the only direction of motion after the experience of Maoism and the cultural revolution.

The Hong Kong agreement is an important step forward. The Select Committee, having had the opportunity to visit China and Hong Kong, knows that the Hong Kong agreement is regarded by the Chinese as a bridge of opportunity between our two countries that is not sensed as clearly on this side of the bridge, in Parliament and the country.

The period of the next five-year plan starting in January 1986 gives us enormous trade penetration opportunities while it is being drafted over the next several months. In this plan, the Chinese will be accentuating the need for two-way trade, whereas we all tend to regard exports as being the prime opportunity. I hope that we can understand that, to import, the Chinese have to export. If we acknowledge this, we shall have made a gain over other nations that have ignored this. I have to say this rather quietly, lest others take note of what a humble Chairman of a Select Committee says.

Without any qualification, I can say that the big United Kingdom firms such as British Aerospace, GEC and others in that league are establishing sound credibility that can enhance the opportunities for small firms, and the important factor is not only the totality of the contracts that go to them. From information that we have gleaned from them, probably only about one third of the total value of the contract goes to the prime contractor. Two thirds of the value will go to those down the chain of contract, most of whom will be small firms. Small firms should look at China through the eyes of their large suppliers and not give up the chance of selling in Hong Kong through reputable agents and straight into China the products and processes that they have available. In this connection I was disappointed to find how few manuals of goods and services representing the interests and capabilities of small firms were readily available either in China or Hong Kong.

I declare an interest as an engineer, although not one connected with China. Looking through such eyes, I saw colossal problems in Chinese engineering firms, some of which were the fault of suppliers, although not British suppliers. The standard and quality of that which this country could provide and the knowledge that, in dealing with this country, the Chinese will get a straight deal that will carry them forward is something that we should put forward in our own determination through diplomatic, commercial and trade channels at every opportunity. We supply quality, and that is what people in China want.

In getting what they want, the Chinese have to understand what is available. I have referred to those goods and services that can be made known through various normal trade communication channels. However, training and retraining in the United Kingdom of commercial, technical and particularly managing staff, sponsored by partnerships between the Government and state and private companies, is most important. This would be a cost-effective method to promote trade.

I have already given a long list of favourable comments about trade with China, and, to be constructive, I would be failing in my duty if I did not also make some unfavourable comments. It is obvious that there must be uncertainty about the future of society in China. There have been political upheavals over a number of years, but the present stability seems better than that which existed when I visited the country four years ago. Substantial progress has been made, and I had a welcome shock at the way in which ordinary Chinese people have been able to make progress in their personal lives.

Market penetration is enormously difficult, slow and expensive. Just about every representative of a major company to whom we talked in Peking told us that it cost them £50,000 a year to keep just one person there, excluding the salary. It is obvious that, as it is a Communist state, purchasing machinery is politically based, and, naturally, there are tensions between state and political authorities over industrial objectives. They arise from the fact that central Government have decided that they will sub-contract responsibility down the chain to the provinces, with the results that one might expect.

When one exports to China, one is faced—this is no reflection on the Chinese — with the fact that their purchasing skills are poor. A hard deal is not necessarily in the best interest of the buyer any more than it is necessarily in the worst interests of the supplier. It is always important that one should, within the limits of language and definition, have a deal that is happy on both sides. I hope that the Chinese can move forward to promote sensible customer-supplier relationships, to their benefit as well as the benefit of those whom we are supplying.

I have already, in reply to an intervention by the hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman), drawn attention to the fact that a substantial upgrading is required in Chinese systems of specifications and a knowledge of how quality assurance can operate, as opposed to what is called quality control. It is important that they understand the technology of quality assurance, which is practised in the Western world and which they are eager to obtain. That is an opening for British companies that can export such knowledge, and an opportunity for small companies at that.

The British Executive Service Overseas — BESO — has some retired, or supposedly retired, managers and engineers who rendered an enormous service to the rest of the world and have already proved themselves in China. I have found out from it that in one year the voluntary retired managers and engineers, a part of BESO that is jointly funded by Government and management, has received a request for specialist advice from the Chinese for chemical, steel, vehicle, ceramic, electronic and light manufacturing industries specifically linked by the Chinese to their re-equipment needs.

BESO has already completed some 12 assignments, which have yielded new contacts with potential British suppliers. It stresses the fact, and I endorse it, that contact and communication, however achieved, are keys to the trading expansion in the China market.

I must give a personal impression of Hong Kong, which I am sure will not be supported by other members of the Committee. I was surprised at it because I had had the opportunity to visit Hong Kong on a number of previous occasions. When I sat down opposite representatives of the Hong Kong Government, I rather felt as though I were facing not my allies but a foreign Government. With 1997 only 12 years away—I say only 12 years because when one looks back 12 years one realises how short 12 years can be—there was not the coming together of purpose that must develop between the British and Hong Kong Governments as the identity of interest becomes coincidental. The Chinese Government are both a Government of an independent territory and a partner Government in a joint agreement with us. I am aware of the high standards and good practices of those who participate in the Government of Hong Kong, and we were delighted that they were so helpful to us. I hope that my personal comment will be seen to be constructive. The

[Mr. Warren]

Hong Kong Government may not have recognised their responsibility for the promotion of United Kingdom exports, but I hope that they will as we approach 1997. The Hong Kong agreement, seen from China, and as it should be seen from the United Kingdom, may not appear in the same light from Hong Kong, but I hope that the vision will shortly become the same for all three.

The Chinese certainly expect our Government to act vigorously as a constant partner in United Kingdom enterprises selling into China. The Chinese leadership is inexperienced in world trade practices. That is not a critical but a constructive comment. They certainly gauge the credibility of a foreign trader by their standards, and they study how the trader's Government help him to promote his products. The Select Committee has said without qualification that the visible and practical partnership rationale, including soft loans, should and must be a facet of growing importance.

Other hon. Members wish to speak, and they will no doubt enlarge on the 12 recommendations submitted in our report.

Mr. Bowen Wells (Hertford and Stortford): From which budget does my hon. Friend see additional soft loans being made available? Is he thinking of the Overseas Development Administration budget, aid and trade provision assistance or some other source?

Mr. Warren: It is always nice when an hon. Friend reminds me of what I should say. I was about to come to that point, which is difficult to answer. Rather than decide from which budget the additional loans should come, all available Government resources, whether from the Export Credits Guarantee Department, ATP provision or whatever, should be considered together as total assistance. The various sources should not be presented as an obstacle course to British exporters. At present traders must often look into the ECGD or argue a case for a soft loan. We welcome the Government's recent announcement that soft loans will be granted to Indonesia, and we hope that that is merely the litmus test to prove that they work. One cannot ignore the way in which competitors and their Governments support their exports. There is no point in saying that that cannot be done, because it must be done, and we must get on with it without hesitation.

I must be daring and criticise my Government because I am a Select Committee Chairman. The Select Committee was dismayed at the statement on 10 July from the Department of Trade and Industry. Paragraph 3, dealing wih soft loans, states:

"Officials are discussing with the financial community what mechanism might be devised for providing soft loans. It will be some time before these arrangements can be finalised."

There is no time. That must be done now. I ask my right hon. Friend the Minister for Trade to tackle the problem without hesitation, and to respond to that challenge today.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): During his interesting visit, did the hon. Gentleman hear about the work of the overseas projects board? Some hon. Members believe that the United Kingdom should give much more help to our overseas projects, considering what other countries are doing.

Mr. Warren: The hon. Gentleman refers to the point that I was making. The total available resources should be considered together rather than separately.

In the report's conclusions we stated the need for a positive commitment by United Kingdom companies, if they are to enjoy a share in the growth of the Chinese market. It is easy to pontificate, and I must declare an interest in that in the past I had a great opportunity, and much misery, in trying to export overseas. A previous Prime Minister said that exporting was fun, but the only fun that I found was when I succeeded, and that was less often than I failed. A long-term commitment towards China is needed. The Chinese like working with people whom they know. I recommend that British companies hang in there. Success will undoubtedly come when the Chinese become used to working with them and know about them.

It is essential that British companies send appropriate executives. The eager salesman will not do. They must send the sales director to China so that he may be given the appropriate introductions in China. Chinese business can be enhanced through a partnership with British business men. They should tour the various symposia which are organised, especially by the provinces in China. We visited Sichuan province, which has a population twice the size of that of the United Kingdom. I am fond of making the analogy that an increase of only 2 per cent. in the telephone lines in China would be equivalent to the whole of British Telecom. The opportunities are enormous and we should not merely consider the opportunities in the capital, the coastal cities or special economic zones.

The Government have a stronger duty than they may be seen to perform at present to collect intelligence information, as the Americans do. They have a stronger duty to fight to prevent people from stopping COCOM from exporting products which have no military significance to China. I am extremely worried at the rumours about substantial American computer companies engaging in sales drives in China. We fear that soon they will say that the items can be sold, and they will tell COCOM that they can be sold. By then we shall have been outflanked, and will be without a chance of bidding for the contracts, some of which are said to be worth $800 million.

COCOM is a voluntary organisation, which has no legality. It operates a sound principle of standing up against the dangers of exporting to Warsaw pact countries, but there can be no rationale for refusing to export commercial standard micro-electronic circuits, which can never be used in military applications, to China.

We recommend an increase in staffing and in the quality of staff available at our embassy in Peking, our consulate in Shanghai, and our representation in Hong Kong, which covers much of south China. Government support should follow trade opportunities. To look at the size of China through the eyes of the Treasury may be a myopia which cannot be tolerated by British exporters. The Government must recognise the opportunities and the rewards that can come from backing our exporters with the support and services that only they can provide, and that the Chinese expect to be available to our exporters.

One is amazed at the volume of work that our people in China carry out to support our Government. If the Government, even a non-interventionist Government, choose to play the part of entrepreneur, they must be the entrepreneur and not stint themselves. If ECGD cannot back projects exporting to China, Turkey or anywhere where somebody wants to give a company a contract, I hope that the Government will look at the market, go to the City and encourage merchant bankers who, I understand, are eager to have the opportunity to get in there and support the export credit guarantee business.

It is my belief that Her Majesty's Government can and must provide accelerators of opportunity. The British Overseas Trade Board is a good organisation which deserves more support. The Export Credits Guarantee Department, which we examined in detail, is also a good organisation that deserves more support. The Overseas Development Administration and all the other agencies are working effectively. One could criticise them in some detail, but we should like them to be seen collectively and to be assured that they have the support of the whole of Her Majesty's Government. I have referred to soft loans. I merely reinforce my request that they should be acted on as an opportunity without which British exporters will lose out in the short term, and not just the day after tomorrow.

The United Kingdom is a great commercial nation. We are innovative and constructive. None of us is other than eager to prove our capability in competition and our competitiveness in price, quality and delivery. That we have made known to the Chinese. They would welcome a further demonstration of it not only through the products that they have already contracted but through further bids. They are well aware of our capabilities and eager to work with us.

I should like to place a challenge before Her Majesty's Government to respond equally, to play the part that they must play to represent our commercial strength without qualification or hesitation but with favour to all those who now take their exporting talents into the new world of opportunity that China offers us, a world where we can gain in employment and mutual profit, and above all where we can gain in peace between two nations that want to live together.

Mr. Stan Crowther (Rotherham): I am happy to follow the hon. Member for Hastings and Rye (Mr. Warren). It may be appropriate for me to take this opportunity, despite our obvious political differences, to pay tribute to his excellent work as Chairman of the Committee.

It has been obvious for a long time that British manufacturers suffer from a variety of disadvantages compared with competitors in most developed countries. Like other hon. Members, I have drawn attention to them many times in the Chamber. For example, despite certain recent changes, energy costs are still a disadvantage to British manufacturers. Again, despite recent changes in the rate between sterling and the dollar, exchange rates are still creating problems. Many industrialists assure me that the pound sterling is still grossly overvalued against European currencies, and it is in Europe that our main competitors are based. Interest rates are also an intolerable burden on British industry.

However, even if the British manufacturer can overcome all those obstacles, he is still up against the fact that the British Government do not provide him with the backing in the export market that most other Governments provide for their exporters. That is the essence of the debate.

I get worried about the extent to which the British Government take the holier-than-thou attitude—that we must never step one inch outside the rules of international trade, whatever others may do. I am not urging the Government to go around the world breaking the rules, but I wish that they were as expert at bending the rules as others. That is all that I ask. If we compare the attitude not only of this Government but of others over the years with that of the French, German, Japanese and American Governments, we find that we are always the righteous ones. The others do not care very much. If they can get away with it, they will break any rule in the book, to the enormous advantage of their industries. That matter should be seriously considered. I make that point not only in relation to China, but in general, although I appreciate that the debate is particularly about trade with China.

The Government should be very worried about the fact that West Germany is exporting almost three times as much to China as we are. If the Government are not worried about that, they should be. If they are, I hope to hear from the Minister what they propose to do about it.

During the detailed inquiry carried out by the Select Committee, we learnt about the immense opportunities for increased trade with China. I do not wish to repeat what was said by the hon. Member for Hastings and Rye in his excellent speech, but I agree with almost everything that he said.

Certain things need to be done. We made a series of recommendations in our report on which I hope action will be taken. I should like to quote just one example of the sort of potential that there is in China. The Committee was stranded for a day in Dalian in north China. It is a huge industrial city with a population of 4·5 million. We were stuck there simply because a bit of mist came down on the airport. It was nothing serious, but it meant that flying was suspended because there are no radar installations in the airport. I do not know whether the General Electric Company, Marconi or other British companies in that business, which are already established in China, have noticed that. If they have, I do not know whether they have tried to do anything about it. Most important—I do not know this, either—if those companies have tried to do something about it, have they been stopped by the COCOM restrictions? That is the most worrying feature. On the wildest stretch of imagination, no one could pretend that putting radar into Dalian airport could present a military threat to Great Britain. To suggest such a thing would be ludicrous. That is an example of the sort of thing that is now worrying me about our failure so far to take advantage of the opportunities that are there.

Mr. Dalyell: I should like to reinforce my hon. Friend's important point. My constituents at Hewlett Packard, which supplies precisely such communications equipment, are extremely worried about that, and the chairman of the company, Mr. David Baldwin, has brought the matter to the attention of the Department.

Mr. Crowther: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his comment. No doubt he will have noticed our recommendation on that point in the report.

One area in which China is most anxious to develop is railway transport. There are tremendous opportunities for British industry. After all, Britain used to be the world leader in the manufacture of locomotives and other railway rolling stock. It is not an awful long time since the railway and ring rolled products department of the British Steel Corporation in my constituency had a substantial export market. Regrettably, it has contracted now; but here is a tremendous opportunity for increasing exports in a big way.

[Mr. Crowther]

I should like to know what plans British locomotive manufacturers are making in conjunction with the Government to break into and take a big slice of the Chinese market. If they are not making such plans, they should be. If the Government are not helping them to make such plans, they ought to be. The essence of what I am saying is that there should be partnership between the Government and industry, because on that basis we can succeed. Industry cannot go out on a limb without backing from the Government and expect to succeed, because it is up against the far more effective operations of foreign Governments who look after their industries much better than we look after ours.

I hope I am wrong, but my impression is that Ministers do not know and do not care very much about this great potential market. I see little evidence so far that they have taken it seriously. Indeed, I see evidence that they are not taking it seriously. An example of that is the reduction in the resources available to the British Overseas Trade Board. That has caused concern to many British manufacturers, not only in relation to trade with China, but in other connections.

The British Materials Export Group has expressed serious concern about the reductions in BOTB resources. A flat rate has been set for the next three years, but in practice that means a cut over that period. The view of the BMEG is that overseas trade fairs are the most effective means of supporting small and medium-sized firms in new markets. We heard evidence in the Committee that resources for overseas trade fairs have been reduced and, as the BMEG points out, it is small and medium-sized firms which benefit most from this kind of activity; they are supposed to be the firms that the Government are most anxious to support.

In a written question on 24 June 1985 I queried the action of BOTB in withdrawing from the Interbuild exhibition in Birmingham. That is an important exhibition for people in the building materials industry, and the organisers were hoping for a substantial inward mission of buyers from all over the world, including China. Our overseas posts were led to believe by the BOTB, right up to the end of March, that BOTB resources would be available to help finance this inward mission to the Interbuild exhibition. But at the last minute the board said, "Sorry, we have no money."

The written answer which I received from the Minister assured me that the decision not to provide British Overseas Trade Board support for the inward mission to Interbuild '85 was based not on eligibility but on the availability of funds. That is precisely the opposite direction to that in which we ought to be going. We should be putting more resources into this kind of promotion. I am afraid that unless there is a substantial change in the Government's attitude towards organisations like the BOTB, all the reports of Select Committees are going to be a waste of time.

What is going to be done about the size of our embassy staff in Peking? All the members of the Select Committee were alarmed to find that only five people were employed in the commercial section of the embassy. China is the biggest country in the world and it has an enormous potential market. I entirely support the hon. Member for Hastings and Rye in his praise of the staff. They are excellent people, but there are too few of them. As a result, they are not able to get around that huge country to look for opportunities for British business. They sit in Peking, mostly on routine work. We made a recommendation about that in the report, and I hope the Government will take it seriously.

What is the Government going to do to increase the number of Chinese students in British universities? I read in the "British Council News" in June about evidence given by the director-general of the British Council to the Foreign Affairs Select Committee. He was drawing attention to the fact that there are 10,000 overseas students in Japan, and that by the end of the century it is planned to have 100,000, most of them from south-east Asia. I am sure that many of them will also be from China.

We ought to pay more attention to the long-term benefits of having overseas students in our universities. The Committee drew attention to that in a previous inquiry in connection with the ASEAN countries. There is not the slightest doubt that a student who has had the benefit of attending a British university and who then returns to his own country, which may be China, Indonesia, Malaysia or wherever, is likely, when he attains a decision-making position, to be influenced in favour of the country where he received his advanced education.

Dr. Godman: I support everything my hon. Friend has said on the need to attract Chinese students to our universities. The obverse side of that coin is: how many British students are studying Chinese in our universities? How many of the members of our embassy in China are Chinese speakers? One of the most formidable barriers to the export of knowledge, which was mentioned by the Chairman of the Committee, the hon. Member for Hastings and Rye (Mr. Warren), is language. How many of our people in China are fluent in Chinese?

Mr. Crowther: I appreciate my hon. Friend's point. There are many Chinese speakers in the embassy. As to the other part of his question about the extent to which people in Britain are learning Chinese prior to going to seek trade in China, I cannot answer that. However, it is an extremely important question and I hope we can find the answer to it.

It has been said many times in this House that Britain, once the workshop of the world, is now, for the first time in its history, importing more manufactured goods than it exports. It was made clear to the Committee during a previous inquiry on trade with the EEC that that fact does not worry the Secretary of State, but it certainly worries many people. It worried the Committee and it certainly worries me. It worries people who take a responsible view about the future of this country. I am one of those old-fashioned folk who believe that manufacturing is at the heart of wealth creation. As we have established, there are enormous opportunities for British manufacturers to play a crucial role in the development of the Chinese economy, and that would be to the great benefit of both nations. If the Government fail to give British industry all the support they can in every possible way, the Government will not only have missed a great opportunity, but seriously neglected the national interest.

Sir Peter Emery (Honiton): The first two speakers in this debate so far and the report illustrate the considerable help that the fairly new structure of Select Committees can be in highlighting certain factors, not only for the House but for the country as a whole. The real benefit is that we were able to investigate with and talk to manufacturers and exporters in Britain. In China we were able to see what is being achieved and how, I am afraid to say, some things are not being achieved. We were then able to analyse why that is so, and investigate what can be done to improve the situation. Therefore, if ever there was proof of the usefulness of Select Committees, this report is it.

The greatest opportunity for British industry to expand its exports massively lies on the mainland of China, and I am sorry that British industry is not taking up the challenge. It is not often that a nation is given an opportunity such as that now available to Britain. I say that because, before the settlement in Hong Kong, Britain was, if not the least favoured nation, quite a long way down the league table in trade with China. But, since the Hong Kong settlement, the opportunities are greater than ever before. The reason lies not only in what Britain has to provide. Another factor is involved. The Chinese Government, having escaped from the Red revolution and having had many of the tenets of Marxist Communism questioned, are considering the trading aspects of a Socialist economy. The Chinese have seen the problems caused by Russian imports into their industry, and they do not want to see America and Japan taking the place of Russia as a dominant factor in their industry. For that reason, they are more than welcoming to Britain and to British industry. We now have a honeymoon period of perhaps 18 months or two years in which that will remain the position. If we do not grasp the opportunity with both hands, we shall be extremely foolish.

I reinforce the views expressed both by my hon. Friend the Member for Hastings and Rye (Mr. Warren) and by the hon. Member for Rotherham (Mr. Crowther). There are three factors that British industry has to understand fully if it is to gain Chinese business. The first is the importance of the financial package attached to any business that they propose. The second is the technological input of that business. The third is the training that that business can bring.

There is no doubt in my mind that Britain has suffered because the Chinese have not thought that the British Government were really keen on doing business with them. Britain is the only major country to have done nothing to provide any soft lending to the Chinese Government. Finland, Denmark and Italy all provide soft funding arrangements to encourage business. Those arrangements are tied to industrial expansion in their countries. Yet the British Government have done nothing. The criticism from the Chinese is understandable. Whether it be with Government funds or whether it is done with some of the International Development Association and International Bank for Reconstruction and Development lending that is available and much of which has not been taken up, the Government could take a lead in trying to ensure that British firms were encouraged to trade overseas.

The second factor that will benefit any company trying to do business with China is to show that it is willing to share with the Chinese the technology that it is bringing into China. The criticism that I heard again and again was that the Chinese told this to the Japanese and American companies, but that they did nothing. We must show that we are willing to share that technology—I am talking not about the highest-tech defence equipment but about medium and moderate technology which we have had for many years and which the Chinese will get in six or 10 years regardless of whether we help them. Why should not we help them and gain the industrial benefit?

It is obvious that we could take a lead in this way from some of our competitors, and I urge that it should go hand in hand with training. When we talk about exporting to China, we want to tie into the package the willingness of the exporter to take Chinese people and train them in marketing, in the technologies of the industry and in project management — a subject which they are still coming to understand. We should be offering the Chinese a degree of co-operation that they have not seen from many of the other firms trying to do business with them.

That ties in with the excellent contribution by the hon. Member for Rotherham about the need to ensure that we encourage Chinese students to come here. Nothing would please our universities more than to be given a little assistance from the Government so that this might be done.

I believe that the Government should be doing more, and I draw the attention of the Minister for Trade to an amendment proposed in the Committee but unfortunately not carried. It contains a considerable amount of sense because it underlines that aid ought to be tied to the business that we can obtain in China, especially in the next two years. If the Department of Trade and Industry cannot win the battle with the Treasury—it is not the DTI's wish not to get the money; the opposition is from what is frequently described as "the damned Treasury"—it may be that in conjunction with the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, even if the Committee's strong recommendations cannot be accepted, an expansion in aid to China could be made by the Government reallocating existing funds even if, for the next two years, it is done at the expense of the Commonwealth. I know that that will not be a popular suggestion, but we need to increase the aid that we give if we are to see the increase in industrial strength and the creation of wealth which will in turn enable yet more aid to be given. If we have not got that industrial strength, the amount of aid will decline. I have always believed in the advantages of tying aid to business.

British industry must realise the difficulties in its way. Reference has been made already to the language problem. In addition, the distance is considerable. Account must also be taken of the cost of living and maintenance in China. What is more, doing business in China is not simply a matter of getting hold of a potential customer and agreeing on a deal. One has to realise that central planning ministries have major importance. Further, the deal must be understood and accepted by the Treasury or the Finance Ministry. One has to realise that the deal must be acceptable to the Ministry with responsibility for the industry in question, and then one has to deal with the firm or organisation. That is why there is a time factor, and why many people have gone to China not understanding these problems and have come away disappointed. That is why it is important that we should spell out in the report exactly what has to be done.

However, I believe that the benefits are considerable. I believe that there is a special encouragement that the Chinese Government will be wanting to give to Britain in the next two years. They will not give us anything—let us not believe that. It has to be a proper business deal. But I believe that, while in the past we have not been able to obtain the business, in future we will be able to do so.

[Sir Peter Emery]

I refer now to something which has not been mentioned so far in the debate, the aspect of joint ventures in China, which I believe the Chinese Government are very keen to stimulate involving the development of British industry in China. I am not saying that we will be there for ever. I believe that, like most countries, in time the Chinese will want to take control of the totality of that joint venture, but if that joint venture is for a 10-year period or an 8-year period it ought to be a considerable benefit to Britain and, if properly structured, a considerable benefit to the firms that enter into it.

With regard to the great advantages and benefits that we have, we have Hong Kong business, which is already structured within Red China. I was amazed to find that some members of the National People's Congress of Red China had a visiting card giving the full title of a member of the People's Congress and another card which was the business card of a Hong Kong business man. Indeed, they were only too delighted to encourage one to come and see them and use their facilities for trying to do business in China. We have great friends in Hong Kong who are crying out to assist British business in parallel with their own expansion. But there is so much more that British business can do. Let us please realise the benefits that Hong Kong could provide as a permanent feature, enabling business to be carried on. That would help overcome some of the financial difficulties that people resident in the region experience in keeping full-time staff.

I believe that there is one factor that is an innovation. It is an innovation I welcome, and which should be trumpeted fairly hard. The Select Committee has decided to produce a guide, a small pamphlet. It will set out not the whole of the report but, as guidance for any person who wishes to consider doing business in China, the pitfalls, the advantages and many of the points which have been, and I know will continue to be, made in speeches in the debate.

I end as I began. The report is an illustration of what the Select Committees can do. We are innovating by producing direct assistance, as a Select Committee in the name of the House, enabling British business to achieve more exports. China is an area of great possibilities for expansion.

5.3 pm

Mr. James Wallace (Orkney and Shetland): As the first Member to speak in the debate who is not a member of the Select Committee, I wish, I am sure on behalf of other Members not on the Committee to thank the Chairman and the members for this valuable report and to welcome the opportunity to debate it.

It has already been said that considerable importance must be attached to future trade with China, particularly because of its large market. I share the view of the hon. Member for Rotherham (Mr. Crowther) that it is a matter, for concern, not complacency, that we are dipping into deficit on the balance of trade of manufactured goods. Because of the size of the population of China, there are clearly considerable opportunities.

I was a member of the all-party group which visited Japan in February this year. It was clear to us that Japan has recognised the potential of the Chinese market and is making every endeavour to take advantage of all the opportunities it offers.

We now have further opportunities because of China's open-door policy. We have reached an agreement with the Chinese Government on Hong Kong. As the hon. Member for Honiton (Sir P. Emery) said, our relationship with Hong Kong gives us particular advantages in being there on the doorstep, and we should take advantage of the settlement on Hong Kong.

There are particular opportunities for exports in high technology. China is in the process of modernisation. It is seeking to expand its telecommunications network. As has already been mentioned, it is developing its energy resources. The hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman) referred to our potential, as a country that has already developed offshore oil resources, to export some of our offshore technology to China. When one considers the advantages Norway has taken from developing its offshore techniques, I sometimes regret that British industry has not latched on in the same way. None the less, there are still opportunities at home and, given the development of these technologies, for export to a very important market in China.

While there are obvious advantages and opportunities, there are also problems, some of which have already been mentioned. There is the basic problem of distance. There is also the question of culture—an oriental culture and a culture of a system based on centralised planning. The effort and time taken in achieving export orders in China will be much greater, for example, than is the case in trading relationships with our partners in the European Community. Nevertheless, I believe time and effort will be well spent. There is a tradition in the Chinese culture that, if a relationship of trust and good faith is built up and established, and a market developed over the years, they will be loyal to the products, if we give them high quality products.

The problem of language has been referred to. That is probably even more of a problem as one gets into the provinces of China and away from the main city centres. Japan clearly has certain advantages over us because of its proximity, and because it does not have quite the same language difficulties. The United States has certain advantages because it has within it second generation Chinese who perhaps fled from China but who are now going back with a knowledge of the culture and of the language. We can perhaps overcome some of our disadvantages by encouraging Chinese students to come and study in our universities. I think that that is one of the most effective ways in which we can promote trade in the longer term, as well as encouraging some of our students to learn Mandarin and Cantonese.

I do not want to overestimate the problem of language, but I discovered on my visit to Japan, and it may well be the same in China, that while in our embassy in Tokyo we have people who are very skilled linguists—and it is appreciated by the Japanese that those people have taken the time and effort to learn the language—they do not always have great commercial expertise. A lot more can be done to ensure that in the embassies, in particular in Beijing, our representatives not only are skilled in languages but also have a certain commercial nous.

The Select Committee report mentions the problems of exporting high technology, with particular reference to COCOM. There is no legal basis for COCOM and no treaty has been ratified by the House. Indeed, I do not think that COCOM's functions have ever been debated in the House. I have no doubt that there is merit in keeping from our potential enemies in the Eastern bloc information that is important to our security. However, the worth of an organisation such as COCOM must be called into question if it is abused by other countries. As the hon. Member for Rotherham said, we always stick to the letter of the law, but other countries manage to bend it. Sir Peter Matthews told the Select Committee:

"The goalposts get moved from time to time and they are usually moved by the Americans at strategic moments when they are just about to score a goal in the new position."

The first four annual reports of the export administration division of the United States commerce department showed that licences issued for computers and semi-conductor manufacturing equipment and electric test equipment between 1981 and 1983 resulted in substantial exports from the United States to China, totalling $98 million in 1980, $117 million in 1981 and rising to $143 million in 1983.

We should investigate whether the United States has been trying to get round the COCOM rules to establish a market in China at a time when pressure was being put on British-based companies, such as ICL, not to export. The American figures do not show the multi-million dollar deals done by American companies on the very day in 1983 when the Reagan Administration announced a significant relaxation in what they were prepared to allow to be exported to China. That included one deal of $800 million.

My hon. Friend the Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown), who has looked into the matter in detail, has established that the Foreign Office was not advised of that relaxation and did not know about it until April 1984. The House is entitled to ask why the Foreign Office did not know and what liaison exists with the Americans, with whom we are supposed to enjoy a special relationship, and between the Department of Trade and Industry and the Foreign Office. Our exporters have been blocked, whilst last year IBM took four floors in the biggest hotel in Beijing for two months to offer a full range of IBM machines to the Chinese Government and officials. That is scarcely fair competition.

The House will be interested to hear from the Minister for Trade how the Government view the COCOM arrangements. Will he explain what has been happening in trade with China over the past three or four years? Why does the United States always get away with it, at the expense of our industries? Can the Minister confirm that the COCOM agreement is to be extended to cover software, in which we have particular expertise, and thereby further hinder the development of our export opportunities?

I welcome the Select Committee's recommendation that there should be a liberalisation of COCOM rules for trade with China. It is important that the Government ease trade relations with China, particularly for trade in high technology, but they must take other action, including the provision of soft loans and assistance to enable our industry to seize the opportunities that are open to us.

Even a Government committed to the free market must realise that in trying to build up trade relations with China we are not dealing with a free market. The aid and assistance given by our Government must be commensurate with the size of the opportunities open to our exporters.

5.14 pm

Mr. Richard Page (Hertfordshire, South-West): A much more illustrious public speaker than I — which includes most public speakers — said that if one wanted to get a message over, one had to be like a hit record and keep repeating the theme time and again.

I am more than willing to follow up the theme that I developed in an Adjournment debate in the early hours of 1 April when I stressed that there had to be greater support for British exporters if we were to stay in the world of the manufacturer and provide jobs for our people.

I welcome the opportunity to re-emphasise some of the points made in that debate, and I endorse the thanks given to the Select Committee for its report, which will be a valuable talking point and shows the direction that we should follow.

In the world of exporting, we take about 8 per cent. of the market, but we take only 1 per cent. of the Chinese market. As my hon. Friend the Member for Hounton (Sir P. Emery) said, we are not taking advantage of the tremendous opportunities that are open to us. We have recently gone into surplus with our trade with China, but the opportunities still stretch ahead of us and could provide us with almost an El Dorado if we make the necessary efforts.

We must be careful and clever in going into the Chinese market. My hon. Friend the Member for Hastings and Rye (Mr. Warren) said that the Chinese had poor purchasing skills. They have already spent up to the hilt in their 1985 budgets and they will have problems providing any more orders for the rest of the year. We know that there is a five-year plan in China. Only the companies that get in early in the game will get the contracts. Those that hang around or come in late and those whose Governments do not support them early enough will lose out.

I welcome the provision of the £39 million in the Estimates, but I doubt whether it will be adequate to tackle the whole Chinese market. Over the past few years, the Japanese have put £3 billion into that market. The Japanese are good at exporting. They have taught us one or two lessons and we should be wise to take the hint from them.

We do not realise the problems and the competition confronting us. Recipient countries are demanding that a support mechanism, such as soft loans, should be put up front when the tender is submitted. I understand that the Indonesians have passed a decree that no company can pre-qualify for tendering without agreeing to 25-year loan terms, grace periods and certain interest rates. I understand that China is making demands for similar terms. I have some evidence that the Japanese are offering 30-year loan terms, seven-year grace periods and 2·7 per cent. interest rates. We must stop trying to match those offers and initiate offers ourselves if we are to get the contracts.

Efforts have been made in the City to produce a private financial package. I welcome those efforts with all my heart, but whatever financial mechanisms are developed for soft loans, I doubt whether private sector arrangements will be enough.

If we are to make a worthwhile impact in China, it will cost us about £50 million annually. The Select Committee has recommended that funds should be increased so that resources for China are not diverted from other markets.

[Mr. Richard Page]

We have to retain a world presence as well as taking the opportunities in China. That implies that we cannot eat into the aid and trade provision of £66 million.

I emphasise what I said in my Adjournment debate. We must increase the flexibility of the aid and trade provision. It must roll on from year to year, and we must end the rigid divisions between sectors. We must not lose contracts because of various quirks of timing.

The Select Committee pointed out the value of establishing a presence in the Chinese market. It said:

"there can be longer term advantages of establishing UK exporters in a growing Chinese market, where the repeat orders can make the loss leading worthwhile."

The value of additionality is not always fully taken into account when the Treasury does its tight and careful calculations.

The role of the British Overseas Trade Board in world markets has been mentioned. A striking fact is that the bulk of our overseas trade is in the hands of major corporations, but 80 per cent. of the users of the BOTB services are firms with fewer than 200 employees. The majority of contacts by the BOTB in 1984 were with small firms, which took advantage of the springboard offer to bring them into the export market.

We must make small profitable firms producing quality goods aware of the export opportunities and the services available. Too often when Ministers attend business functions they are told by small firm owners that they know nothing about the BOTB or about moving into the export market. In the next few years we must plan a modest increase in the BOTB's budget of £27 million a year to ensure that small companies are aware that they can almost piggy-back into the export market.

Earlier this month my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry said that 1 per cent. of our world trade creates 250,000 jobs. If we lose that world trade, the jobs will be lost. The converse also applies. For every 1 per cent. increase in our world trade, we shall gain 250,000 jobs.

The opportunity exists to do business with China. My hon. Friend the Member for Honiton made that point forcibly and ably. I welcome the extra support, but I hope for flexibility within the Treasury and the Department of Trade and Industry so that we can react quickly to opportunites to seize contracts.

5.22 pm

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): I agree with the hon. Member for Hertfordshire, South-West (Mr. Page) that quick reactions and flexibility are of vital importance.

I echo what the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace) said about paying tribute, where warranted, to the work of our parliamentary colleagues on both sides of the House who are Members of the Select Committee. I willingly pay that tribute because the report that we are discussing is of high quality. It is clear that hon. Members from both sides worked hard on the report and when they were in China. Such trips are not joyrides but hard work. I thank our parliamentary colleagues.

I strongly agree with the Chairman about the need for old friends. I understand that one can get nowhere with the Chinese unless they are old friends. I organised and went with the Scottish Council for Trade and Industry delegation to China 15 years ago. It was the first delegation to go there. I might be asked why the Scots went. It was partly because some of us tried hard with Mr. Pei, the charge d'affaires. I shall believe until my dying day that there was some confusion about the Scots being like the Albanians—a small and oppressed group which should be encouraged. I do not kid the House when I say that we were taken to the Sino-Albanian friendship commune. It was a good delegation, which included Louis Portman of Leyland and a small mink farmer from Midlothian who is still in business. Since then I have counted myself as an old friend of China, albeit with ups and downs. That is my reason for taking part in the debate.

I could not agree more strongly with my hon. Friend the Member for Rotherham (Mr. Crowther) who eloquently expressed his feeling about the holier-than-thou attitude about which many of us have been worried for a long time. As my hon. Friend said, others seem to be more adept at bending the rules and cutting the corners than we are and we lose out time and again. That hits work and employment in Britain.

I wish to raise a specific point. Bluntly, I have a constituency axe to grind. Hewlett Packard has been in South Queensferry for two decades. Mr. David Baldwin and Mr. Denis Tompkins and their colleagues have pleaded with those who represent constituencies in which Hewlett Packard factories are based, and with the hon. Member for Wokingham (Sir W. van Straubenzee) who represents the area in which the firm has its headquarters, to do someting about the COCOM regulations. The subject was debated yesterday, and the Minister said:

"Exports to China were mentioned by the hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) and many of my hon. Friends. We are playing a leading part in talks in COCOM . . . My hon. Friend the Member for Orpington (Mr. Stanbrook) referred to Professor Ashworth's letter, to which I shall of course reply."—[Official Report, Fifth Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c., 17 July 1985; c. 25.]

I tabled a written question yesterday to ask

"the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, what conveniently available figures he has for the average time it takes a British exporter of high-technology equipment to receive a decision on a COCOM application, compared with the practice by Governments in Germany and Italy."

The answer was:

"I regret that this information is not available."

I make no complaint about that reply because, as I said on Friday, I am against asking questions which lead to statistics which are expensive to find. If I am told that it is too expensive to find an answer to a question, in most circumstances I accept that.

Reputable people at Hewlett Packard say that their German and French colleagues receive much quicker answers than we can expect here. They say that the reason might be shortage of staff in the Department, but, whatever the reason, we must react more quickly. This is an all-party occasion, and I agree with the hon. Member for Honiton (Sir P. Emery) and others that flexibility and quick reaction are of great importance.

I hope that the House will forgive me if I quote three of Professor Ashworth's arguments. He said:

"The British Government should urge COCOM to lift restrictions on trade in goods other than those which genuinely meet military applications."

The word "genuinely" should be emphasised. He went on:

"The fact is that almost any civilian product or process technology could with time and determination be re-engineered to military use. But that is an argument for no trade and is being used to restrict market opportunities for British firms. If lines are to be drawn let the restrictions apply to technologies which realise military applications rather than ones which could inter alia enable such applications."

Surely there can be no objection to that.

Professor Ashworth continued:

"Apart from trimming the lists to the minimum, the interpretations of whatever restrictions are agreed in the issuing of export licences should be liberal. The presumption should be that the trade should proceed unless a sound argument is advanced for prohibition."

Are we sure that we do not tag on to the Americans from time to time? Professor Ashworth went on to say:

"The industry fears that the possible deliberate or inadvertent confusion and/or combination of COCOM restrictions with the US 'extra-territoriality' laws will operate to the detriment of UK industry interests."

What is the Government's attitude? I realise, of course, that the Minister may be giving a thought-out reply in a letter to one of my colleagues. I should have thought that the right hon. Gentleman could have made some reference to this matter in his reply. It was obvious that it would come up in debate. I am aware also of the answer given in the other place to Lord Hatch.

I declare an interest in that I am a National Union of Railwaymen-sponsored Member of Parliament. I should like to follow what my hon. Friend the Member for Rotherham said about railway equipment. The Yugoslavs have signed a series of trade agreements with Argentina. Among the areas for planned trade and co-operation is electrification equipment for the Argentine railways. As these railways were originally built almost entirely with British capital and technology, there is a certain poignancy in this, although the decline of Britain's role in South America began long before 1982. I am not making too many assumptions about the conflict in the south Atlantic, although it had some effect on that decline.

The same goes for China. Many of the railways which we saw 15 years ago were British-made. Although the Chinese are developing a considerable railway industry, do we not have a part to play? To what extent were British Railways workshops consulted by the Government, as the Swindon works was, before its closure was announced, and other works would have been had there been any other Government? That is what the French and Germans do so differently.

Recently, the Siemens offshoot, KWU, agreed to build the second stage of the Atucha nuclear energy plant in Argentina with West German finance. That was not necessarily a project in which the United Kingdom could have been involved, but it showed how other countries are developing their trade with Latin America and China. We have heard that German participation in China is three times greater than British participation. How did that come about? It is heart-rending in view of the efforts that were made to establish a British presence in China when it opened up again in the late 1960s.

Britain is now very much behind the rest of its European partners. The reason why Britain is very much behind has a great deal to do not only with soft loans but with the Overseas Projects Board. Following the comments of Mr. Roy Withers about Britain's willingness to give loans compared with that of our competitors, I asked the Minister in a written and an oral question about the Overseas Projects Board. What is the right hon. Gentleman's attitude towards that board? Are the implicit criticisms by Mr. Roy Withers justified? Is this a matter that we should examine? What is the board's role in relation to the Chinese?

One of the great universities of Europe, the university of Edinburgh, has a distinguished school of Chinese studies under Dr. Chinnery. As with many other departments, there is a danger that that department will be cut back and back. I know that the Minister for Trade is not an Education Minister, but I must ask him, given the special circumstances, the need to understand China and the need for certain British people to speak Chinese, what is the input of the Department of Trade and Industry into the question of university cuts? If we do not take this whole matter in the round and have an overall policy, Britain's trade with China, where our competitors are formidable and keen, will not get very far.

5.34 pm

Mr. Martin Stevens (Fulham): My right hon. Friend the Minister for Trade has not invited me to help him to draft his speech in reply to the debate, but there is no reason why I should wait to be asked. My right hon. Friend will tell the hon. Member for Rotherham (Mr. Crowther) that our increased diplomatic staff in China has the best record of Chinese speakers of any mission in Beijing. He will refer to the reintroduction of the consulate in Shanghai. He will mention that, as a result of our mission, the Chinese Deputy Premier authorised his statisticians to sit down with our mission staff to reconcile the argument whether our trade was in balance with China or whether, as the Chinese claimed, there was a trading balance in our favour of £300 million. My right hon. Friend will tell us that money is invested in a new and improved transmission system in Hong Kong for the BBC. The quality of reception of Chinese language broadcasts was one of the deficiencies that was most frequently drawn to our attention. Nothing could less expensively increase our influence in the People's Republic of China.

My right hon. Friend will speak of the intention to increase the number of Chinese students in Britain and will point to the scholarships offered by Lloyd's of London. He will point to the significant increase—from a low base, it is said—in trade with China so far during 1985. I had better not go on or my right hon. Friend will sit in silence at the end of the debate, with nothing left to say. I have made those points because it is not right for us to act and speak as though the Government have done nothing and do not care about China. That is not so.

I should like a slightly different approach to be taken. I should like greater flexibility, as other hon. Members have said, in the Government's attitude to any overseas market. We shall be said to be besotted with trade with China because the Select Committee has just returned. People who visit another country always return home thinking that our relationships with that country are the most important items on the international horizon. Our commercial relationships with China is one of the most significant factors on the commercial horizon. I should like the Government to adopt a market-oriented approach to China and other countries, rather than what might be called, in a business, a product-oriented approach.

If one is going into the business of selling, the old adage —the customer is always right—is correct. We must tackle the Chinese market on the basis of meeting and matching their desires and not simply saying, "We have a lieutenant-colonel as military attaché in Paris. It would be embarrassing to have an officer of higher rank in Beijing." That stereotyped bureaucratic approach is the reverse of the approach that business people should adopt towards countries in which they want to sell their goods.

I should like the Government to consider new initiatives. One of the most important ways to enter the Chinese market is to offer to carry out a feasibility study. The United States will get the contract to build the new airport in the special economic zone adjacent to Hong Kong because it has spent $750,000 on a feasibility study. This is not a huge sum in political terms. Nevertheless, it is not a sum to be tossed lightly into the pot. Why are the Government not much more ready to provide the money for feasibility studies? Why do they not say, "If you get the contract, my dear fellow, we shall want our money back"? That does not seem to me to be a wasteful approach. Because of the way that they do business in China, not because of the way that we do business, it would help to bring in contracts that we should otherwise lose.

The hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace)—I hope that I am not putting words into his mouth—said that the Chinese have the happy quality of not forgetting their friends. That is true. The only way for the British Government and British industry to approach the Chinese market is on the basis of a continuing relationship. My hon. Friend the Member for Honiton (Sir P. Emery) spoke of an eight or 10-year period. One ought not to look at this as quite such a brief flash in the pan. When we met him the deputy Premier referred to trade with China in the middle of the next century.

Sir Peter Emery: Indeed.

Mr. Stevens: What?

Sir Peter Emery: Indeed.

Mr. Stevens: I am so unused to the unstinted endorsement of my hon. Friend that I felt that I must have committed some blunder or social offence. I thank him for his endorsement. What was I saying?

Sir Peter Emery: Perhaps I may help my hon. Friend along the route of his argument. Reference was made to joint ventures. I suggested that even if joint ventures were for as short a period as eight or 10 years they were worth doing, but I endorse entirely my hon. Friend's point that they could continue for 30, 40 or 50 years. Trade with China will be very considerable. That was his line of argument when I so rudely interrupted him.

Mr. Stevens: Having tipped me off the rails, my hon. Friend has gracefully replaced me on the tracks. We asked the deputy Premier whether by the year 2050 the Chinese, having sucked in all the technological transfer that they so ardently desire from the West, would use their very low labour costs to "do a Japan" on us and flood western markets with their own products at a fraction of the price. He, like all the Chinese leaders that we met, was clearly aware of these anxieties and told us that, with a population of 1 billion, the overwhelming bulk of the goods that China produces in the next half century will be needed for the consumer requirements of the Chinese people. As a nation, China has a wretchedly low standard of living. Indeed, some of our Opposition colleagues were busily photographing their dwelling houses for use in their next general election addresses over the caption, "Thatcher's Britain". Much progress needs to be made before the living standards of the Chinese people begin to match those which we in the west take for granted. Their leaders know this perfectly well. Ours was not a political mission. It was no part of our job to talk about the political future of China. However, one may speculate about whether the present political institutions will remain unchanged at the end of 50 or 70 years of free enterprise economics.

The Chinese are making enormous efforts to welcome people to China from all over the world. In 1984 there were 12 million tourists, of whom 11 million were people of Chinese origin who were returning to China to visit relatives and perhaps to provide help. The building of new hotels was proceeding apace. It was almost a question of hotels being erected the day before we arrived to provide appropriate accommodation for us. As a team, the Select Committee is austere. For its members a bowl of lentils is a feast. Toss in a turnip and it becomes a banquet. However, some of the hotels in which we stayed in Communist China offered a degree of luxury, service, elegance and cuisine that I have never experienced anywhere else in the world. That may also be an attraction for some of our fellow countrymen for whom the fleshpots hold out a greater inducement than they do for parliamentarians.

The Chinese were very explicit about the list of goods that they hope to sell in Britain and the list of goods that they hope to buy from us. They want to sell electrical machinery, motors, generators, hand tools, labour-intensive goods that we on the whole are gradually ceasing to produce, cotton piece goods, tea, bristles, rosin, textiles, tungsten, minerals, such as antimony, rice and canned vegetables. They are already buying coal mining equipment and know-how, aircraft and offshore oil expertise, but they want to buy 300 Mw and 600 Mw power stations, rubber goods — I cannot supply the details — and telecommunications goods. There is no reason why our Government cannot make sure, as no doubt they have already made sure, that the people in this country who deal in such goods know that these items are desired by China. However, several major British firms that are involved in the activities in which the Chinese are interested do not appear to have visited China, and their absence was sorrowfully commented upon to us by British business men who are already in China.

I said earlier that I should like the Government to be imaginative and flexible when responding to the special needs of the Chinese market, and I mentioned the funding of feasibility studies. One might also mention the emulation throughout the Pacific basin of the Japanese trading house system, which has been so successful and which has brought into those markets many firms that are too small to enter them on their own. The Chinese do not expect British business men to outsell their rivals on every point. We must be price competitive. They told us that the French are the most expensive but that we run them a very close second. We must offer soon to China some form of soft financial provision. We must also offer to transfer know-how and technology. We are very good at that. We are much more liberal than some of our competitors in those matters. From that it follows that the firms that are most likely to build up and sustain long-term relationships with our Chinese friends are those that are developing new technologies every year. There is nothing new in that as a system but it is new for the Chinese. They accept that we shall sell them last year's know-how while we are ourselves perfecting next year's. There is a great deal of scope and long-term opportunity for those who grasp that point.

I should like to add a few words about the Chinese as people. They certainly think of us as people. They have not, over the centuries, been any too keen on foreigners, but now that circumstances compel them to open their doors to foreign business people they are beginning to compare us with the others who are entering their markets. We shall be comparing them with others in whose markets we are trying to sell.

The Chinese are extraordinarily tough in bargaining but extraordinarily agreeable as human beings. Their sense of humour is comparable to ours. Even in Beijing, which is the most Communist city, where the little blue suits, caps and macs are most frequently seen as the uniform of all men and women, the children are beautifully dressed and cared for. If sentiment were to be our only guide, there would be even more reasons for seeking to do business in China than those to which reference has been made in the debate.

The Select Committee, as has been kindly said by colleagues who were not members of it, worked very hard. I endorse everything that was said in the magisterial opening statement of our Chairman, my hon. Friend the Member for Hastings and Rye (Mr. Warren). I hope that the debate today will be heard and echoed among those who it is most important should respond actively and positively to what we are saying in the House this afternoon.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): Order. The wind-up speeches are expected to begin at 6.20 pm. There are four hon. Members hoping to speak. I hope that they will co-operate so that they can all be called.

5.53 pm

Mr. Barry Porter (Wirral, South): If I cannot be brief, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I will be as rapid as possible. It is always a great pleasure, if not a challenge, to follow my hon. Friend the Member for Fulham (Mr. Stevens) whose erudition and depth of detail in research are an example to every hon. Member.

While I concede that there was an element of work in our trip to China, I rather enjoyed it, and the bowl of lentils and the odd turnip were not obvious to me by their presence. There were many 13-course banquets. If my hon. Friend casts his mind back to Canton, Shanghai and other delightful places, he might just recall the odd sea slug and other things that we enjoyed at that time.

On the general question of public expenditure, which is what the debate is supposed to be about, I might be regarded as a hawk rather than as a dove and as a dry rather than as a wet. I fully recognise the need, in the context of the Government's financial strategy, for restraint and for resistance to special pleading, except where there is a medium-term or long-term benefit to the economy from that public expenditure.

In the past we have all seen mountains of public money thrown at various industries here or abroad that were either dying on their feet or had gross over-capacity, and could not possibly ever again achieve a competitive position. Often that expenditure has been justified on social grounds, but in my judgment the reasoning has been essentially short-term, without any hard thinking about the longer future. Surely it must be much more sensible to invest public money where there is a likelihood of success than to use money that we can ill-afford in trying desperately to stave off failure. I make those general points in relation to my own attitude only to indicate that I have taken considerable persuasion to reach the conclusion that the Government are spending too little in developing our trade with China.

In so far as anything is certain in this uncertain world, first, it seems to be true beyond peradventure that there is a huge market in China of which at present we have far too small a share. Secondly, that market is growing rapidly as the present Chinese Administration expands the economy. Thirdly, other countries have realised the potential and have decided to put their money where their mouths are and, as a result, are obtaining footholds in that market. It will be very difficult to supplant them once they are established.

Whether the companies involved are admitting any profit in the ventures undertaken up to now is a matter for conjecture, but certainly the companies and the Governments concerned have made a judgment that returns in one way or another will be there in the future. That is especially true of the Japanese but equally of various European countries, even Denmark.

If we stand back — here I agree with the hon. Member for Rotherham (Mr. Crowther)—and take a lillywhite attitude to providing soft loans, cheap credit or whatever is the description, my judgment is that in 10 or 20 years—and I gather that the hon. Gentleman agrees with me—we shall bitterly regret it.

If in some other way British industry and trade could establish itself in China without Government assistance, I should be delighted, but, to coin a phrase, there is no alternative. If we take the long view, a partnership between British industry and the Government in China can and must be the only way. I think that the Government have come to recognise that. Their recent decision, on similar arguments in relation to Indonesia, as the Chairman of the Select Committee pointed out, underlines the point that the pragmatic approach to rapidly expanding markets is already Government policy.

Obviously, the detail of a soft loan policy is a matter for discussion. I hope that it would not take the form of general cheap credit. I hope that it would be on the basis of stringent examination of individual ventures, which should pass the test of ultimate profitability.

There are, of course, risks and difficulties, not merely economic but political as well. If I may take issue with my hon. Friend the Member for Fulham, I think that it is the responsibility not only of the Committee but of the House to try to make some judgment about the political future. The open-door policy has been of relatively short duration, certainly in the Chinese scale of thinking. When we inquired about China's population control policy, we were told that it had been decided to bring down the population from 1·8 billion to between 600 million and 700 million in the year 20400. We said, "Surely you mean 2040," and they said, "No, we mean 20400." That is the scale of thinking; that is the time scale in which they see the future of their country. Ten years of an open-door policy and of an expanding economy is like a flash of light.

I shall not enter the game of Chinese euphoria, but the open-door policy and the policy of general economic expansion have already run into some trouble, and there is no point in British industry and the British Government not being aware of it. The scope and the pace of the reforms are already being re-examined.

Imports of refrigerators, cars, television sets and motor cycles are apparently, according to recent reports, clogging the seaports. Railways are so seriously congested that there are grave coal and steel shortages. One factory in four throughout China is idle because of electricity cuts. It seems clear that there will not be an easy progression of 7 per cent. a year of economic growth. Even an old horse like me is willing to urge the Government to spend more money supporting British industry and trade because the Chinese leaders accept that there are difficulties. In a conversation with Trinidad's Prime Minister, Deng Xiaoping said that, although there were difficulties,

"I believe that our policy will succeed. If one method proves ineffective, another will be used."

I was sceptical about whether Chinese political society will be such in the next 10 years that people can expect a return on capital. Having met people in China, I believe that there is such a prospect, in spite of the difficulties. It would be entirely wrong not to expect difficulties—there could be difficulties for a considerable time. We must bear it in mind that a society that has already turned 180 deg in the past 10 years could quite possibly turn another 180 deg in the next 10 years.

Even the special economic zones are not terribly successful at the moment. We went to Shenzhen, which is now described as an experiment, although it was not so described previously. Only one third of production is being exported, and investment has been terribly disappointing. Moreover, the area is notorious for its currency black market and smugglers. It sounds just like the West, doesn't it? Whatever the difficulties, however, there is enormous potential. We should not think that British industry and trade will be transformed overnight, because it will not be. However, given the circumstances that I and others have outlined, the Government have a duty and a responsibility to do something quickly.

When I look at the Estimates, which are supposed to be the basis of this debate, I see that we are not spending much, not merely on China, but on anything. The sums involved seem, even to a wicked old monetarist like me, rather like back pocket money. I can think of ridiculous things on which we spend money, yet cases such as this deserve money but do not get it. If I am asked to pick a figure out of the air, I would say double it for starters and see how we get on.

6.2 pm

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): I am not a member of the Select Committee and I should like to offer my compliments to the Chairman and his colleagues on producing a useful report with sensible recommendations. I hope that the Government will examine it most carefully.

I should like there to be a growth in our trade and friendship with China but I cannot foresee the day when lots of Chinese fishermen fish for salmon on the Tay. Of course I should like more Scotch whisky to be exported to China. I should like other indigenous products such as salmon and knitwear to be exported there, but I shall confine myself to the offshore oil and construction industry. I should like to hear what the Minister has to say about the prospects for that industry in the growing Chinese market.

The offshore oil and gas industry is a significant element in the Scottish economy, and hence in the United Kingdom economy. The industry will have to continue to change rapidly if it is to remain the wealth earner and employment generator that it is at the moment. Scores of thousands of people in Scotland are employed in the industry and the emphasis will have to switch to export-led demand.

Our yards are now among the best in Europe. I include in that Scott Lithgow, which is in my constituency, UIE, which is on the Clyde, and Methil, which is in the east of Scotland. We now have the experience and knowledge to seek exports to China, and we need as much help as we can get from the Government. I appreciate the work being done by the Minister of State, Department of Energy, the right hon. Member for Kincardine and Deeside (Mr. Buchanan-Smith), who has made at least one journey to China in an attempt to increase exports.

Because of developments in our offshore industry, we must develop our exports. Scott Lithgow and Ferguson's in my constituency are actively involved. Ferguson's has just won a remarkable export order for two offshore supply vessels for Canada to work in the Beaufort field. The management and work force of Scott Lithgow are at one in their endeavour further to develop work in the design and construction of semi-submersible rigs. What are the prospects for such structures in the Chinese offshore industry?

As Scott Lithgow is a front runner in that technically advanced field, it is essential that it is given all possible aid to sell its products in China and elsewhere. The managing director, Mr. Fudge, who is perhaps the most inappropriately named manager that I have met—there is nothing soft-centred about this laddie — and Mr. Duncan McNeil, the convenor of the shop stewards, are working in the closest co-operation further to develop the reputation of the company.

What are the Government doing to encourage the export of such structures, not the intellectual property which goes with the design and construction of them? It is an important industry to Scotland and hence to the United Kingdom. It is essential that that export market is developed in the next 20 years.

6.8 pm

Mr. Michael Morris (Northampton, South): I too am not a member of the Select Committee and would like to compliment the Committee on its report, not least because it is succinct and makes clear recommendations. I shall not repeat what I said on 5 July.

Since I have been a Member of Parliament, we have had major export drives to the Soviet Union, when Lord Wilson of Rievaulx was Prime Minister, to Iran and to Nigeria. All three of those have gone wrong, but for different reasons.

My plea to my right hon. Friend, therefore, is that we treat trade with China as a topic on its own. We should give it its own budget. We should analyse the work that is put into that trade and what we get out of it. Nigeria went foul on us and every other export market suffered. If something goes wrong with the China trade other export markets will suffer. If we get our act together—the report helped to pave the way—I hope that whichever

Prime Minister and Government are in power in five years' time will see the success that follows from a concentration of resources and good marketing and agree to make resources available for other world markets.

I know Singapore reasonably well. We have worked closely and successfully with the Chinese there. The same applies to Hong Kong. No one has as good an entreé to Hong Kong as we have. We should be able to do something there.

Paragraphs 58 and 59 of the report say a great deal about soft loans. It is not surprising that we have difficulty competing with Japan, Belgium, the Netherlands, Denmark, Germany, Austria, France, Sweden and Italy. They all give soft loans and we do not. I am a member of the Public Accounts Committee. Problems of overexpenditure and funding come before that Committee. I should like to see a report from the Comptroller and Auditor General illustrating the competition that we face as a result of other countries offering soft loans. We must have a significant soft loan budget for China. That budget must be allowed to be rolled over. The Public Accounts Committee recommended that the defence budget be rolled over. I recommend that a soft loan budget be rolled over.

We must be able to make decisions reasonably quickly. I am not asking for decisions within one, four or eight weeks—they should not take more than eight weeks—but at the moment we go on, month in month out, waiting for decisions. My right hon. Friend will not want me to mention a certain dam.

The Minister for Trade (Mr. Paul Channon): My hon. Friend will be pleased to know that good news is on the way.

Mr. Morris: That is even better. Soft loans are the key to improved trade.

The Export Credits Guarantee Department is important. The Public Accounts Committee received written evidence from Northern Engineering Industries plc. I shall quote one sentence:

"The crucial requirement for success is that the supplier should be internationally competitive in cost terms to exactly the same extent" as his competitors. Northern Engineering Industries plc said that it would not have obtained £500 million of business if it had not had support from ECGD. That was good hard evidence. It is rubbish when Mr. Byatt and his colleagues say in their report that there is no evidence of a follow-on employment benefit.

I am sorry to have to mention the Bosporus, but I have a letter from a friend in Bedford who says that as a result of failing to secure the second Bosporus bridge and the Saudi airport terminal contracts, 50 redundancies are being made at Redpath Dorman Long. The key point is that that company is to be wound up and the staff and expertise in that hitherto British-dominated specialty in world terms disbanded. We cannot afford such things.

My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry told me in an Adjournment debate that each 1 per cent. trade gain or loss represented 250,000 jobs. That is a sign of how important our export trade is. One GEC major contracting subsidiary had 7,000 suppliers. The majority of those suppliers are in the black country, the north-west and the north-east. That is why capital goods companies are vital to this country's future prosperity.

My right hon. Friend must respond to the report within 60 days. The recess is ahead of us. I am sorry to make him work ever harder than he normally does during the recess, but I should like to see the response in a form different from that which is normally made to a Select Committee report. I should like to see a marketing plan for exporting to China as the response to this imaginative document.

Mr. Mike Woodcock (Ellesmere Port and Neston): As the Committee's final contributor this afternoon, I realise that, having only five minutes in which to speak, I must be brief.

China is committed to fast economic growth and peace. It is presently undergoing a controlled revolution which will be more far-reaching in its effects than the cultural revolution. Whilst China remains a Socialist country—if Socialism means the state ownership of the means of production, distribution and exchange — it is also a country where collectivism, central control and doctrinal Communism are being rapidly replaced by individual responsibility, the profit motive and reward for effort.

Capitalist principles are being applied and the economy is taking off. People are becoming more prosperous, and that heralds tremendous opportunities for British exporters. We have already heard about many of those opportunities — raw material development, transport, commercial services, tourism and consumer goods. They all provide opportunities for British exporters.

Whilst I was in China, I kept an eye open for export opportunities for people in my constituency. They were many and varied. Companies in my constituency have a great deal of expertise to offer on oil exploration. We can offer refining equipment — even second-hand refining equipment. We have a redundant refinery which could easily be sold to the Chinese. We can assist with lead additives. The Chinese Government have not been as foolish as our Government in seeking to take lead out of petrol. The Associated Octel Company has already made plans to attend the trade fair in Peking. It hopes to do substantial business there.

Nuclear enrichment offers opportunities. China has a booming nuclear industry and nuclear power generation requires enrichment. We have an enrichment facility. We have already signed contracts with the Soviet Union, and I am sure that similar contracts could be signed with China.

There are opportunities for chemicals and fertilisers. Chinese agriculture is booming. There is an enormous need for chemicals and fertilisers and for the plant to manufacture them.

We have a great deal of coal expertise to offer. China has a great deal of coal to get out of the ground.

Even in an industry as outdated as water transport, we have something to offer. The Chinese need to develop water transport to move raw materials to the industrial centres.

Those are some of the opportunities available to firms in my constituency. Those opportunities are repeated hundreds of times across the country. If we could ensure that everyone who goes to China returns to preach the message of the opportunities available, British industry would see that they are tremendous.

We have heard a great deal about the barriers to trade in China—the distance, the difficulty of the market, the need for long-term commitment, the high cost of offices and hotels, the poor telecommunications, the Government's unwillingness to provide soft loans — although I note what my right hon. Friend has said—the difficulties faced by commercial staff in our industries and the COCOM restrictions. Despite all that, business could do a great deal to capitalise on the available opportunities.

Some large companies are doing well. Members of the 48 club are doing well. All companies that wish to export to China must recognise that country's different cultures and values. Those companies must be prepared to go there and negotiate locally over a long time scale and to maintain a local presence. They must be prepared to take advantage of the unique joint venture arrangements in China and of the special economic zones. If they do that, they will soon reaise that China can be an excellent base for exports to all the countries in the far east.

Only three hours ago I talked to Gerry Boxhall, the chief executive of Vickers Defence Systems — a company that has concluded many successful deals in China—and he is flying to Peking on Saturday to talk about a possible joint venture. I asked him what advice he would give to British exporters, and he said that four things are essential. First, take time to ensure that one deals with the right man. It is easy to choose the wrong man and to spend a long time going down the wrong tunnel. Secondly, find out what the Chinese want. A company should not enter China with its perspective of what the Chinese want; it should listen to them. Thirdly, as has already been said, send the top man. The Chinese will not do business with anyone other than the top man. Fourthly, beware of "Mr. Fixits"—the many agents who purport to be a good link between Britain and China.

What can the Government do to help? We have already heard a plea for increased staff in the commercial section of our embassy. It is absurd to have only between five and seven commercial staff in Peking to service a country that has 25 per cent. of the world's population. It is also absurd to have only three British members of staff in Shanghai to service an area that is bigger than the EEC. The Government should also press to liberalise COCOM rules. I say no more about that, because it has already been mentioned several times. The Government must provide soft loans to China. In that respect, we welcome what the Minister said. Perhaps through our embassy, the Government could do something to provide collective office facilities in Peking from which small business men can work without having to pay the high costs of offices there.

I end with a warning. China needs technology, and we need profitable exports. We have the basis of trade to our mutual advantage. But some—perhaps the cynics—may say that the Chinese want cheap, or even free, technology transfer, capital goods at uneconomic prices and soft loans on extended terms, which almost mean payment out of profits. It could be argued that, if we are not careful, we shall export technology on terms that destroy jobs in the United Kingdom for little commercial gain. United Kingdom firms may be lured into uneconomic business, believing that a foot in the door will lead to profits later. However, that door may be closed when the transfer of technology is completed.

My visit to a Shanghai factory, where workers were earning less than £30 a month producing shirts with Van Heusen labels, gave me a vivid insight into the possible effects of technology transfer on British jobs. I offer those thoughts not as a deterrent, but as a warning to companies to ensure that the business they do in China is profitable and advantageous to them and to United Kingdom interests.

In the long term, Britain can compete with China only if it is ahead in technology and if it has better management and marketing skills. Let us look to China with optimism, but with realism.

Mr. Bryan Gould (Dagenham): I, too, congratulate the hon. Member for Hastings and Rye (Mr. Warren) on his report and on the speech with which he opened the debate. It has been universally agreed in the debate that the report is valuable and has been an extremely useful spur to a greater and proper recognition of the immense opportunities offered by the Chinese market. Many contributors to the debate bore witness to the immensity of that market, to the prospects for growth and to the political changes, which mean that there is a new readiness to open trade doors.

In 1978, I had the good fortune to visit China at an interesting moment in its history. The cultural revolution had just ended, and Deng Xiaoping had not yet properly asserted himself, but there were extremely high hopes about the prospects for trade with China. It must be said that, almost immediately, those hopes were dashed. For about three years after 1979, trade with China suffered severely. The Select Committee report makes clear that Britain now enjoys only 1 per cent. of the Chinese market for imports.

That is worrying, because Britain of all countries should have the inside lane. We have a long involvement with Hong Kong which, in turn, gives us a privileged commercial entree. In the wake of the political agreement to settle the future of Hong Kong, we bask in the warmth of a new glow of friendship and approval from Peking. It is entirely appropriate that we should now try to reverse what is, in all conscience, a disappointing trade performance so far. I am sorry to disturb the welcome, all-party consensus that has dominated the debate, but it must be said that that disappointing performance is of a piece with our general trade performance. My hon. Friend the Member for Rotherham (Mr. Crowther) and others have said that, from 1983 onwards, we have had a deficit in our trade in manufactured goods that is growing rapidly and disastrously.

The report makes clear that British industry could do much for itself. I am sure that industry will read the report with interest, and will look forward to receiving the handbook which, interestingly and innovatively, the Select Committee intends to produce.

However, the debate is primarily about the Government's responsibility for promoting exports to and trade with China. I am in a slight difficulty here, because whenever I tax the Minister with the fact that our trade in manufactured goods has declined, he usually replies, "What are you worried about? We are balancing our trade. We could not continue to produce goods and rack up great surpluses. In any case, the Government can do nothing about the loss of trade in manufactured goods."

The Government are being inconsistent. On the one hand, they argue that the decline in our trade has been the inevitable consequence of North sea oil and other factors. On the other hand, the Minister and others rightly lay considerable emphasis on the need to improve competitiveness and productivity. What is the point of doing that if no improvement in our trading performance is possible? However, if it is possible, by improving competitiveness and productivity, to improve our trading performance, those are matters for which the Government must take some responsibility.

On export support and promotion, the Government's position is sometimes similarly confused. On the one hand, understandably, and with the support of most hon. Members, the Government express outrage at an episode such as the loss of the Bosporus bridge contract. On the other hand, the Government, wedded strongly to their free market ideology and their dislike of subsidy and public spending, are tempted by the thought that they should stand aloof from efforts to support our exporters in those difficult markets. From time to time, there is a worrying element of what one could call unilateral disarmament in the Government's position.

The Select Committee has served a useful purpose in drawing attention to the undeniable fact that such a policy will get us nowhere in our trade with China. For the Chinese, soft loans and extended credit terms are essential. They are an intrinsic part of the deal, on the basis of which the Chinese will decide whether to give business to us or to our competitors. With the Select Committee, I welcome the belated step the Government have announced that soft loans will be extended to China. However, we must remember that that step will be taken within the present limits of the aid and trade provision. Therefore, it is a diversion of resources rather than an increase. Aid will be provided on existing terms, which in many cases will not match those offered by our competitors. As the hon. Member for Hastings and Rye said, there seems to be a lack of urgency in introducing the new regime. I urge the Minister to make clear that he sees the urgency of what is required and that he will move rapidly to make sure that our exporters are not at a disadvantage in this important matter.

The problem for the Government is that some years ago they commissioned the Byatt report, which was produced from within Whitehall. Although the report was published, it was never debated. It purported to show that there were serious lapses in the reasoning to support export promotion. Its conclusion was to the effect that such promotion was undesirable and probably unnecessary and impracticable.

Understandably, that report created anxiety and led to some uproar among the business community. That must have been increased by the signs that the Byatt report philosophy had taken root to some extent. For example, the Chief Secretary to the Treasury, in a speech made over a year ago to the association of engineering employers in the west midlands, referred to the report in approving terms.

However, what seems acceptable to civil servants and Ministers does not necessarily commend itself to firms engaged in the actual business of trying to obtain such orders. Not surprisingly, industry has reacted strongly, sharply and critically to the Byatt report. The Government's own Overseas Projects Board published its fourth report in April this year. It said that the Byatt report was "seriously flawed". It continued:

"recently we have become very concerned at the Government's apparent ambivalence as reflected in delays in handling ATP cases, some curtailment of the ECGD's facilities and pressure on ECGD to adopt a more cautious attitude to 'country risk' than that taken by many of the UK's competitors. These developments leave a feeling that the Government may not fully understand industry's needs and serve to undermine confidence".

That body was set up by the Government and consists of leading industrialists and financiers, so it is not normally critical of the Government. Therefore, I trust that the Government will take some notice of what it had to say.

Mr. Wells: What does the hon. Gentleman understand by an increase in soft loans and the place in the budget from which it comes? I understand that the Labour party believes that the ODA's budget should be expanded and that the ATP should not take an increased share of that budget. I understand that his proposal, and what he is approving, is an expansion of the ATP, but without expanding the ODA budget. In that case, we shall be in serious difficulty in other sectors of export support, as 70 per cent. of the ODA's bilateral budget goes to the acquisition of British goods and products.

Mr. Gould: The hon. Gentleman is right to draw a distinction between the ODA and the ATP, but I assure him that, while we would wish to see, and have argued persistently and strongly for, an expansion of the ODA budget, we are entirely in support of industry and many of the bodies that I am about to cite when we say that an increase in the ATP is also required. I hope that there will be no misunderstanding on that.

After the Overseas Projects Board report, the next blow was struck by the National Economic Development Office report, which was a response to the Chancellor's challenge to produce some evidence of follow on. That report is a full and detailed rebuttal of the reasoning underlined by the Byatt report. It gives in more than adequate detail, chapter and verse, example after example, of follow on business being obtained. For example, Balfour Beatty in Indonesia, with the aid of £15 million worth of provision, has secured over the past 12 years £317 million worth of business. That point is reinforced by the Select Committee when it emphasises the need for British firms not just to fly in and out of the market but to stay in it and expect to develop business over a long time.

The next response from industry was the formation into a group of 13 major British contractors employing 394,000 people, and underpinning thousands of sub-contracting firms and all the jobs that depend on that. The group has been brought into being to make the case for this form of export support on the ground that it is the essential element in obtaining an important part of the business on which they depend.

What is now needed — here I am happy to echo points already made — is for the Overseas Projects Board, the major British exporters and everybody else who has looked at the subject to agree on a substantial increase in ATP. We have to get away from the idea that we are talking about subsidy when we are talking about an essential Government effort to match what other Governments are doing to support their industry. The Japanese have an ATP budget of 40 times ours. Even the French have a provision that is 10 times as great as ours. In 1984-85, it is estimated that ATP of £59 million produced orders of £222 million. That is good value for money in anybody's terms.

As the hon. Member for Northampton, South (Mr. Morris) said, it is nonsense that accounting rules prevent us from spending money that is available under this provision. We need a roll-over provision because I understand that, over recent years, £16 million worth of this provision has not been spent, and that is nonsense.

There is also the point, made by Conservative Members, that we need to initiate the provision of help. Too often, we send our exporters into battle inadequately armed. They go in and get some interest in a contract, but then they have to come back to ask whether they can match the terms offered by foreign competitors. That gives a bad impression to start with, and inevitably leads to delay and catching up because we are lagging behind.

Something has to be done about procedural delays, as is universally agreed. There are too many bodies in Whitehall tossing ideas backwards and forwards. We had the disastrous experience of the Bosporus bridge contract.

We looked to be in danger of repeating that experience with the Samanala Wewa hydro-electric dam in Sri Lanka. I know that the Sri Lankans are keen that British firms get that contract, but there is a danger that we shall lose it. I was delighted to hear the Minister's cryptic intervention. I hope that he has some good news for us and that that good news has not come too late. It is running things rather tight to have left that project to simmer away in Whitehall for so long. It would be useful if the Minister could tell us what is happening to the shake up of the export promotion effort, which was written up in one of the Sunday papers about four weeks ago and on which we were promised results by the end of the month, although these have yet to come. Is there more good news in the pipeline?

The ECGD has faced difficult trading conditions, and unnecessary political uncertainty engendered by the process of the Mathews report and the internal departmental report, and so on. Industry is clear about the fact that we need more resources for the ECGD, particularly for its ability to cover things such as tender for contract cover.

As the Select Committee points out forcefully, there is the problem of the reduction in real terms of the British Overseas Trade Board's budget. That is a strong example of penny wise, pound foolish and it calls into question the Government's seriousness of purpose when they are willing to cut the budget of the major body designed to encourage British exports.

As a former second secretary, commercial, in our embassy in Brussels, I have considerable sympathy with the Select Committee's strictures about the staffing of our embassy in Peking. Five to seven commercial staff is simply not good enough. Three full-time staff in Shanghai is ridiculous for an area as great as the EEC, as hon. Members tonight and the Select Committee have pointed out.

There are other matters. One could go on with a long list, starting with the BBC external services and Chinese students coming to Britain — all important projects through which we could engender the relationship with China that would make the task of our exporters so much easier. Unfortunately, yet again the Government are cutting back the budgets for those projects, and doing so quite unrealistically.

I have only a minute to deal with the important and vexed question of COCOM. We had an excellent debate in Committee yesterday on this subject. The Minister for Trade was kind enough to say that he recognised the force of the argument that the rules of the COCOM arrangement should be substantially relaxed in the case of China, something for which my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) argued forcefully. I am glad that he is aware of that point, and is negotiating even now to secure that relaxation. The problem of trade with China consists of all those matters, and the underlying lack of competitiveness of British industry. As the Select Committee said, the Chinese will buy from us only if we are competitive.

I shall conclude on a tendentious but accurate point. Despite ministerial rhetoric, we have lost competitiveness. Every index of competitiveness shows that we have lost ground during the past five years. Day by day the problem is exacerbated by the Treasury-dominated Government, who are using high interest rates to force up the value of the pound. This is destroying our competitive position against our most dangerous rivals. Until the Minister and his colleagues get to grips with the Treasury and persuade it that trade matters are of immense importance to our economic future, we cannot take seriously the Government's intentions for the trading opportunities with China.

If the Select Committee has done even a little to remind the Government of the immense importance and opportunities of what beckons us in China, it will have done a good job.

6.40 pm

The Minister for Trade (Mr. Paul Channon): I intend to base my remarks wholly on the draft given me by my hon. Friend the Member for Fulham (Mr. Stevens). In future I shall use him exclusively as my speech writer. I agree with all hon. Members who have said what a splendid report the Select Committee has produced. The Government congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Hastings and Rye (Mr. Warren) and his colleagues on their impressive report.

The hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) introduced general points, and I am tempted to spend time replying to him, but that would be unfair because I want to deal with China. Nevertheless, first I shall reply to some of those generalities. My hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, South (Mr. Morris) has been the most fervent advocate of the Samanala Wewa project. The Government are delighted to offer ATP—aid and trade provision—for that project and I hope that it will be a success. We are delighted to initiate ATP in suitable cases, and there is no inhibition about that. We shall certainly try to reduce any delays that may exist, and we are constantly taking steps to improve the workings of ATP. Indeed, as the hon. Member for Dagenham rightly pointed out, ATP has been underspent in recent years. It will not be underspent significantly this year, and we have taken steps to ensure that it will not be underspent significantly in future.

I return to the specific points about China. We have had the report only since Monday, and I hoped to reply to it all this afternoon, which would be a record. However, I am slightly put off by my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, South, who suggested that I should reply to it in a different form later this summer. Nevertheless, I can say something about some of the recommendations this afternoon. We shall consider the report carefully and reply in the normal way when we have the time to consider it more fully. If I do not have time to answer all the points raised this afternoon, I shall write to hon. Members.

The debate and the report are well timed. Large numbers of hon. Members are well aware of the opportunity for expanding our trade with China, which is a view widely shared outside the House. Why has China become such an important topic in terms of trade recently? First, we have entered a new phase in our political relations. The United Kingdom-China joint declaration on Hong Kong was signed during the visit of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister to Peking in December, ratified on 27 May, and followed by the welcome visit to Britain last month by the Chinese premier, His Excellency Mr. Zhao Ziyang. It has been announced that Her Majesty the Queen will make a state visit to China next year. During Premier Zhao's visit, both Governments reaffirmed their wish to see United Kingdom-China co-operation develop even faster in the years ahead.

The second main reason for renewed interest in trade with China is that the development of China's economy during the next two decades offers real opportunities for many British companies, as the Select Committee pointed out. Perhaps the greatest opportunities are in China's economic priority sectors of energy, transport, telecommunications and industrial modernisation, in which we have great expertise. There are also opportunities for co-operation in areas such as agriculture, health care, electronics, information technology, defence sales and transport. British aircraft companies have had considerable success recently. China recently signed contracts for the delivery of 10 BAe146 aircraft worth some $150 million, and eight Short Brothers SD360 aircraft.

In energy, our coal mining industry has a long history of co-operation with China. Premier Zhao visited Anderson Strathclyde, one of our major suppliers of coal mining equipment. I hope that the hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman) feels that Scotland got a look in on that visit. Negotiations on the Guangdong nuclear project are now at an advanced stage. I hope that GEC will shortly receive the turbine generator contract when outstanding issues have been resolved.

In telecommunications, Cable and Wireless has entered into joint ventures to develop the telecommunications system in south China, and is holding discussions about co-operation in other parts of China. Other major projects are under negotiation—for example, in steel and non-ferrous metals.

There are also good prospects for growth in invisibles, which were not mentioned during the debate. The British Invisible Exports Council held an extremely good seminar in Peking, and the chairman of Lloyd's recently led a successful mission to China with the aim of further developing Britain's large reinsurance business with China.

In recommendation 5 the Select Committee suggests that we should ensure that information about tenders is disseminated effectively, and we shall certainly do our best to ensure that. Incidentally, I have received no complaints about that. For the world aid section, which is an important part of the World Bank's programme of lending to China, we shall continue to ensure that details are available as early as possible. Although the present position is not wholly satisfactory, as hon. Members pointed out, there are good prospects for the future.

There have been good exchange visits at Government level. The visit of my noble Friend Lord Young, Minister without Portfolio, who led a high level business mission earlier this year, opened up an enormous number of valuable opportunities. Later this year my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food will also visit China. We have had visits from the Chinese Ministers of Agriculture and of the Environment. A great deal has been going on and the momentum must be kept up.

As the Committee stressed, China is not an easy market. It remains a state trading country where doing business can be expensive, difficult and slow. The language and cultural barriers need to be overcome. Reliable market information is hard to obtain, and it is not always easy to identify potential Chinese customers. The present pace of change has added to the difficulties.

It is essential for business men, especially newcomers to the market, to understand the potential problems and to seek advice on how to overcome them. They will need patience and perseverance, and to be competitive. As my hon. Friend the Member for Honiton (Sir P. Emery) and others pointed out, business with China can take a variety of forms and the transfer of technology is extremely important. We have a much better record than the Japanese and nearly every other country on that. Wherever I go—I have just returned from the far east—it is pointed out that the United Kingdom is much better at transferring technology than Japan. When hon. Members go abroad, I hope that they will point that out, because it is the truth.

Joint venture agreements are a further promising area. Some companies selling to China, especially medium-sized and smaller ones, would do well to form links with one of the large international trading companies with offices in China, or to work with a Hong Kong partner experienced in trade with China.

The official export services are one important source of advice and help. I think that the Committee saw our publication entitled "Selling to China". We shall await with great interest the Committee's own publication.

In recommendation 7, the Committee made a plea for greater resources to be devoted generally to promoting exports. There are already the export services of the BOTB, the ECGD, the ATP and the trade promotion work of British diplomatic posts abroad. Up to 75 per cent. of the users of BOTB services—the figure may be even a little higher—are small firms with fewer than 200 employees. Helping large companies to win orders benefits many smaller companies through sub-contracts and equipment orders.

I understand the Committee's desire to see an increase in the funds available to the BOTB. I note that that seems to be the view of the House. The funds have been held constant in cash terms. The House will know that the resources available to the Department of Trade and Industry are, unfortunately, finite, but my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will examine the Committee's recommendation carefully when considering other conflicting claims on his budget.

When we have debates on other issues such as research and development, compelling demands are made, sometimes by the same hon. Members, for an increase in that budget. Others say that Government expenditure should be held steady or reduced. However, that is a very important matter, and my right hon. Friend will pay the closest attention to the views of the House.

The hon. Member for Rotherham (Mr. Crowther) was, uncharacteristically, a little unfair when he said that the Government were not interested in China, or words to that effect. In fact, BOTB spending last year in support of exports to China was over £1 million, more per pound of exports than was spent on any other market in the world. Expenditure this year will, again, be at a high level. BOTB expects to support British groups at 12 international exhibitions. I shall not read out the whole list, but I can give it to those hon. Members who are interested.

The board also expects to support 11 outward and inward missions. It will pay a grant in aid to the Sino-British Trade Council. We are pleased that Sir Eric Sharp has become the new president. I am sure that everyone will wish to thank Sir Peter Matthews for his work as president of the council for a very long time.

Increased resources for the BOTB in China were mentioned, but we must look at the priorities elsewhere. The Committee was keen on western Europe and the countries of the Association of the South Eastern Asian Nations. We must consider whether it would be better to spend more money in western Europe, the United States, China or elsewhere. There are good cases for all of them.

Diplomatic posts are mainly a matter for my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary. When I was in China not long ago, we did not have a consulate general in Shanghai, but we do now. That is a major step forward at a time when other posts are having to be closed. The Committee was informed in evidence given by the permanent under-secretary to the Foreign and Commonwealth Office that the staff in Peking has been increased by adding a new first secretary responsible for energy matters.

The commercial staffing in China numbers 10. That is larger than that of any of our European rivals. Only Japan and France have more. Therefore, our number is higher than that of the United States of America, West Germany, Sweden and Italy and is not out of line with that of many others. However, again, that is a matter of priorities. Many requests come to the Foreign Office for posts in places such as Miami. There is a strong case for reopening there, for the important market in South America referred to by some hon. Members. We are asked to put more resources there or in other places. My right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary will study the points made in the debate about staffing.

Credit terms have been mentioned on many occasions. China is eligible for the full range of credit facilities from the ECGD. There is no shortage of cover. I do not think that firms should be deterred on that account. Until recently China has not been eligible for support under the ATP. However, the Government have decided that in future ATP support will be available for China. That is a considerable step forward. At present that is only on the usual ATP terms of a mixture of grants with export credits, and the funds available are limited.

Therefore, it is right that we should discuss with the financial community the mechanisms that might be devised for providing soft loans. That will be equally true in Indonesia as well as China, as was announced a little while ago. My hon. Friends the Members for Hertford and Stortford (Mr. Wells) and for Hastings and Rye dealt with that matter. We shall proceed speedily with those talks. I cannot say what the conclusions will be today. The announcement was made only on 9 July, but when the House returns in the autumn I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Hastings and Rye will table a question on the first day. I know that if he does not receive a satisfactory answer he will create havoc.

Resources will still be limited and most of our exports to China will continue to be paid for either in cash or on normal credit terms. Reference was made to increasing the ATP budget. I note the views of the House about that. They will be considered carefully by my right hon. Friends in the public expenditure round.

Technical co-operation has also been mentioned. Among other things, the ODA contributes to the cost of consultancies. The hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) talked about British consultants. We hope that that contribution will lead to commercial benefit for Britain. The ODA also contributes to the costs of Chinese students coming to Britain for further education. The number has trebled from a low base, as my hon. Friend the Member for Fulham said. The Committee recommended that ODA funding should be increased, and that recommendation will be considered carefully. Many companies make arrangements to bring Chinese people to Britain for training, and I hope that other companies will follow their example.

The COCOM countries have already agreed to apply controls to China more flexibly than to the Soviet bloc countries. On a British initiative, they have agreed to speed up the processing of applications for China. The possibility of further relaxations is under consideration. Britain is playing a leading role in the discussions. We have made clear to our COCOM partners the British view, which I think is widely shared, that there are several areas of high technology in which the West can contribute to China's modernisation without damage to our other interests. There will be further discussions in September, and the views of the House will be useful to us.

No applications have been made in regard to Dalian airport. I cannot see any reason why civil radar should be any problem under the COCOM rules.

The hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow referred to offshore oil and gas. The prospects, which are considerable, depend to some extent on how soon oil is found in commercial amounts. British Petroleum is playing a major part in the search. Last year the Government supported a major oil seminar in Peking, Shanghai and Canton, arranged by the Sino-British Trade Council. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Energy went there. He takes a keen interest in the subject.

Railways have been mentioned by several hon. Members. One company — Strachan and Henshaw — recently won a substantial order for coal unloading equipment. We are in touch with the companies connected with the industry and railway electrification. There may be opportunities in the not-too-distant-future in underground railways or metros.

The hon. Members for Greenock and Port Glasgow and for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace) will be interested to remember that it was owing to British persuasion that the China National Offshore Oil Corporation set up its European office in Britain despite strong competition from other parts of Europe.

The Overseas Projects Board is a valuable source of advice to me and my colleagues. We agree on the need to use the ATP flexibly and efficiently. The recent measures that have been taken will, I hope, help greatly in that respect.

The hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) referred to the Byatt report. It provided an interesting input to thinking on this important topic. It has not met with unanimous support. It never represented Government policy. That is shown by the fact that we are already taking steps to improve the ATP. With regard to soft loans for China, we are the only country that does not have them.

There is a host of ways in which we can increase our trade with China, which I know is the wish of the whole House. Our exports to China are at a low level, but they have increased considerably in the past few years. A few years ago they were worth about £110 million. I remember going to Cyprus when we exported more there than we did to China. The hon. Member for Dagenham may criticise us for many things, but when he is talking about trade with China he is on a weak wicket. Trade with China has gone up considerably. Even taking the freakish figures for last year, which included some erratic exports, it has more than doubled. Prospects for expansion of trade are good.

The Committee has done a useful job and we shall be answering its report fully in the usual way. We are aware of the importance of exports to China and we shall do our best to expand trade. I know that the House will be vigilant to ensure that the Government take the necessary steps towards that end. But, above all, it will be for business to seize the initiative. I am sure that industry will be grateful that we have had this debate today.

It being Seven o'clock, the Question was deferred, pursuant to Standing Order No. 19 (Consideration of Estimates) and to order [4 July].

Orders of the Day

Insolvency Bill [Lords]

As amended (in the Standing Committee), considered.

New Clause 5

AUTHORISATION OF MEMBERS OF RECOGNISED PROFESSIONAL BODIES

"(1) A member of a recognised professional body is authorised to act as an insolvency practitioner if he is permitted so to act by or under the rules of that body.

(2) The Secretary of State may by order declare a body which appears to him to fall within subsection (3) below to be a recognised professional body for purposes of this section; and any such order may be revoked by a further order if it appears to the Secretary of State that the body no longer falls within that subsection.

(3) This subsection applies to any body which regulates the practice of a profession and maintains and enforces rules for securing that such of its members as are permitted by or under the rules to act as insolvency practitioners

(a) are fit and proper persons so to act; and

(b) meet acceptable requirements as to education and practical training and experience.

(4) Any order under subsection (2) above shall have effect from such date as is specified in the order; and any such order revoking a previous order may make provision whereby members of the body in question continue to be treated as authorised to act as insolvency practitioners for a specified period after the revocation takes effect.

(5) In this section references to members of a recognised professional body are references to persons who, whether members of that body or not, are subject to its rules in the practice of the profession in question." [Mr. Fletcher]

Brought up, and read the First time.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. Alex Fletcher): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): With this it will be convenient to take new clause 6 — Applications for authorisation.

Government new clause 7 — Grant, refusal and withdrawal of authorisation.

Government amendments Nos. 5 to 7, 233 and 239.

Mr. Fletcher: This clause replaces the existing delegation clause 5 in the Bill, and provides that a member of a recognised professional body is authorised to act as an insolvency practitioner if he is permitted to act by the rules of that body. We expect such members to comprise the largest proportion of qualified insolvency practitioners in future. On application by a body for recognition, the Secretary of State will have regard to whether it regulates the practice of a profession and will seek assurances that it will be able to maintain and enforce rules for securing that those of its members authorised to act as insolvency practitioners are fit and proper persons, and meet acceptable requirements as to education, practical training and experience.

Our consultations with the main accounting and legal bodies will ensure that those requirements are suitably balanced between the member of a recognised professional body and the person authorised to act by the Secretary of State or other relevant authority.

The purpose of new clause 6 is to lay down the manner, content and form of an individual's application to the relevant authority. It also gives the latter various powers in relation to applications. Amendment No. 7 deletes clause 3 dealing with applications for certificates. The relevant authority will also have to consider whether the applicant meets the prescribed requirements with respect to education, practical training and experience. This differs from existing provisions in the Bill, in that we have added education and have stipulated that training should be practical.

The effect of these changes is to ensure that those applying to relevant authorities — and we expect that they will mainly be individuals who do not belong to professional bodies recognised for insolvency purposes —will have to meet requirements equally demanding as those faced by members of professional bodies.

Mr. Gerald Bermingham (St. Helens, South): Will the Minister tell us whether he sees the Department's role as supervisory? Each of the professional bodies has its own rules and regulations about training and, of course, there ought to be some uniformity between them. In future, does the Department see itself telling the Law Society, the Bar Council, the Institute of Chartered Accountants and the Institute of Insolvency Practitioners exactly what remit they must follow to secure adequacy of training?

Mr. Fletcher: I would not use the term supervisory body, but, as the hon. Gentleman suggests, it is important there should be a balance of expectation between the relevant authority and the qualifications, education, training and experience looked for by the professional body. This will be done. At the moment, we are discussing with the professional bodies precisely what standards and what rules there should be for establishing this new arrangement, because there must be similarity in the way that various bodies and the Secretary of State exercise their powers. That is what the hon. Gentleman has referred to, and I hope that clarifies the point he made. It is not just a matter of making sure that the new arrangements continue to be managed properly by the professional bodies; it is a matter of saying that they get off to a good start and that rules are laid down that can be referred to if any doubt or any questions arise in future.

Mr. Bermingham: The Minister has pinpointed the matter that worries me. Is the Department of Trade going to say to the Institute of Chartered Accountants or the Institute of Certified Accountants, "These are the criteria which we will demand in the training courses so that a person may become an insolvency practitioner"? If that is the case, it seems that the Department of Trade is seeking to interfere in the standards and codes of conduct of those professional bodies.

Mr. Fletcher: We are making sure that we get off to a good start. It is not a matter of laying down rules, but a matter of agreeing with the professional bodies. I take the implication of the hon. Gentleman's point, that these bodies are well used to regulating the professional standards of their members. However, we must try to achieve the maximum amount of equivalence of treatment between the individual bodies—there will be several of them—and the way the authorisation is carried out by the Department. For that reason, we are having consultations with the professional bodies and wish to lay down guidelines for their benefit as well as for our own.

I was saying that we expect that those who are authorised by the relevant authority will be mainly individuals who do not belong to professional bodies recognised for insolvency purposes. I added that they will have to meet requirements equally demanding as those faced by members of the professional bodies. That is the obverse of the point made by the hon. Gentleman. For obvious reasons there cannot be the same requirements for those applying to the Secretary of State, because they will have a different background from that of members of professional bodies. We will seek to balance them as near as we can, and our consultations with the main professional bodies are continuing on that basis. One other change is that subsection (3) will allow more flexibility in fixing the length of time that an authorisation can continue in force.

Amendment No. 5 is necessary, because, whereas clause 2 refers to certification of practitioners by the Secretary of State, the provisions introduced by new clauses 5, 6 and 7 refer to authorisation by membership of a recognised body or by a relevant authority. Accordingly, amendments to clause 2 are necessary to accommodate these changes. The amendment to clause 2, which is amendment No. 6, adds references to the mental health legislation and is as a result of an amendment moved in Committee by my hon. Friend the Member for Tynemouth (Mr. Trotter). It is intended that any person who is subject to either of the specified mental health enactments will be disqualified from acting as an insolvency practitioner. Should an order under the mental health legislation be lifted, it will be possible for a person to apply for authorisation in the normal way. The hon. Gentleman will remember that we considered this matter in Committee.

Turning to amendment No. 233, schedule 9 contains the transitional provisions relating to insolvency practitioners, but makes reference only to clause 2(2). The additions to that clause expand subsection (2) into two subsections, Nos. 2 and 3. Therefore, an appropriate amendment to schedule 9 is required. The amendment to schedule 10 is amendment No. 239. Section 302(1) of the Companies Act 1985 provides that an undischarged bankrupt who is formally appointed or assumes the role of a director or liquidator of a company commits an offence unless he first obtains leave of the court to so act. The words, "or liquidator" have been rendered redundant by existing clause 238 and amended clause 248 which disqualifies an undischarged bankrupt from acting as an insolvency practitioner, which term includes a liquidator, in any circumstances. I commend the amendments to the House.

Mr. Bryan Gould (Dagenham): My calculation is that simply to read out the vast number and volume of Government amendments and new clauses, let alone explain them and debate them, would take some hours. Therefore, in commenting on many of the amendments we are constrained to be extremely brief, and I shall be brief.

When we considered the provisions in Committee we had before us a relatively simple, comprehensible structure. Either someone obtained the necessary authorisation by being a member of a recognised professional body or, if he could not achieve that, he applied for individual certification and, no doubt, obtained it from the Secretary of State.

I imagine that the Minister was telling the House that this new and much more complex structure was the consequence of consultations with the professional bodies. I am rather taken aback to discover that what should have been a relatively simple change has required several new clauses and further amendments. So we are left with a more complicated position.

What we now face leaves open a number of questions. As my hon. Friend the Member for St. Helens, South (Mr. Bermingham) asked, what will be the role of the Secretary of State in this? Surely he will take some sort of co-ordinating responsibility to ensure some uniformity of practice and standards, even if his role is not supervisory.

What will be the attitude of the Secretary of State and the relevant authorities to the questions which engaged members of the Committee when we discussed these matters? For example, what will be the attitude towards members of professional bodies—let us say, the Law Society or the Institute of Accountants—who have not passed specialised papers in insolvency? What rule, principle or practice will be applied?

Given that one of the major objectives of the new provisions is to make it possible for those who have never passed and are never likely to pass examinations or to gain admission to a professional body nevertheless to qualify as insolvency practitioners, what do we know about the criteria which the Minister or the relevant authorities will apply to experience? It is exactly from that area that some of the major problems have arisen in the past and where some of those who have most disgraced the profession have come. I argue that experience, while necessary as a qualifying condition simply because it is needed for transitional purposes, should be limited to that transitional period and that we should be aiming to move towards a profession where either membership of a recognised professional body or the passing of some recognised examination should be the essential precondition for entry into the profession. Will the Minister explain how the new structure will reflect upon and influence those matters?

Mr. Jeremy Hanley (Richmond and Barnes): Will the Minister say what form of consultation he will be holding with the professional bodies during the summer recess? If that consultation is to be meaningful, no doubt coupled with our experience so far — it is unique in my experience to have 1,000 Government amendments made to a Bill of 200 clauses originating in the other place—surely there are bound to be more amendments recommended during the recess. What is the procedure for bringing what might be wise and sensible amendments before the House when right hon. and hon. Members return after the recess?

Mr. Bruce Millan (Glasgow, Govan): I must first declare an interest as a member of the Institute of Chartered Accountants of Scotland, which hopes to be one of the recognised professional bodies and has been engaged in discussions with the Government. I am also parliamentary adviser to the institute.

I take the point made by the hon. Member for Richmond and Barnes (Mr. Hanley). We are in difficulty in dealing with this vast number of amendments to a Bill that has already been through the other place and in any case has been under discussion for a number of years, what with the Cork report, the White Paper and so on. It is an unsatisfactory way of dealing with important legislation.

In the new clauses we have a complete rewriting of part I. It so happens that I welcome that, so I am not complaining about the merits of what the Government are doing. However, it is not a satisfactory way of dealing with legislation, and it is extremely difficult, with not only this group of amendments but with a number of others that we shall be discussing later, to know exactly how the Bill will stand when the amendments have been made. There will be wholesale changes in the Bill if the various Government amendments are carried. I regret that we are dealing with important matters in his way.

I ask the Minister a couple of questions for clarification, and one of them follows on from what my hon. Friend the Member for St. Helens, South (Mr. Bermingham) said. I am not clear what the relevant authority will be, as distinct from the Secretary of State. As I understand it, the definitions of "relevant authorities" are exclusive of the professional bodies. Will the Minister confirm that a number of the other new clauses which refer to relevant authorities do not refer to the procedures under the recognised professional bodies?

If a member of a professional body is not granted authority under new clause 5 by the recognised professional body, I assume that he does not have an appeal from there to the tribunal. If he is turned down by his own professional body, it appears that there is nothing to stop him applying to the Secretary of State or the relevant authority and then subsequently to the tribunal. Will the Minister confirm that all the provisions about tribunals, appeals and so on are nothing to do with new clause 5, which deals with recognised professional bodies?

I come, then, to the matter raised by my hon. Friend the Member for St. Helens, South and by my hon. Friend the Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) about the rules. By amendment No. 10, the Government will be providing for rules by way of regulation, and these rules will include "provision as to the matters to be taken into account in determining whether a person is a fit and proper person to act as an insolvency practitioner."

As I read it, the amendment will apply to professional bodies as well as to the relevant authorities.

Mr. Alex Fletcher indicated assent.

Mr. Millan: If that is correct, there will be a supervisory function by the Secretary of State. He will lay down the rules by way of regulation which will apply to applications to professional bodies as well as to applications to the relevant authorities. So there will be an element of standardisation. I do not complain about that, but it is unsatisfactory. We are dealing with it at a late stage in our consideration of the Bill, and we have no idea so far what is likely to be provided for in these regulations and we have no idea how far they will impose obligations on professional bodies and how far the professional bodies will have to change their internal rules and procedures to meet the regulations.

As I see it, by a subsequent amendment there will be supervision, but at the moment we have no idea what that supervision may entail.

Mr. Tim Smith (Beaconsfield): I am a member of the Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales, and its parliamentary adviser. Obviously the institute would hope to become a recognised professional body for the purposes of the new clauses.

I have a lot of sympathy with what has been said in the debate. Part of the answer to the hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould), who asked how we would achieve a degree of consistency in the new arrangements, is that there is a precedent. It is not unprecedented for the Department to recognise bodies in this way because four are already recognised for the purposes of auditing under the Companies Acts. The Department does not recognise a body and leave it at that; it has a role in constantly supervising and ensuring that the body concerned maintains the highest standards. Nevertheless, a lot of detailed matters need to be dealt with.

I wish to ask two questions of my hon. Friend. First, as I did not have the good fortune to be a member of the Committee, I am not clear about the position of those insolvency practitioners who will be qualified by virtue of their experience. When the provisions in relation to auditors were enacted in 1948, only those qualified by experience up to the time that the Act came into force were recognised. That would seem to be the right parallel.

Secondly, I imagine that the changes to the Bill will be considered in another place, I hope in October rather than next week. If it is in October, those who have an interest in these matters will have had an opportunity to consider them. I understand that the new clauses under consideration today were tabled last Thursday, so that effectively there has been a good deal less than a working week in which to consider them. I hope that my hon. Friend will confirm that he is prepared to consider further representations if the interested parties have views to offer on them.

Mr. Bermingham: Consideration of the Bill is beginning to sound like the well-known musical which speaks of 1,001 nights. This is a Bill of 1,001 amendments, or small cuts. With respect to the Minister, we still seem not to have it right. I wish to draw his attention to several minor points.

As my right hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Govan (Mr. Millan) said, amendment No. 10 refers to laying down the prescribed rules. Who will advise the Secretary of State what should be in the prescribed rules? We are now getting into a cyclic argument. I sincerely hope that the persons who advise the Secretary of State will be from among insolvency practitioners. I would shudder if I thought that civil servants would do this. The Minister knows well why I say that, after one or two comments which I made in Committee about advice received by Ministers on occasion.

With regard to new clause 5, I draw the attention of the Minister to the word "acceptable", which I suggest is the wrong word to use. It would be far better to use "prescribed". Indeed, new clause 12 contains a definition of "prescribed". This would perhaps get us out of the problem.

I should have declared an interest at the beginning of my speech, which I know is well known to hon. Members. I am a practising barrister and have acted as a solicitor in insolvency in the past and no doubt will do so again in future, so let the record show that the Bill is of some considerable interest to me.

I do not necessarily wish to see the Bill go on to the statute book. I shall have some comments to make on certain other clauses which are gobbledegook and will lead to litigation. Needless litigation benefits nobody. This is our last opportunity to attempt to get it right, bearing in mind that it has taken over 100 years since the last Bill on these matters was brought in by Joseph Chamberlain in 1882, if my memory serves me correctly.

Mr. Fletcher: I remember him.

Mr. Bermingham: The Minister says that he remembers him. I say no more than that.

New clause 7 refers to the relevant authority which grants the application. The authority is to have regard to "the information furnished by the applicant" and

"such other information, if any, as it may have".

It is not clear whether the applicant will have any right of access to such information. All professional bodies at some stage receive the almost malicious complaint from a disgruntled or dissatisfied customer. Surely the applicant should have access to that sort of information, if nothing else, in order to rebut the allegation. It may well be that those other sources of information contain defamatory material which, if disseminated, would cause considerable professional damage.

Mr. Gould: I am sure that my hon. Friend will agree that the rules of natural justice suggest that the provision as drafted is curiously defective, unless the Minister were to argue — and I am not sure that this would be sufficient answer — that the right of appeal would cure any such difficulties.

Mr. Bermingham: I entirely accept what my hon. Friend says.

New clause 9 seems merely to give the applicant a right to make written representations to the authority. I suggest that that is not sufficient, and that the Minister should reconsider new clause 7 if the rules of natural justice are to be complied with.

Mr. Fletcher: If I may declare my interest, I am a member of the Institute of Chartered Accountants of Scotland, members of which, I observe, are just in the majority this evening, although I do not know what that proves.

The hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) commented on the number of amendments. I apologise that so many amendments have been tabled on Report, and I know that it makes heavy reading for Members participating in the debate. The hon. Gentleman will appreciate that a number of them flow from undertakings which I gave in Committee. A number of groupings encompass technical amendments or are minor matters. The group of 28 amendments, starting with Government amendment No. 20, is concerned only with the definition of security throughout the Bill. Starting with Government amendment No. 25, there are 19 drafting amendments. I take the point that this is an unusually large number of amendments on Report, although I hasten to add that I think that it is not quite 1,000.

My hon. Friend the Member for Richmond and Barnes (Mr. Hanley) mentioned the question of consultation during the recess. My hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith) asked whether the Bill will be going to another place in the spillover of the Session. The answer is yes. There is, therefore, further time for certain matters. However, it should be remembered that the Bill started in the Lords so that the ability of the other place to make amendments is restricted in the usual way.

The hon. Member for Dagenham asked about professional members who have no special training or experience. They will not be authorised. Part of the transitional arrangements is that, if a person is acting as a liquidator when the Bill is enacted, he will continue to act as a liquidator in a liquidation. Thereafter, members of professional bodies will have to show that they have the requisite amount of training and experience before being authorised by the professional body to act as liquidator. Non-professional persons will have to satisfy requirements of training and experience and show that they are fit and proper persons in respect of professional bodies, that is, their own assessment of the fitness of the member, plus the guidelines laid down in the rules which will decide whether they will be authorised by the professional body.

The right hon. Member for Glasgow, Govan (Mr. Millan) referred to the tribunal. One reason for the large number of amendments is that the professional bodies were unhappy about having a tribunal second-guessing their authorisations. That is understandable. A professional body can choose whether to seek recognition or to be regarded as a relevant body. If it seeks recognition, the tribunal will not apply to the professional body.

7.30 pm

Mr. Millan: What about someone who is not recognised by his professional body and applies to the relevant authority? There is nothing to stop that happening. That must be unsatisfactory, because if a person cannot get his professional body to recognise him as a fit and proper person it is a little odd that he should be able to go to the relevant authority.

Mr. Fletcher: The right hon. Gentleman is correct. Nothing in the Bill will prevent a person who is turned down by his professional body from making an application to the relevant authority. However, in considering the application, the relevant body will take into account the reasons why the applicant was turned down by his professional body.

Having applied to the relevant body, an applicant would have the right to appeal to the tribunal, which would take the final decision.

Mr. Gould: The Minister's confirmation of that point surely reveals that unfortunately, but perhaps typically, in his anxiety to escape the second-guessing of the professional body, he is introducing a system that allows not only a second guess, but a third guess.

Mr. Millan: Will there not be, in effect, an appeal to the tribunal against the decision of a professional body?

Mr. Fletcher: I do not think that the tribunal will take that view. We cannot write into the Bill a provision to prevent an individual from making an application.

Mr. Millan: Why not?

Mr. Fletcher: We cannot prevent people from applying for anything. If a person wishes to make an application to the relevant authority, he will be free to do so. However, I am sure that the relevant authority and, more important, the tribunal will want to know why that person had been turned down by his professional body.

Mr. Hanley: If an individual is turned down by his professional body and is successful on an appeal to the tribunal, will the Secretary of State license him to practise in insolvency or will the professional body be ordered to register that person? It is important for the integrity of professional organisations that they should not be forced to take on a person whom they had previously rejected.

Mr. Fletcher: The Secretary of State will have no power to direct a professional body to authorise one of its members to be an insolvency practitioner.

I understand the point that is being made, but it would be rare for a person to be turned down by his professional body and be authorised on appeal to the tribunal after applying to the relevant authority. If it happened, that person would be authorised by the Secretary of State and not by his professional body. It is a valid debating point, but the situation is unlikely to arise.

Mr. Tim Smith: My hon. Friend says that the situation is unlikely to arise and that he finds it difficult to envisage a person being turned down by his professional body and subsequently being accepted under the alternative mechanism. Why not put into the Bill a provision to ensure that that cannot happen? Why is that objectionable?

Mr. Fletcher: I am not sure that we can prevent people from making applications.

Mr. Gould: We can.

Mr. Fletcher: A person who wishes to make an application is entitled to be heard.

Mr. Millan: Surely there is a difference between making an application to the relevant authority in the first instance and following the appropriate procedures—it is fair enough if a member of a professional body wants to do that—and the system in the Bill, which allows someone who is rejected by his professional body, which decides that one of its members is not fit to be an insolvency practitioner—because of his lack of experience or training or for other reasons—to circumvent that decision by going through the relevant authority. Ultimately, the appeal to the tribunal is effectively an appeal against the decision of the professional body, a process which other provisions in the Bill are meant to exclude.

Given the difficulty in making further amendments in another place, I am not sure that we can alter the Bill now, but the Government have not got it right.

Mr. Fletcher: The right hon. Gentleman overlooks what I said earlier about the equivalence of treatment and standards which will be in in the rules. If a person is turned down by his professional body and applies to the relevant authority, the authority will make its assessment on the same basis and under the same rules as the professional body made its decision. The right hon. Gentleman said that an applicant might lack sufficient training or experience. I find it hard to believe that the relevant authority or, on appeal, the tribunal would take a different view from the professional organisation.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause read a Second time, and added to the Bill.

New Clause 6

APPLICATIONS FOR AUTHORISATION

"(1) An application for authorisation under section (Grant, refusal and withdrawal of authorisation) below—

(a) shall be made in such manner as the relevant authority may direct;

[Mr. Fletcher]

(b) shall contain or be accompanied by such information as that authority may reasonably require for the purpose of determining the application; and

(c) shall be accompanied by the prescribed fee;

and the relevant authority may direct that notice of the making of the application shall be published in such manner as may be specified in the direction.

(2) At any time after receiving the application and before determining it the relevant authority may require the applicant to furnish additional information.

(3) Directions and requirements given or imposed under subsection (1) or (2) above may differ as between different applications.

(4) Any information to be furnished to the relevant authority under this section shall, if it so requires, be in such form or verified in such manner as it may specify.

(5) An application for authorisation under section (Grant, refusal and withdrawal of authorisation) below may be withdrawn before it is granted or refused.

(6) Any sums received under this section by a relevant authority other than the Secretary of State may be retained by that authority; and any sums received under this section by the Secretary of State shall be paid into the Consolidated Fund.". —[Mr. Fletcher.]

Brought up, read the First and Second time, and added to the Bill.

New Clause 7

GRANT, REFUSAL AND WITHDRAWAL OF AUTHORISATION

"(1) The relevant authority may, on an application duly made in accordance with section (Applications for authorisation) above and after being furnished with all such information as it may require under that section, grant or refuse the application.

(2) The relevant authority shall grant the application if it appears to it from the information furnished by the applicant and having regard to such other information, if any, as it may have—

(a) that the applicant is a fit and proper person to act as an insolvency practitioner; and

(b) that the applicant meets the prescribed requirements with respect to education and practical training and experience.

(3) An authorisation shall, unless previously withdrawn, continue in force for such period not exceeding the prescribed maximum as may be specified in the authorisation.

(4) An authorisation granted under this section may be withdrawn by the relevant authority if it appears to it—

(a) that the holder of the authorisation is no longer a fit and proper person to act as an insolvency practitioner; or

(b) without prejudice to paragraph (a) above, that the holder of the authorisation has failed to comply with any provision of this Part or of any regulations made under it or, in purported compliance with any such provision, has furnished the relevant authority with false, inaccurate or misleading information.

(5) An authorisation granted under this section may be withdrawn by the relevant authority at the request or with the consent of the holder of the authorisation." —[Mr. Fletcher.]

Brought up, read the First and Second time, and added to the Bill.

New Clause 8

NOTICES

"(1) Where the relevant authority grants an authorisation, it shall give written notice of that fact to the applicant, specifying the date on which the authorisation takes effect.

(2) Where the relevant authority proposes to refuse an application or to withdraw an authorisation under section [Grant, refusal and withdrawal of authorisation] (4) above, it shall give the applicant or holder of the authorisation written notice of its intention to do so, setting out particulars of the grounds on which it proposes to act.

(3) In the case of a proposed withdrawal the notice under subsection (2) above shall state the date on which it is proposed that the withdrawal should take effect.

(4) A notice under subsection (2) above shall give particulars of the rights exercisable under sections [Right to make representations] and [Reference to Tribunal] below by a person on whom the notice is served." —[Mr. Fletcher.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Fletcher: I beg to move. That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, we may take the following: New clause 9—Right to make representations—

"(1) A person on whom a notice is served under section [Notices] above may within fourteen days after the date of service make written representations to the relevant authority.

(2) The relevant authority shall have regard to any representations made in accordance with this section in determining whether to refuse the application or withdraw the authorisation, as the case may be."

Amendment (a), in line 1, after 'under', insert 'subsection (2) of'.

New Clause 10—Reference to Tribunal—

"(1) A person on whom a notice is served under section [Notices] above may within twenty-eight days after the date of service give written notice to the relevant authority requiring the case to be referred to the Tribunal referred to in subsection (6) below.

(2) Where a requirement is made in accordance with subsection (1) above, then, unless the relevant authority within the period there mentioned—

(a) decides to grant the application or, as the case may be, decides not to withdraw the authorisation; and

(b) gives written notice of that fact to the person by whom the requirement was made, it shall refer the case to the Tribunal.

(3) On a reference under this section the Tribunal shall—

(a) investigate the case; and

(b) make a report to the relevant authority stating what would in their opinion be the appropriate decision in the matter and the reasons for that opinion;

and it shall be the duty of the relevant authority to decide the matter accordingly.

(4) The Tribunal shall send a copy of the report to the applicant or, as the case may be, the holder of the authorisation; and the relevant authority shall serve him with a written notice of the decision made by it in accordance with the report.

(5) The relevant authority may, if it thinks fit, publish the report of the Tribunal.

(6) For the purposes of this section there shall be a tribunal—

(a) which shall be known as the Insolvency Practitioners Tribunal (in this Part referred to as "the Tribunal"); and

(b) in relation to which the provisions of Schedule 1 to this Act shall apply.".

Amendment (a), in line 1, after 'under', insert 'subsection (2) of'.

Amendment (b), in line 2, after 'service', insert

'or in a case where he has made representations under subsection (1) of section [Right to make representations] above within twenty-eight days after the relevant authority has given him notice that having considered his representations it has determined to refuse his application or withdraw his authorisation as the case may be'.

Government new clause 11 and Government amendments Nos. 8 and 182.

Mr. Fletcher: New clause 8 does not differ from clause 4(3)(a) in that it requires the relevant authority to give written notice when it grants or proposes to refuse or withdraw an authorisation. However, the new clause goes further by requiring the relevant authority to give more information to the applicant or holder of an authorisation about the date when authorisation takes place or withdrawal takes effect.

New clause 9 gives the person on whom a notice of a proposed refusal or withdrawal of authorisation is served the right to make written representations to the relevant authority within 14 days.

I am grateful to the right hon. Member for Glasgow, Govan (Mr. Millan) for tabling amendment (a) to new clause 9. It clarifies which subsection in the notices clause is being referred to and we are happy to accept it.

New clause 10 differs in several ways from the existing provisions in the Bill. First, it gives a person 28 days instead of 14 days in which to require his case to be referred to the insolvency practitioners tribunal. Secondly, it requires the tribunal to send a copy of its report not only to the relevant authority, but to the person concerned. The relevant authority will have to serve the person with a written notice of its decision made in accordance with the tribunal's report and may also publish the report if it thinks fit.

I am, again, grateful to the right hon. Member for Govan for tabling amendments (a) and (b) to new clause 10. I am happy to accept amendment (a), because it clarifies which subsection is being referred to, and amendment (b) is accepted in principle, because a person who makes representations may not consider requiring his case to be referred to the tribunal until he is aware of the result of his representations. The amendment will ensure that he has 28 days to act from when he is given notice of the decision. However, there are drafting difficulties with the amendment. I ask the right hon. Gentleman to withdraw that amendment, because we intend to deal with the matter in an amendment to be moved in the House of Lords.

New clause 10 allows a person 28 days in which to require that his case be referred to the tribunal. However, if he does not make that requirement, and assuming that the relevant authority has not been swayed by any written representations lodged within the first 14 days, new clause 11 requires that the authority must await the expiration of the 28 days appeal period before giving written notice of the refusal or withdrawal.

Amendment No. 182, which amends the Tribunals and Inquiries Act 1981, is necessary to place the insolvency practitioners tribunal under the supervision of the Council on Tribunals. I commend the new clauses and amendments to the House.

Mr. Millan: I do not have to make a speech because the Government agree that my amendments are necessary. I accept that amendment (b) to new clause 10 is inelegant, but I thought there was a deficiency in new clauses 9 and 10. I am glad that that is recognised and that the Minister intends the matter to be put right in another place.

New Clause 9

RIGHT TO MAKE REPRESENTATIONS

'(1) A person on whom a notice is served under section [Notices] above may within fourteen days after the date of service make written representations to the relevant authority.

(2) The relevant authority shall have regard to any representations made in accordance with this section in determining whether to refuse the application or withdraw the authorisation, as the case may be.'.—[Mr. Fletcher.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Amendment made: (a) in line 1, after 'under', insert 'subsection (2) of'.—[Mr. Millan.]

Clause, as amended, read a Second time, and added to the Bill.

New Clause 10

REFERENCE TO TRIBUNAL

To move the following clause:

'(1) A person on whom a notice is served under section [Notices] above may within twenty-eight days after the date of service give written notice to the relevant authority requiring the case to be referred to the Tribunal referred to in subsection (6) below.

(2) Where a requirement is made in accordance with subsection (1) above, then unless the relevant authority within the period there mentioned—

(a) decides to grant the application or, as the case may be, decides not to withdraw the authorisation; and

(b) gives written notice of that fact to the person by whom the requirement was made, it shall refer the case to the Tribunal.

(3) On a reference under this section the Tribunal shall—

(a) investigate the case; and

(b) make a report to the relevant authority stating what would in their opinion be the appropriate decision in the matter and the reasons for that opinion; and it shall be the duty of the relevant authority to decide the matter accordingly.

[Mr. Millan]

(4) The Tribunal shall send a copy of the report to the applicant or, as the case may be, the holder of the authorisation, and the relevant authority shall serve him with a written notice of the decision made by it in accordance with the report.

(5) The relevant authority may, if it thinks fit, publish the report of the Tribunal.

(6) For the purposes of this section there shall be a tribunal—

(a) which shall be known as the Insolvency Practitioners Tribunal (in this Part referred to as "the Tribunal"); and

(b) in relation to which the provisions of Schedule 1 to this Act shall apply."—[Mr. Fletcher.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Amendment made: (a) in line 1, after 'under', insert 'subsection (2) of'. [Mr. Millan.]

Clause, as amended, read a Second time, and added to the Bill.

New Clause 11

REFUSAL OR WITHDRAWAL WITHOUT REFERENCE TO TRIBUNAL

"Where no requirement is made under section [Reference to Tribunal] (1) above in respect of a proposed refusal or withdrawal, the relevant authority may, at the expiration of the period within which such a requirement can be made, give written notice of the refusal or withdrawal to the person concerned in accordance with the proposal in the notice given by it under section [Notices] (2) above." [Mr. Fletcher.]

New Clause 12

INTERPRETATION OF PART I

"In this Part

"prescribed" means prescribed by regulations made by the Secretary of State;

"the relevant authority" means—

(a) in relation to a case of any description specified in directions given by the Secretary of State, the body or person so specified in relation to cases of that description; and

(b) in relation to a case not falling within paragraph (a) above, the Secretary of State;

"the Tribunal" means the Insolvency Practitioners Tribunal." [Mr. Fletcher.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Fletcher: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss Government amendments Nos. 9 and 10.

Mr. Fletcher: The purpose of new clause 12 is to interpret part I of the Bill, and amendment 9 deletes clause 5 from the Bill.

Amendment No. 10 to clause 6 is to give power to make regulations concerning the criteria for assessing whether a person is "fit and proper"; to prohibit acting in conflict of interest and to provide for the supervision of authorised practitioners, and other necessary matters.

New Clause 18

RESTRICTION ON USE OF COMPANY NAMES

"(1) This section applies to a person where a company ("the relevant company") has gone into insolvent liquidation and he was a director or shadow director of the company at any time in the period of twelve months ending with the day before it went into liquidation; and for the purposes of this section a name is a prohibited name in relation to such a person if—

(a) it is a name by which the relevant company was known at any time in the said period; or

(b) it is a name which is so similar to a name falling within paragraph (a) above as to suggest an association with the relevant company.

(2) Except with the leave of the court, a person to whom this section applies shall not at any time in the period of five years beginning with the day on which the relevant company went into liquidation—

(a) be a director of any other company that is known by a prohibited name; or

(b) in any way, whether directly or indirectly, be concerned or take part in the promotion, formation or management of any such company; or

(c) in any way, whether directly or indirectly, be concerned or take part in the carrying on of a business carried on (otherwise than by a company) under a prohibited name.

(3) If a person acts in contravention of this section, he shall in respect of each offence, be liable—

(a) on summary conviction, to imprisonment for a term not exceeding six months or to a fine not exceeding the statutory maximum or to both;

(b) on conviction on indictment, to imprisonment for a term not exceeding two years or to a fine or to both.

(4) In subsection (2) above "the court" means any court having jurisdiction to wind up companies; and on an application for leave under that subsection, the Secretary of State or the official receiver may appear and call the attention of the court to any matters which seem to him to be relevant.

(5) References in this section, in relation to any time, to a name by which a company is known are references to the name of the company at that time or to any name under which the company carries on business at that time.

(6) For the purposes of this section a company goes into insolvent liquidation if it goes into liquidation at a time when its assets are insufficient for the payment of its debts and other liabilities and the expenses of the winding up.

(7) In this section "company" includes a company which may be wound up under Part XXI of the 1985 Act.—[Mr. Fletcher.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

7.45 pm

Mr. Fletcher: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take the following amendments: (a), in line 36, at end add—

'(8) In this section "director" excludes any director who together with connected persons does not hold more than 5 per cent. of the equity shares of the company.'

Government amendments Nos. 15 to 17 and 103 and 234.

Mr. Fletcher: As the House is aware, the problems of the so-called phoenix syndrome, as a result of which innocent members of the public or suppliers are often misled by unscrupulous company directors, leading them to sustain often considerable financial loss, have become increasingly apparent during recent times. Many of the provisions of the Bill are directed at preventing such abuse in the future.

We indicated, however, in Committee that the restriction on the subsequent use of a company's name as presently provided by clause 86 of the Bill was perhaps not the best way to approach the problem of abuse relating to the use of names of companies in liquidation, which is one of the manifestations of the phoenix syndrome. The company name itself is often a valuable asset which the liquidator can dispose of to the benefit of the creditors of the insolvent company.

The proposed new clause, rather than preventing the continuing use of a company name, shifts the emphasis to those who have been directors, or shadow directors, of the company in insolvent liquidation in the 12 months before the liquidation. Such directors must not, unless they have the leave of the court, for a period of five years from the commencement of the liquidation, be involved in any other company which uses the same, or a very similar, name, including any trading style used by the liquidated company. Contravention of such provisions will be an offence and may also lead to personal liability for the new company's debts.

Genuine cases of former directors wishing to buy out the business of a company in liquidation will, we feel, be sufficiently rare to justify their having to apply to the court for leave to use the same or a similar name in carrying on the new business. Liquidation will not come about immediately without any warning. There will always be a petition for winding up or a meeting called to pass an appropriate resolution if a company is to be wound up voluntarily, and the persons concerned will have time to apply to the court for leave to continue to be involved in companies with similar names to that of the company in liquidation, for instance, where a group of companies is involved.

Amendment (a), tabled by my hon. Friends the Members for Richmond and Barnes (Mr. Hanley) and for Tynemouth (Mr. Trotter), seeks to exempt certain directors from the provisions of new clause 18. We feel that such an exemption would lead to unnecessary complications, particularly as there is, within the new clause, provision whereby such persons can apply to the court for leave to continue to act as a director of a relevant company. It might also provide scope for abuse through the use of nominees or the manipulation of shareholdings at a late stage prior to liquidation. An application to the court in genuine circumstances would prove no more onerous than an application for some form of clearance certificate from the Secretary of State suggested by my hon. Friend the Member for Richmond and Barnes in Committee in relation to clause 86 which this new clause replaces. I therefore ask my hon. Friends to withdraw their amendment.

Mr. Gould: This is a welcome fulfilment of a promise which the Minister gave in Committee. It is a better and more accurate solution to an obvious problem than is clause 86. The hon. Member for Richmond and Barnes (Mr. Hanley) might be able to persuade me otherwise, but I am inclined to accept the Minister's reasoning.

Mr. Hanley: I tabled the amendment late one night earlier this week in response to yet more new clauses. Considerable research has been done on ministerial statements promising amendments. I counted 27 such occasions and nine new clauses are now suggested.

Many of the amendments are in response to the professions. Those practising in insolvency are grateful for the way in which the Minister has responded to their advice. The problem is that the Minister might continue to respond until a Bill to amend this Bill is introduced next Session.

Although new clause 18 is better than it was before, no hon. Member in his right mind would defend anyone who tried to set up another organisation using a name that was like another to defraud, innocent people. As I said in Committee, often the name of the organisation is the most valuable asset that a liquidator has. There is another asset — the organisation's managers. Companies that have failed — perhaps through inexperience or, even worse, the deceit of certain directors—might be able to flourish with new capital and new management. It would be a disaster if certain people such as production, design and marketing directors, who are called "directors" but who are really senior managers, were allowed, without having to go to court, to be transferred with the name to another organisation.

I fully accept that the new clause provides that one should go to court. We are trying not only to protect the innocent but to save the businesses that can be saved. We are not trying to take the weakest companies to the wall if they can succeed with the help of an intravenous financial drip — for example, new management initiatives. If a valuable commodity such as the name of the business and its senior employees cannot be transferred without too many restrictions — especially the severe restriction of having to go to court—the Bill may not be doing the job that we had hoped.

I shall not press amendment (a). I have had an opportunity to express my concern and that of many insolvency professionals that the new clause will restrict the power of a liquidator to sell the name of a company with senior management who were innocent of any wrongdoing before the liquidation. Senior managers, who are sometimes called production or design directors, should be able to transfer freely as long as the liquidator feels that they are bona fide.

I am inexperienced in this matter, so I must explain that I did not declare my interest as a certified accountant earlier in this debate, because I had done so at the beginning of the Committee stage.

New Clause 21

AGENCY AND LIABILITY OF RECEIVER FOR CONTRACTS

'(1) Section 473 of the 1985 Act (agency and liability of receiver for contracts) shall be amended as follows.

(2) In subsection (2) after the words "provides" there shall be inserted the words ", and on any contract of employment adopted by him in the carrying out of those functions".

(3) After subsection (4) there shall be inserted the following subsections—

"(4A) For the purposes of subsection (2), a receiver is not to be taken to have adopted a contract of employment by reason of anything done or omitted to be done within 14 days after his appointment.

(4B) This section does not limit any right to indemnity which the receiver would have apart from it, nor limit his liability on contracts entered or adopted without authority, nor confer any right to indemnity in respect of that liability.".'.—[Mr. Fletcher.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Fletcher: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take amendment (a), line 7, leave out 'or omitted to be done',

Government new clause 20—Disposal of interest in property—

Government amendments 60, 61, 264, 265, 64 to 77, 79, 80, 114, 174, 202 and 208 to 210.

Mr. Fletcher: New clauses 20 and 21 and the 26 amendments to the Scottish receivership provisions in chapter V of part II are principally designed to bring them into line with changes made to those provisions relating to England and Wales, which were made in Committee. They accord with amendments to the England and Wales provisions which the House will be invited to make later.

Mr. Hanley: Amendment (a) stands in my name and that of my hon. Friend the Member for Tynemouth (Mr. Trotter). This is an important point, as new clause 21 introduces a principle that I find difficult to countenance. New subsection (4A) states:

"For the purposes of subsection (2), a receiver is not to be taken to have adopted a contract of employment by reason of anything done or omitted to be done within 14 days after his employment."

This introduces a fairly new principle into this type of law —by doing nothing, the receiver is in effect allowing something to be ratified. If a receiver does not step in and say within 14 days to an employee, "This contract of employment is invalid", three, four or five months later he may be in difficulty. He may be confronted by a person who says, "I have an agreement with this company. I am the employee of a subcontractor to the company. I have been working with the company." The receiver may not have known of the conditions of employment that would have enabled that employee to be rejected within 14 days. Does this mean that a receiver has to accept the contract of employment of anyone who comes to his attention after the 14-day period?

In a business that has a worldwide payroll there may be people who do not come to the administrative receiver's attention within that 14-day period. This would bind the receiver and later in the Bill the administrative receiver to contracts of employment about which they were totally ignorant. I am concerned that the receiver will be bound by inaction. The 14-day period is far too short for large worldwide receiverships and liquidations. This could be extremely dangerous for the receiver, especially with respect to personal liability.

Mr. Fletcher: I am afraid that the amendment proposed by my hon. Friend the Member for Richmond and Barnes (Mr. Hanley) is not acceptable. When I move amendment No. 29 I shall explain in more detail our proposals in relation to the liabilities of receivers generally in England, Wales and Scotland.

I hope that I can allay my hon. Friend's concern. He is afraid that the court will consider a receiver to have adopted a contract of employment where he fails to inform an employee that he is not adopting his contract after 14 days have elapsed—perhaps where the receiver is in ignorance of the contract or simply omits, by accident, to give notice of non-adoption because the employee has contributed no service to the company during the 14 days' grace provided for by new subsection (4A) of section 473 of the 1985 Act. That is not the intention. New subsection (4A) is designed to catch the case where a receiver knowingly allows an employee to contribute his services and says nothing to him for more than 14 days about payment for those services.

Current law appears to allow the receiver to say to the employee that his contract is with the company, that the company is insolvent and that he has no intention of paying him. This would clearly be wrong, as my hon. Friend the Member for Richmond and Barnes pointed out. We allow the receiver a period of grace in which to decide whether to adopt contracts of employment. New subsection (4A) does that, and the grace period is a fortnight.

If the receiver knowingly allows an employee to contribute his services and says nothing to him for more than 14 days about his contract of employment, he should not be allowed to refuse to make payment for those services. Given the current state of the law, I am afraid that that would be the effect of my hon. Friend's amendment. I hope that he will withdraw it in the light of my remarks. If I have not entirely reassured him, perhaps he would be kind enough to allow me to move amendment No. 29 before pressing me further on this point.

Mr. Hanley: Will this principle of adoption by not doing anything be extended to other contracts outside employment? If so, it will have remarkable consequences.

Mr. Fletcher: No. We are dealing with a particular situation in current law.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause read a Second time, and added to the Bill.

New Clause 20

DISPOSAL OF INTEREST IN PROPERTY

.—(1) Section 477 of the 1985 Act (disposal of interest in property) shall be amended as follows—

(2) In subsection (2)—

(a) at the beginning there shall be inserted the words "Subject to subsection (2A) below,"; and

(b) the words from "But that authorisation" to the end of the subsection shall be omitted.

(3) After subsection (2) there shall be inserted the following subsections—

"(2A) In the case of an application where a fixed security over the property or interest in question which ranks prior to the floating charge has not been met or provided for in full, the court shall not authorise the sale or disposal of the property or interest in question unless it is satisfied that the sale or disposal would be likely to provide a more advantageous realisation of the company's assets than would otherwise be effected.

(2B) It shall be a condition of an authorisation to which subsection (2A) above applies that—

(a) the net proceeds of the disposal; and

(b) where those proceeds are less than such amount as may be determined by the court to be the net amount which would be realised on a sale of the property in the open market by a willing seller, such sums as may be required to make good the deficiency, shall be applied towards discharging the sums secured by the fixed security.

(2C) Where a condition imposed in pursuance of subsection (2B) above relates to two or more such fixed securities that condition shall require the net proceeds of the disposal and, where paragraph (b) of that subsection applies, the sums mentioned in that paragraph to be applied towards discharging the sums secured by those fixed securities in the order of their priorities.

(2D) A copy of an authorisation under subsection (2) above certified by the clerk of court shall, within 14 days of the granting of the authorisation, be sent by the receiver to the registrar of companies.

(2E) If the receiver without reasonable excuse fails to comply with subsection (2D) above, he is liable to a fine and, for continued contravention, to a daily default fine.".'. — [Mr. Fletcher.]

Brought up, read the First and Second time, and added to the Bill.

New Clause 13

RIGHTS OF OCCUPATION ETC. OF BANKRUPT'S SPOUSE

'(1) Where a spouse's rights of occupation under the Matrimonial Homes Act 1983 are a charge on the estate or interest of the other spouse or of trustees for the other spouse and the other spouse is adjudged bankrupt—

(a) the charge shall continue to subsist notwithstanding the bankruptcy and, subject to the provisions of that Act, shall bind the trustee of the bankrupt's estate and persons deriving title under that trustee; and

(b) any application by that trustee for an order under section 1 of that Act shall be made to the court having jurisdiction in relation to the bankruptcy.

(2) Where a person and his spouse or former spouse are trustees for sale of a dwelling house and that person is adjudged bankrupt, any application by the trustee of the bankrupt's estate for an order under section 30 of the Law of Property Act 1925 (powers of court where trustees for sale refuse to exercise powers) shall be made to the court having jurisdiction in relation to the bankruptcy.

(3) On such an application as is mentioned in subsection (1) or (2) above the court shall make such order under the said section 1 or the said section 30 as it thinks just and reasonable having regard to the interests of the bankrupt's creditors, to the conduct of the spouse or former spouse so far as contributing to the bankruptcy, to the needs and financial resources of the spouse or former spouse, to the needs of any children and to all the circumstances of the case.

(4) Where such an application is made after the end of the period of one year beginning with the first vesting, under Chapter V of this Part, of the bankrupt's estate in a trustee, the court shall assume, unless the circumstances of the case are exceptional, that the interests of the bankrupt's creditors outweigh all other considerations.'—[Mr. Fletcher.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

8 pm

Mr. Fletcher: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss Government new clause 14 — Rights of occupation of bankrupt—Government new clause 15— Payments in respect of premises occupied by bankrupt —and Government amendments Nos. 137, 138, 149, 161 and 247.

Mr. Fletcher: This group of amendments is the Government's response to representations made both in another place and in Committee in relation to the recommendations of the review committee on the treatment of residential property occupied by a bankrupt's family. The review committee drew attention in particular to the position of a bankrupt's spouse who had no legal interest in the home. The review committee recommended that greater regard be had to the interests of the bankrupt's family, who were often innocent victims of the bankruptcy. The committee also recommended that a trustee in bankruptcy should not be able to dispose of a bankrupt's interest in a relevant property without an order of the court.

The amendments that were tabled in another place on this subject were unacceptable to the Government, because, in giving too much weight to the interests of the family, they tilted the balance too far away from those of the bankrupt's creditors. We remain convinced that the interests of creditors must remain a high priority.

As the House is aware, we have consulted on the subject but, as I indicated in Committee, the consultation produced no consensus of opinion as to the path to be followed, although several useful comments were received, which we have taken into account in framing our proposals. It may assist the House if I explain briefly the effect of the principal amendments. First, however, I should like to stress a point made by the review committee in paragraph 1119 of its report. It is a point not dealt with specifically in the amendments, because it is a question not of legalities but of good practice. The review committee said:

"Trustees have usually acted with humanity both in the manner and in the timing of any sale of the family home . . . arrangements can often be made for the likely value to the creditors to be provided without a sale".

In very many cases the matter is settled by negotiation without disturbing the family and without involving the court, and there is absolutely no reason why that should not continue to be the case.

Turning to the amendments, new clause 13 sets out the principal proposals. Section 1 of the Matrimonial Homes Act 1983 confers on a spouse without any beneficial estate or interest in a matrimonial home rights of occupation as against the other spouse. At present where the spouse with a beneficial estate becomes bankrupt the spouse without any such interest loses his or her rights of occupation as against the trustee in bankruptcy. Subsection (1) of the new clause reverses that position and the spouse who has no beneficial interest in the property is therefore placed in a similar position to a spouse with a beneficial interest. The position in the case of a spouse with such an interest is dealt with in subsection (2) of the clause and remains basically the same as now. That is to say, that the trustee needs to obtain an order of the court under section 30 of the Law of Property Act 1925 before being able to sell the property concerned.

Subsection (3) of the clause allows the court to make whatever order it considers just and reasonable on an application by the trustee under either subsection (1) or subsection (2). The criteria to which the court is to have regard are based on those contained in section 1(3) of the Matrimonial Homes Act 1983. The matters mentioned in subsection (3) of the clause strike, we think, the balance sought by the review committee and have the advantage of being based on existing matrimonial legislation, with the necessary addition of the interests of the bankrupt's creditors.

Subsection (4) of the clause provides that, unless there are exceptional circumstances, on any application by the trustee once the period of one year from the date of the vesting of the bankrupt's property has expired, the interests of the bankrupt's creditors are to be paramount. The combined effect of subsections (3) and (4) is that the court is to regard the period of one year as the maximum breathing space to be allowed to the members of the family under normal circumstances, to enable them to adjust to their changed circumstances and either to seek alternative accommodation or arrange the buying out of the bankrupt's interest. The court may, of course, allow only a shorter period, or no period at all, if circumstances warrant it. However, we expect the combined effect of the amendments and the practice of negotiation normally adopted by trustees to result in most cases in a period of grace for the bankrupt's family of the type sought by the review committee.

New clause 14 applies to a limited extent the principles of new clause 13 in the case of a bankrupt who has actual custody of children. This is to cover the situation where the bankrupt has no spouse with occupational rights or, because of a divorce, no spouse at all, but nevertheless has children to bring up. In such a case the needs of the bankrupt's children will be taken into account by the court but not the needs of the bankrupt.

New clause 15 preserves the present position where a bankrupt is able, for whatever reason, to continue to occupy premises comprised in his estate and makes mortgage payments or pays other outgoings in relation to the property. If such payments give rise to the post-bankruptcy acquisition by the bankrupt of an interest in the property, such interest vests automatically in his trustee as after-acquired property under section 38 of the Bankruptcy Act 1914.

This package of amendments goes a long way towards meeting the objectives of the review committee in respect of what is termed the family home. At the same time it achieves an equitable balance between the rights and interests of the creditors and those of the bankrupt's family.

Mr. Gould: A measure of the difficulties that we face is the fact that we are now confronted with new clauses which, to do justice to them, merit some hours of debate. The importance and difficulty of the subject is so great that we ought not to allow these provisions to be passed without substantive debate.

We are also in the difficulty that the consultation process, through which the Government quite rightly went, ended so recently that hon. Members are little the wiser. The Government may have been privy to the representations and to the consequences of the consultations, but we were not. It would have been useful if we could have seen the representations in published form. We have seen a list of those who made representations, but we have very little idea of what they said or of the balance of opinion on many of the issues. We are therefore compelled to exercise our judgment on the basis of very little information.

It has been apparent from the outset that the obvious interests of the bankrupt's family, who will often be completely innocent parties, remaining in the family home have to be reconciled with the equally compelling interests of a different nature of the creditors who, if they cannot lay their hands on the primary asset, might find themselves in difficulties.

The effect of these provisions means that the whole question has been handed over to the courts. I am sure that the Under-Secretary of State recognises that this is very much the pattern that has been adopted over matrimonial property disputes, where the maximum amount of discretion has been given to the courts. In that sense, the Under-Secretary of State is right to have pursued that course. It reflects fairly accurately the recommendations of the review committee. On that ground, too, it is more acceptable.

It is clear that the structure of the arrangement allows discretion to the court, but that after a period of grace of one year there is a presumption that the creditors' interests will then prevail. I am not sure that that is necessarily as liberal as one would have liked. I enter that caveat without wishing to press it further.

Secondly, the review committee referred not just to children but to ailing, elderly and dependent relatives, yet the provisions make no reference to that point.

There is probably an obvious answer to a drafting point which puzzles me. New clause 14(3)(c) refers to a person who "married the bankrupt immediately before the commencement of the bankruptcy".

I am not quite sure about the significance of the word "immediately."

Question put and agreed to.

Clause read a Second time, and added to the Bill.

New Clause 14

RIGHTS OF OCCUPATION OF BANKRUPT

'(1) This section applies where a person—

(a) who is entitled to occupy a dwelling house by virtue of a beneficial estate or interest; and

(b) with whom any children have their home, is adjudged bankrupt.

(2) Whether or not the bankrupt's spouse (if any) has rights of occupation under the Matrimonial Homes Act 1983—

(a) the bankrupt shall have as against the trustee of his estate and persons deriving title under that trustee the same rights of occupation under that Act as a person who fell within subsection (3) below would have; and

(b) subject to the provisions of this section, that Act shall apply accordingly.

(3) This subsection applies to a person if—

(a) that person is the spouse of the bankrupt;

(b) that person is not entitled to occupy the dwelling house by virtue of a beneficial estate or interest;

(c) that person married the bankrupt immediately before the commencement of the bankruptcy; and

(d) the dwelling house is a matrimonial home of the bankrupt and that person.

(4) Any application by the trustee of the bankrupt's estate for an order under section 1 of the said Act of 1983 shall be made to the court having jurisdiction in relation to the bankruptcy.

(5) On such an application as is mentioned in subsection (4) above the court shall make such order under the said section 1 as it thinks just and reasonable having regard to the interests of the creditors, to the bankrupt's financial resources, to the needs of the children and to all the circumstances of the case other than the needs of the bankrupt.

(6) Where such an application is made after the end of the period of one year beginning with the first vesting, under Chapter V of this Part, of the bankrupt's estate in a trustee, the court shall assume, unless the circumstances of the case are exceptional, that the interests of the bankrupt's creditors outweigh all other considerations.'—[Mr. Fletcher.]

New Clause 15

PAYMENTS IN RESPECT OF PREMISES OCCUPIED BY BANKRUPT

'Where any premises comprised in a bankrupt's estate are occupied by him (whether by virtue of section [Rights of occupation of bankrupt] above or otherwise) on condition that he makes payments towards satisfying any liability arising under a mortgage of the premises or otherwise towards the outgoings of the premises, the bankrupt shall not, by virtue of those payments, acquire any interest in the premises.'—[Mr. Fletcher.]

New Clause 16

DISABILITIES ON REVOCATION OF ADMINISTRATION ORDER AGAINST INDIVIDUAL

'(1) Where a person fails to make any payment which he is required to make by virtue of an administration order under Part VI of the County Courts Act 1984, the court which is administering the estate of that person under that order may, if it thinks fit, revoke the administration order and make an order directing that this section shall apply to that person for such period, not exceeding two years, as may be specified in the order.

(2) A person to whom this section applies by virtue of an order under subsection (1) above shall not, except with the leave of the court which made that order, act as director or liquidator of, or directly or indirectly take part or be concerned in the promotion, formation or management of, a company (within the meaning of section 1 above).

(3) A person to whom this section so applies shall not—

(a) either alone or jointly with another person, obtain credit to the extent of the amount prescribed for the purposes of section 179(1)(a) above or more; or

(b) enter into any transaction in the course of or for the purposes of any business in which he is directly or indirectly engaged, without disclosing the fact that this section applies to him to the person from whom he obtains the credit or, as the case may be, with whom the transaction is entered into.

(4) The reference in subsection (3) above to a person obtaining credit includes a reference to—

(a) a case where goods are bailed or hired to him under a hire-purchase agreement or agreed to be sold to him under a conditional sale agreement; and

(b) a case where he is paid in advance (whether in money or otherwise) for the supply of goods or services.

(5) A person who contravenes this section shall be guilty of an offence and liable—

(a) on summary conviction, to imprisonment for a term not exceeding six months or to a fine not exceeding the statutory maximum or to both;

(b) on conviction on indictment, to imprisonment for a term not exceeding two years or to a fine or to both.'.—[Mr. Fletcher.]

Mr. Fletcher: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this we may take Government amendment No. 176.

Mr. Fletcher: The Insolvency Bill has repealed most sections of the Insolvency Act 1976, including section 11, which enables the court to make a receiving order where a debtor has failed to make the payments due under a county court administration order. For a number of practical reasons, that section has never been brought into force.

A large number of administration orders are revoked each year. If the section were used to its fullest extent, the Official Receiver would have to deal with numerous extra small cases, which probably did not warrant the investigation. I appreciate that the courts should be able to apply some form of sanction where a debtor is subject to a county court administration order and then does not comply with its terms. Such a debtor has similar privileges to those of a bankrupt, in that the order prevents creditors from pursuing remedies in respect of debts covered by the order.

While preserving the right of creditors, or the debtor himself, to apply for formal bankruptcy, the new clause will allow the court to impose some of the restrictions of bankruptcy without necessitating full bankruptcy proceedings. Of course, the restrictions may be revoked only when the person fails to make the payments under the order. As in the majority of cases the person will have no assets of value and only minimal debts, that does seem to be an appropriate way of dealing with persons who are subject to the administration order procedure.

The imposition of such restrictions will not preclude creditors from taking normal recovery steps, including bankruptcy proceedings, but they will no doubt have regard to the practicalities of recovering anything from a person who has few or no assets.

New Clause 17

CO-OPERATION BETWEEN COURTS EXERCISING JURISDICTION IN RELATION TO INSOLVENCY LAW

'(1) An order made by a court in any part of the United Kingdom in the exercise of jurisdiction in relation to insolvency law shall be enforced in any other part of the United Kingdom as if it were made by a court exercising the corresponding jurisdiction in that other part.

(2) Without prejudice to subsections (3) and (4) below, nothing in subsection (1) above shall require a court in any part of the United Kingdom to enforce, in relation to property situated in that part, any order made by a court in any other part of the United Kingdom.

(3) The courts having jurisdiction in relation to insolvency law in any part of the United Kingdom shall assist the courts having the corresponding jurisdiction in any other part of the United Kingdom or any relevant country or territory.

(4) For the purposes of subsection (3) above a request made to a court in any part of the United Kingdom by a court in any other part of the United Kingdom or in a relevant country or territory shall be authority for the court to which the request is made to apply, in relation to any matters specified in the request, the insolvency law which is applicable by either court in relation to comparable matters falling within its jurisdiction: and in exercising its discretion under this subsection, a court shall have regard in particular to the rules of private international law.

(5) Section 38 of the Criminal Law Act 1977 (execution of warrant of arrest throughout the United Kingdom) shall apply to a warrant which, in exercise of any jurisdiction in relation to insolvency law, is issued in any part of the United Kingdom for the arrest of a person as it applies to a warrant issued in that part of the United Kingdom for the arrest of a person charged with an offence.

(6) In this section "insolvency law" means—

(a) in relation to England and Wales, provision extending to England and Wales and made by or under this Act or Parts XIX to XXI of the 1985 Act;

(b) in relation to Scotland, provision extending to Scotland and made by or under this Act, Parts XVIII to XXI of the 1985 Act or the Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act 1985;

(c) in relation to Northern Ireland, provision made by or under the Bankruptcy Acts (Northern Ireland) 1857 to 1980, Part V, VI or IX of the Companies Act (Northern Ireland) 1960 or Part IV of the Companies (Northern Ireland) Order 1978;

(d) in relation to any relevant country or territory, so much of the law of that country or territory as corresponds to provisions falling within any of the foregoing paragraphs.

(7) In this section "relevant country or territory" means—

(a) any of the Channel Islands or the Isle of Man; or

(b) any country or territory designated for the purposes of this section by the Secretary of State by order made by statutory instrument.'.—[Mr. Fletcher.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Fletcher: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take Government amendments Nos. 160, 168, 175, 177, 179, 180, 230A, 245 and 250 to 253.

Mr. Fletcher: In Committee, my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State gave notice that clause 194 was to be replaced by a new inter-jurisdictional clause which gave effect to the recommendations of the review committee in chapter 49 of its report. The amendments are consequential on the new clause.

As was explained on that occasion, by virtue of the new clause, courts within the United Kingdom will be able to enforce orders made by the courts of other United Kingdom jurisdictions in the exercise of jurisdiction in relation to insolvency law. The clause creates a complete intra-United Kingdom system of reciprocal enforcement in respect of bankruptcy, winding-up, receivership and the new administration order procedure.

New Clause 19

RECOGNISED BANKS ETC.

'(1) The Secretary of State may, by order made with the concurrence of the Treasury and after consultation with the Bank of England, provide that such provisions of Part II of this Act and Parts XVIII to XXI of the 1985 Act as may be specified in the order shall apply in relation to—

(a) recognised banks and licensed institutions within the meaning of the Banking Act 1979; and

(b) institutions to which sections 16 and 18 of that Act apply as if they were licensed institutions, with such modifications as may be so specified.

(2) An order under this section may make different provision for different cases and may contain such incidental, supplemental and transitional provisions as may appear to the Secretary of State necessary or expedient.

(3) An order under this section shall be made by statutory instrument subject to annulment in pursuance of a resolution of either House of Parliament.'.—[Mr. Fletcher.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Fletcher: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take Government amendments Nos. 18, 19 and 228.

Mr. Fletcher: New clause 19 will empower the Secretary of State, with the concurrence of the Treasury and after consultation with the Bank of England, to introduce by order a modified version of the administrative procedure to apply to recognised banks, licensed and other institutions covered by the Banking Act 1979. Pending the making of that order, amendments Nos. 18, 19 and 228 disapply the provisions of part II, chapter III, from recognised banks and licensed institutions.

The evolution of the new procedure, following consultations with practitioners on the detailed provisions, has meant that it has not been possible to devise appropriate modifications to make it suitable for application to Banking Act institutions in time for their inclusion in the Bill. Clearly, such modification is necessary in recognition of the Bank of England's statutory status in relation to the supervision of recognised banks and licensed institutions.

The provisions of the winding-up code already recognise this statutory status. It is intended that an order will be made under new clause 19, which will modify part II, chapter III, in a way which recognises the Bank of England's supervisory responsibilities. The provisions of the winding-up code will be the principal guide in devising the modified procedure, but detailed consultations with relevant Departments will take place.

8.15 pm

Mr. Gould: I congratulate the Minister on speaking for several minutes about the Bank of England's supervisory functions, about recognised banks and about banks failing, and for getting right to the heart of the very area which has been occupied by Johnson Matthey Bankers. Can he assure us that the provisions were not tabled in response to that situation?

Mr. Fletcher: I am not surprised at the hon. Gentleman's remarks, but I can give him the assurance that he seeks.

New Clause 22

AMENDMENTS OF RESTRICTIVE TRADE PRACTICES ACT 1976

'(1) No restriction in respect of any of the matters specified in subsection (2) below shall, after the coming into force of this section, be regarded as a restriction by virtue of which the Restrictive Trade Practices Act 1976 applies to any agreement (whenever made)

(2) The said matters are—

(a) the charges to be made, quoted or paid for insolvency services supplied, offered or obtained;

(b) the terms or conditions on or subject to which insolvency services are to be supplied or obtained;

(c) the extent (if any) to which, or the scale (if any) on which, insolvency services are to be made available, supplied or obtained;

(d) the form or manner in which insolvency services are to be made available, supplied or obtained;

(e) the persons or classes of persons for whom or from whom, or the areas or places in or from which, insolvency services are to be made available or supplied or are to be obtained.

(3) In this section "insolvency services" means the services of persons acting as insolvency practitioners or carrying out under the law of Northern Ireland functions corresponding to those mentioned in section 1(2) or (3) above, in their capacity as such; and expressions which are also used in the said Act of 1976 have the same meanings as in that Act.

(4) In Schedule 1 to the said Act of 1976 (services excluded from designated services), after paragraph 9 there shall be inserted the following paragraph—

"9A. Insolvency services within the meaning of section (Amendment of Restrictive Trade Practices Act 1976) of the Insolvency Act 1985.".'.—[Mr. Fletcher.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Fletcher: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take Government amendment No. 267.

Mr. Fletcher: The purpose of the new clause is to exempt the provision of insolvency services from the application of the Restrictive Trade Practices Act 1976 and to extend that exemption to Northern Ireland.

Mr. Gould: I cannot resist making a brief comment. I am sure that the Minister will recognise that this is one element in a by now very confusing pattern established by the Government in their attitude towards professional bodies. On the one hand, we have deregulation for opticians, solicitors and many other professions; on the other hand, we have the retrenchment of restrictive practices for the stock exchange and in this case for insolvency practitioners. One of these days, will the Minister turn his mind to a coherent competition policy?

Mr. Fletcher: One bit at a time, please.

New Clause 4

DATA AND ESTIMATES

'( )—(1) The directors of every public company shall secure and collate not less than once in each accounting reference period such data about the company's affairs and transactions and those of its subsidiaries and prepare such estimates of the future course of the business as are necessary to enable a reasonable assessment to be made of the future ability of the company to carry on business as a going concern and to pay its debts as they fall due.

(2) The data and estimates prepared in pursuance of subsection (1) above shall be provided as soon as reasonably practicable to all the directors of the company, to the company secretary and to the auditors.

(3) In the auditors' report the auditors shall state if it is their opinion (having due regard to the nature of the company's undertakings) that the requirements of subsection (1) of this section have not been complied with.

(4) "accounting reference period" has the meaning given in section 2 of the Companies Act 1976; and

"auditor's report" has the meaning defined in section 14 of the Companies Act 1967.'.—[Sir B. Rhys Williams.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams (Kensington): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

The clause stands in my name and in the names of right hon. and hon. Members on each side of the House.

The Bill is entitled "Insolvency" but it also deals with important aspects of company management, and in particular the way in which problem companies are managed by the directors, and their fitness to continue in that capacity in the light of their performance when their companies are in difficulties. It also introduces a new type of manager, as I read it, in the form of the administrator, who appears in clause 21. Clause 21 says that "an administration order shall not be made in relation to a company . . . after the company has gone into liquidation".

The Bill therefore is dealing with the procedure which is open to parties concerned with the management before it has reached the point of no return. It seems to be producing a new type of company Siegfried who has to tackle the problem of the companies in difficulties at the stages where they might still be saved by the introduction of some new supervisory element, that is to say, before they have reached the stage at which they can no longer carry on business as a going concern and pay their debts as they fall due.

We must ask ourselves whether that is the best system that we can think of, bearing in mind the number of companies that seem to slide unexpectedly into acute financial difficulties. Many companies seem to reach the brink of disaster before anybody has tried to get something done. All too often, the creditors, the shareholders and even the directors do not know how deeply they are in trouble before reaching the point of no return.

The Bill, especially in clauses 7 to 9, refers to the punishment of directors who fail to carry out their functions in difficult circumstances. Anxieties about those parts of the Bill have been expressed in another place and in Committee. When difficulties arise, it is commonplace for people to ask why nobody knew the company was approaching insolvency, why there was no warning and, in particular, what the auditors were doing.

The long-standing problem of British company law is the weakness of the elements that are expected to act in a supervisory capacity on behalf of the shareholders. It is not sufficient to blame the directors in the present set-up as the only parties who should carry the blame. In the 19th century, Germany evolved the practice of appointing a supervisory board. In Britain, however, we adopted the practice of appointing auditors with specific but limited responsibilites relating to the accounts for former years.

The work of the auditors has extended into other areas related to the financial affairs of companies and, in some ways, their status has become more important. In one way, however, the position of the auditors has been weakened. I may be one of the few hon. Members here who is not a qualifed auditor and I might therefore be speaking out of turn, but I believe that what I have to say is quite widely agreed in the profession. Auditors have become more dependent on the board and oriented towards the service of management. Their duty to provide a service for shareholders in a supervisory role has correspondingly become more difficult to perform.

When things go wrong we blame the auditors—we have all read recently of a company which has been mentioned here in the past half hour—but we are possibly asking too much of them because we do not give them the status that they ought to have in helping to prevent companies from sliding into insolvency. When dealing with problem companies auditors do not have a simple duty in company law to issue a warning note to the shareholders. It is difficult, unhelpful or even improper for them to qualify the accounts with an adverse comment—if the balance sheet and profit and loss account are a correct record of how things were when the accounts were made up. The auditors do not have a clear statutory responsibility to issue a warning to shareholders and to make known their doubts about the course the business may take in the future.

Some elements of the profession would not wish that situation to be changed; they feel that they would then be taken into an area of prophesy and out of the strictly arithmetical and professional background which they are trained to deal with. The difficulties in many of our public companies that have come to light recently show a deficiency in our company law which in effect is creating insolvency, because the parties that ought to be acting to prevent it are not doing so in time.

Mr. Hanley: Auditors have the power to qualify an audit report if the auditor believes that the company is not a going concern. There is a requirement on directors to state in their report the likely developments in the business of the company and its subsidiaries and, under recent company law, the auditor must consider whether that information is fair. There are therefore some provisions by which an auditor has to consider the future in a modern audit.

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams: I agree with my hon. Friend, but there is a great deal of doubt in the profession about how those functions must be carried out. When a company goes to the market for fresh funds and has to issue a prospectus, the auditors have a well defined responsibility. When a company fails to analyse its own data, nobody is confident about what is happening. Auditors cannot act in a clairvoyant manner because the data on which they might base professional and responsible advice to shareholders has not been prepared or, if it has, it might not be reliable because, in different branches of the business, managers approach the making of estimates or the collecting of data concerning performance, costing, profits and so on, quite differently. They sometimes do that in a way which suits their comparative performance.

When the data is unreliable or the estimates of the costs of the business are based on inadequate knowledge of markets and technical factors, there is an acute difficulty for the auditors. If they sense that the company is coming under the scrutiny of shareholders or institutional investors who are anxious about the way it is going and then come out brazenly with criticisms that are made public, they simply serve to compound the difficulties of a company which might be basically sound and add to the problems which could be corrected if management knew what to do.

All too often, management does not have the necessary professional guidance from people who know what happens in other businesses. It should be noted that 90 per cent. — perhaps a higher proportion — of our public companies are already doing what I am asking. The proportion might even be 99 per cent; but some companies are not doing what I suggest. The managements of those companies might be ignorant of the fact that they are not handling the preparation of data and estimates in a way which many other businesses would regard as commonplace.

I have proposed the provisions of new clause 4 many times before and the text bears the signs of my having received very well-informed professional advice when I first drew it up. I have chosen to refer only to public companies, partly because I do not want to make new burdens for private concerns and partly because small businesses are naturally able to make their own estimates of where they are going in a way which is quite different from the practice of large companies. In regard to the preparation of data and estimates, small businesses should follow practices similar to those which I recommend for public companies, but it is not necessary to carry that idea into company law.

The great majority of public companies, and all well-managed concerns, collate their records of company performance and make projections of the future course of the business as an elementary precaution and as an automatic aspect of good management. They regard it as a matter of course and an essential element in the control of the business. Because some companies do not do that, however, we have shock insolvencies. We should not be prepared to allow that situation to continue when it can so easily be remedied with existing management and professional resources.

Companies may prepare their forecasts punctually and competently or they may rely upon the hunches of senior management. That can sometimes be a good way to run a business, but it can sometimes be a disastrous way to run a business. I am sure that anyone who has experience of industry or commerce could think of examples of companies that come under those categories.

8.30 pm

We sometimes find that a company is dominated by one powerful individual. A company created by an entrepreneur which has grown to the point where it finds it necessary to go public and which is then managed by the founder with a circle of relatively powerless or ill-informed directors and non-executive directors who do not have the knowledge necessary successfully to challenge the founder's decisions is a strong candidate for sudden insolvency. That is a well-known type of company in the City. They are sometimes profitable but sometimes disastrous.

With that in mind I have stipulated in new clause 4 that the data and estimates required under the clause should be circulated to all the directors, the company secretary and the auditors. I can think of many examples, as I am sure hon. Members can, where there is a clique of directors or members of top management who are fairly well in the know; and there is also an outer circle of people who are supposed to bear the responsibility for management but who are not kept fully informed of what is going on. That is another type of company that is a candidate for sudden insolvency.

If we are to have the doctrine of directors' collective responsibility, we must ensure that all directors are kept fully in the picture about the company's ability to pay its debts and carry on as a going concern. There will be some company secrets. I do not insist that a matter which is so private that if it were disclosed outside the firm it would damage the business should be circulated outside the company. I do not suggest that the data and estimates should be made known to the shareholders or to the public but only to those in the company who have to bear the responsibility for running it and to the auditors. All companies must gain if the directors know what is happening.

Who can decide what the company should be doing about the preparation of estimates and forecasts? Clearly, the professional accountants retained by the shareholders to supervise the way in which the company tackles its financial responsibility should do that. How can we give the auditors the power and the duty to perform that function discreetly but effectively without damaging the business? I have given that matter considerable thought, as hon. Members may be aware. What I suggest in new clause 4 is the best proposal that I can bring forward for my hon. Friend's consideration. I have been making the same suggestion for a number of years, and I should be pleased now to hear what the Department thinks of it. If it does not like my suggestion, we may hear what it recommends to fill that gap.

I suggest that the auditors must warn the shareholders where it is clear that the company's performance is inadequate having regard to the nature of the business. No two businesses are alike. Forecasts that should be made in one class of business may be superflous in another. The collection of records may be unnecessary in one type of business whereas they ought to be kept as a matter of routine in another.

If the new clause is introduced into company law, as I hope that it will be, we shall not see a rash of qualifications of accounts containing negative warnings to the shareholders. The auditors would be able to say to top management, "Unless you improve the way in which you handle your estimates and make your forecasts, we shall be obliged to warn the shareholders." At that stage, every prudent business will say to the auditors, "Drawing on your experience of what other businesses do, what should we be doing? Will you help us to do it?" That is the best cure that can be recommended for the company that is in financial difficulties.

Auditors must have this extra status. They would have additional status if the clause conferred on them not just the right but the duty to warn the shareholders when the estimates and forecasts are not being competently prepared. The auditors would advise the management that it was approaching the point where the shareholders would have to receive the statutory warning. That would be a far more effective corrective in the majority of cases than the appointment of an administrator with uncertain responsibilities and powers.

Mr. Fletcher: I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Kensington (Sir B. Rhys Williams) for tabling this new clause. I am aware of the serious interest that he has taken in the matter for a number of years. I hope that he will accept that the Bill's purposes go some way towards meeting his objectives. I am sure we can agree on what we should like to achieve, although our approach may be rather different. Important as the legislation is, what my hon. Friend suggests might be more appropriate in a companies Bill. I know that that is what he has tried to achieve over the years.

New clause 4(1) requires some form of management accounts. That is intended not just to assist shareholders but to help to protect creditors from suffering unnecessary loss because of directors' mismanagement. My hon. Friend mentioned the doctrine of directors' collective responsibility. I do not believe that there is any such thing in company law; the director is a director is a director. He may suggest that he was on holiday when something went wrong but, nevertheless, he must find his own reasons for not shouldering the responsibility that might apply to him in the course of his duties.

The clause requires auditors to state that the requirements of the subsection have been complied with — that the data have been collated to enable a "reasonable assessment" to be made of the company's prospects. I believe that my hon. Friend recognises that that creates a difficulty. How can the auditor determine what information is needed to enable the directors, individually, to form a reasonable assessment of what might happen in the future? The clause does not require that information to be made public, correctly because, as my hon. Friend said, it might contain information about the company's affairs which would almost certainly be damaging if it were made known generally and reached a competitor's hands. Directors of all companies, not just public companies, should monitor their company's finances regularly, not just once a year, as would be the case under the clause.

We also believe that it should be up to each director to decide, in the light of his expertise, how best to do that monitoring to protect himself and to carry out his responsibility as a director by safeguarding the shareholders' funds. The view of the Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales about management accounts was given in a memorandum issued by its parliamentary and law committee. That view was:

"that the question of definition of such accounts is one which would be open to endless debate as is the question of whether the accounts revealed with sufficient accuracy the state of its trading operation and financial position."

That is our view of statutory management accounts, although naturally we recognise their value in assisting directors to manage their companies' affairs.

I suspect that, in most public companies, such information is already provided to the directors to enable them to prepare their report to the shareholders. Indeed, my hon. Friend said that as many as 99 per cent. of public companies already do this. Schedule 7(6) of the Companies Act 1985 requires the directors' report to contain particulars of important events affecting the company, or any of its subsidiaries, which have occurred since the end of the financial year, and an explanation of likely future developments in that company's business or its subsidiaries. That point was made by my hon. Friend the Member for Richmond and Barnes (Mr. Hanley), who also said that auditors have a duty to qualify the accounts of companies whose affairs they suspect are not in order.

The Bill will create new dimensions to directors' responsibilities. It seeks to achieve the objective that my hon. Friend mentioned at the beginning of his remarks: that directors should act at the earliest possible moment if they believe that their company is getting into difficulties. I should tell my hon. Friend that the Bill will achieve that without going down the path that his new clause recommends.

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams: I do not agree with what my hon. Friend said, but I recognise that the new clause forms part of a body of reforms that is needed in company law. It would have been appropriate to have included it in the Bill, and the Bill suffers because my hon. Friend will not be sufficiently specific about the way in which problem companies should be tackled. At present the Bill would go for the directors after their problems have overcome them: it does not give them the help that they deserve at the time when they most need it. However, in view of my hon. Friend's comments, which I shall want to study, I do not wish to press the matter further now. I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

New Clause 23

RESPONSIBILITY FOR COMPANY'S WRONGFUL TRADING

'(1) Subject to subsection (3) below, if, in the course of the winding up of a company which has gone into insolvent liquidation, it appears that subsection (2) below applies to a director, the court, on the application of the liquidator or the official receiver, may declare that that director is to be liable to make such contribution (if any) as the court thinks proper to the company's assets for distribution pari passu to such of the company's unsecured creditors as do not fall within the provisions of paragraphs 1 to 3 of Schedule 4 to this Act.

(2) This subsection applies to a director who—

(a) was a director of the company at a time when it was unable to satisfy its debts and other liabilities as they fell due; and

(b) during that time knew or ought to have concluded that there was no reasonable prospect that the company would be able to satisfy all its debts and other liabilities in full; and

(c) during that time knew or ought to have known that the company was continuing to carry on its business to the detriment of any of its creditors.

(3) The court shall not make a declaration under subsection (1) in respect of any person if it is satisfied that he took every step reasonably available to him in the circumstances with a view to minimising any potential detriment to the company's creditors.

(4) For the purposes of subsection (2) and (3) above, the facts which a director of a company ought to know or ascertain, the conclusions he ought to reach, the diligence he ought to display and the steps which he ought to take are those which would be known, ascertained, reached, displayed or taken, by a reasonably diligent person having both—

(a) the general knowledge, skill and experience that may reasonably be expected of a person carrying out the same functions as are carried out by that director in relation to the company; and

(b) the general knowledge, skill and experience that that director has.

(5) The reference in subsection (4) above to the functions carried out in relation to a company by a director includes a reference to any functions which he does not carry out, or has not carried out but which have been entrusted to him.

(6) Subsections (3) to (6) of section 630 of the 1985 Act (responsibility for company's fraudulent trading) shall have effect in relation to a declaration under subsection (1) above as they have effect in relation to a declaration under subsection (2) of that section, and this section is without prejudice to that section.

(7) For the purposes of this section a company goes into insolvent liquidation if it goes into liquidation at a time when its assets are insufficient for the payment of its debts and other liabilities and the expenses of the winding up.'. — [Mr. Gould.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Gould: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): With this, it will be convenient to discuss the following:

New clause 25—Wrongful trading——

'(1) Subject to subsection (3) below, if, in the course of the winding up of a company which has gone into insolvent liquidation, it appears that subsection (2) below applies to a director, the court, on the application of the liquidator, or the official receiver, may declare that that director is to be liable to make such contribution (if any) as the court thinks proper, to the company's assets for distribution pari passu to such of the company's unsecured creditors as do not fall within the provisions of paragraphs 1 to 3 of Schedule 3 to this Act.

(2) This subsection applies to a director who:—

(a) was a director of the company at a time when it was unable to satisfy its debts and other liabilities as they fell due; and

(b) during that time knew or ought to have concluded that there was no reasonable prospect that the company would be able to satisfy all its debts and other liabilities in full; and

(c) (i) during that time, negligently permitted the carrying on by the company of its business to the further detriment of creditors; or

(d) (ii) during that time knew or ought to have known that the company was continuing to carry on its business to the detriment of any of its creditors.

(3) The court shall not make a declaration under subsection (1) in respect of any person if it is satisfied that he took every step reasonably available to him in the circumstances with a view to minimising any potential detriment to the company's creditors.

(4) For the purposes of subsections (2) and (3) above, the facts which a director of a company ought to know or ascertain, the conclusions he ought to reach, the diligence he ought to display and the steps which he ought to take are those which would be known, ascertained, reached, displayed or taken, by a reasonably diligent person having both—

(a) the general knowledge, skill and experience that may reasonably be expected of a person carrying out the same functions as are carried out by that director in relation to the company; and

(b) the general knowledge, skill and experience that that director has.

(5) The reference in subsection (4) above to the functions carried out in relation to a company by a director includes a reference to any functions which he does not carry out, or has not carried out, but which have been entrusted to him.

(6) Subsections (3) to (6) of section 630 of the 1985 Act (responsibility for company's fraudulent trading) shall have effect in relation to a declaration under subsection (1) above as they have effect in relation to a declaration under subsection (2) of that section, and this section is without prejudice to that section.

(7) For the purposes of this section of a company goes into insolvent liquidation if it goes into liquidation at a time when its assets are insufficient for the payment of its debts and other liabilities and the expenses of the winding up.'.

Amendment No. 287, in clause 10, page 8, line 24, leave out 'every step' and insert 'such steps'.

Mr. Gould: This new clause brings us to one of the most important and widely contested issues in the Bill, and certainly one on which the Committee spent much time. The present clause 10 introduces an extremely valuable concept, and there is widespread support for the Government's attempt to establish the new notion of wrongful trading. However, the new clause is an alternative way to achieve the objective which the Government have set. It is supported by the CBI, the National Consumer Council, the Institute of Directors—although it makes a few minor amendments to the clause, which are expressed in new clause 25—the suppliers of venture capital and by many hon. Members on both sides of the House. A new clause with such unusual unanimity of support cannot be all bad.

From what is known of the Minister's position, and from correspondence between the Secretary of State and some of the bodies that support this measure, it seems clear that the Government share the objectives of the new clause. There is little difference in principle among the parties that have reached a conclusion on the issue. Where we depart from each other, and where most of us depart from the Government, is on the means by which they have chosen to achieve their objective—the drafting of clause

10. It is curious, to say the least, and it is less than clear. In effect, it would bring every director of every company that goes into insolvent liquidation into a big net. However, in most cases, it does so too late, given that we are trying to strike at a course of conduct over a period of time. Subsection (2) brings everyone into the net at the last possible moment.

8.45 pm

Subsection (3) provides the means by which people can escape the net. The method offered to them is also extremely curious and uncertain. It is almost certain that most people will escape the net. I am not sure whether that is the Government's intention, but the CBI and the Institute of Directors are worried that, although people might get out in the end, they will not be sure as to what they must do and show to escape liability. We have the worst of all possible worlds. Everyone will be caught, but too late; the means are provided by which almost everyone will escape, but in conditions of maximum confusion and uncertainty. That is a fairly dreadful list of achievements for a clause, which I accept is well-intentioned. We all agree on what we wish to achieve.

The problem is that the clause departs from the straightforward, easily comprehensible, recommendations of the review committee, which identified wrongful trading and said that we must do something about it. The Committee identified wrongful trading in a way that should commend itself to any reasonably intelligent observer approaching this matter for the first time. He would say, "Let us try to identify the elements of this new course of conduct called wrongful trading." The first thing that one must do in order to be caught by the provision is to trade—to carry on business. To be more precise, the review committee stated that trading meant taking on new liabilities and undertaking new indebtedness to a new group of people. But not everyone who trades will fall within the provisions of what should be clause 10. We are aiming only at those who trade wrongfully — in circumstances where they know, or should have known when they took on those new liabilities, that they had no reasonable prospect of meeting them.

I despair sometimes, because we have put this point repeatedly, and hon. Members who served on the Committee will know that, straightforward though it may seem, we have still not managed to persuade the Minister that this is the obvious and rational way to approach the problem.

My hon. Friends and I do not wish to support the addition of a third element — the defence of escaping liability, even if one falls within the definitions of having traded and having done so wrongfully, if one has taken every reasonable step to reduce the disadvantage to one's creditors. However, for the sake of consensus, I and my hon. Friends will support that defence, although it is otiose. We adhere strongly to the basic definition that wrongful trading means trading in the knowledge that one cannot meet one's liabilities.

Unless the Minister will accept a clause drafted along those lines, he will fail in his objective of striking at wrongful trading, and he will cause the maximum confusion and anxiety in the business community, to very little purpose.

Mr. Steve Norris (Oxford, East): I should declare an interest, not as an accountant, but as a business man who was told that the way to find a good accountant was to ask all the accountants that one knows how many two and two make, and to hire the one who said, "How many do you have in mind?" I represent the thousands of small businessmen who are worried about the effect of the Bill's operation. They are especially worried by what was clause 9 and is now clause 10.

Like the hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) and, as he rightly said, every other member of the Comittee, I welcome the admirable purpose of the clause, which is to define the concept of wrongful trading and establish it as a rationale for the withdrawal of limited liability. Nobody disputes that, but the danger has always been that we will throw the baby out with the bath water. In an effort to ensure that those who should not be allowed the protection of limited liability are not, we may, on occasions, find ourselves reacting to innocent directors. Such directors may have no more than made mistakes, or have been in a market that collapsed or have had a major supplier or customer who defaulted, or got into trouble in some way with the result that his business has been put into liquidation and he has been caught by the wrongful trading provisions.

With that in mind, clause 10 is too harsh. It is too difficult for the clause as it stands to distinguish between the legitimate directors and those whom we would all want to see banned. Every director, as the hon. Member for Dagenham pointed out, is caught by subsection (2)(a), (b), and (c). I cannot conceive of any circumstances in which any company goes under where the directors could not be said at some point to have been caught by this subsection. That is wrong because it cannot be the purpose of the clause, which is trying to distinguish culpability from non-culpability.

It follows from that that I take a different view from that of the hon. Member for Dagenham on whether subsection (3) provides an escape route through which most directors will be able to travel. The existence of the words "every step" provides a barrier that a liquidator could ensure was equally insurmountable to every director because "every step" is unfortunately a phrase that, in retrospect particularly, is capable of almost any definition. What is meant by "every step"? How can every director, however culpable or innocent, be sure that every step will have been taken?

Four principal bodies have come together on this. The CBI and the Institute of Directors represent the interests of business and individual directors. The British Venture Capital Association represents those who are seeking to use their skill, often in risk situations, to make companies work more efficiently. The fourth body is the National Consumer Council, whose objective is primarily to ensure that the interests of consumers are protected. That alliance is startling in its impact and shows the extent to which there are problems with this clause.

The British Venture Capital Association has said:

"If the Bill's wrongful trading clause is implemented as drafted, no sensible professional manager will run the additional risks of personal liability proposed, despite the attractions of share options (which are there to compensate for the loss of job security/pension rights, perks and automatic salary increases which large employers provide).

The same disincentive will apply to company doctors or professional turnaround experts being prepared to go into existing businesses in trouble (which can be rescued, provided the honest/competent manager is not threatened, as at present, by clause 10)."

The effect of this will be that fewer small companies will be started by professional managers spinning off from larger companies. Of those that start, fewer will be able to survive the natural cliffhangers that automatically affect any business. This will happen because their boards will decide on premature voluntary liquidation to ensure that they are not caught by the provisions of clause 10. What is more, where a small business is in temporary difficulties but has a real future if it can get the right sort of company doctor in, the business will simply not survive if the company doctor has to take account of the fact that if he fails—there must always be a high risk of that—he will be caught by clause 10.

The British Venture Capital Association says that clause 10

"will seriously damage the health of the UK's small business sector, at a time when a fragile new dawn is appearing for all those committed to an entrepreneurial Britain".

It follows from that that we must look again at the way that clause 10 is drafted.

I am obliged to differ from the solution arrived at by the hon. Member for Dagenham. I do so because the constructive knowledge test that is the essence of new clause 23 is, of itself, capable of creating the same difficulty of retrospective constructive interpretation, as is implicit in the existing form of words. We have to go on a stage further to the ascertainment of conduct showing a connivance at or continuation of a business when it is clear to the directors that they should be taking another course.

New clause 25 appears not in the form that I have set out for the clerk. It should not include subsection (2)(d) (ii). I am afraid that the original drafting of both options appear, and it is not my intention that they should do so. My intention was to insert (2)(c)(i) which has the concept within it of "negligently permitted the carrying on by the company of its business to the further detriment of creditors".

That is what we all want to achieve.

We want to get at the man who was not only a director at the material time but whose company went insolvent and who knew that there was no hope for it. That provision would capture everybody without exception. More particularly, it covers the director who then went on and consciously made the position worse. He is the man who, either through neglect or malfeasance, has forfeited the right to limited liability, and probably the right to be the director of a company in future.

With that in mind, I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will not regard consideration of clause 10 as closed but will take account of the unanimity of concern expressed not only on both sides of the House but by the organisations that have raised objections to the clause. I hope that he will take whatever opportunity is open to him to have another look at the matter.

Mr. Bermingham: If the Minister wants a section of the Bill to achieve our aim, that is to catch the crook and negligent director and to make them personally responsible for the loss suffered by others, he should begin to listen to those who will operate the legislation—the Institute of Directors, the Confederation of British Industry, the National Consumer Council and lawyers. They are saying precisely what we have said in Committee. Clause 10, or clause 9 as it was, is badly drawn and achieves nothing. It presents a deterrent without teeth. It has had its teeth pulled.

We are now dealing with new clauses 23 and 25, and I concede that the concept contained in new clause 25 is valuable. The section needs to catch negligent directors. All hon. Members have heard of companies which go steadily downhill, and whose directors know that that is happening, and either through sheer incompetence and laziness or sheer negligence allow both the position to deteriorate as each day goes by and the creditors to suffer increasingly.

Why should people who put others in a position of loss hide behind a screen which denies them personal liability when that loss is entirely their fault? If I drive my car negligently and run over an hon. Member, I am sued because it is my fault. I cannot possibly say, "It was the car that ran him over, not me", and the same is true for negligent directors. They control the business and its direction. If they know that the business is in trouble, they are under a moral duty—we all agreed about that in Committee—to do something about it. Their duty may be to cease trading, to seek help or a further injection of capital, or to restructure the business, but they are not entitled to allow the matter to drift away to the detriment of others.

If the Minister agrees with the philosophy that lies behind the arguments put forward in Committee, in the business world at large and every other section of the community, he must explain why every variation on clause 9, now clause 10, has been peremptorily rejected. Why will he reject the new clauses and use the weight of the Government's majority, or the payroll vote, as it is a Thursday, to force through this piece of nonsense? If, as the Minister said time and time again in Committee, he wants the clause to work, will he explain why he has rejected every one of the numerous ways of achieving that end suggested by people who understand these matters?

Mr. Allen McKay (Barnsley, West and Penistone): The new clause gives me the opportunity to refer to a constituency matter that has been exercising me and many others for the past seven months. The clause fits the bill. The last person to be considered in insolvency cases usually appears to be the consumer.

The case relates to a desirable building site in Hoyland Swaine in my constituency, on which the builder is erecting some good houses, in most cases successfully. However, it appears that times became difficult for Manston Builders. It would have been better if the firm had decided that it was in trouble and had been honest, but it was not. It carried on building and selling homes or signing people up for homes before those homes were completed. It did that, although it obviously knew that it was in financial difficulties. Local people knew that it was running into financial difficulties when the suppliers of building materials moved in and retrieved their materials. But even then, the firm allowed people to sign up for homes and to pay deposits of up to £3,000.

I should like to quote an example. Mrs Janet Barber and her husband are extremely hard-working and genuine people. They signed for a bungalow, which is in a beautiful area in my constituency. When the house was seven eighths built, and the builder had informed them that they would be able to move in in a few weeks, they found that the builder had had to move out and had left them with an uncompleted dwelling. The Barbers had gone into debt in buying soft furnishings, carpets and furniture, which they had had to put into store. They had been promised that in a few weeks they would be able to move in, so they sold their home and moved into lodgings with their parents. When the crunch came, therefore, that couple had sold their home, bought the furnishings and paid the deposit in good faith. Seven months later, they are still in lodgings with their parents.

When the matter was put into the hands of the liquidators the problems started again. Irrespective of the representations that I and the agencies acting on the couple's behalf made to the liquidators, despite the promises continually made to me that it would be only a few weeks until the house was finished, and although not only the Barbers but other people offered the liquidators the price of the completed dwelling in cash, the liquidators did not accept any of those representations or proposals. They were using those half-finished homes as a carrot to attract someone to take the whole site. Under the present law, there is nothing wrong with that because the liquidators are acting for the creditors. However, what is to happen to the poor old consumer? What protection will he have in future? He does not have it now.

Three weeks ago when I rang the liquidators again, they said that a firm was now taking over the site, and the Barbers could not have their home, although on three occasions they had offered the price of the house minus the cost needed to complete it. The liquidators were happy with the price, and I know that because they told me. However, as soon as somebody came along and said that he would buy the whole site, the poor old consumer went to the bottom of the bin and did not matter.

There is need for legislation to deal with that matter. I accept that the creditors need to be looked after, but so does the consumer. That should never happen again. As late as today, I received a final letter from the liquidators saying yet again that a person was taking over the whole site, and that it would take a few weeks to complete. In the meantime, the Barbers and other families have decided that enough is enough. Despite a loss running at £3,000 to £4,000, they have decided that the time has come for them to take up another option. Who will compensate those people for the £4,000 that they have already spent, and can ill afford? The builder knew what was happening when they signed the agreement, but they did not. It was obvious at the time that the company was going towards bankruptcy. That should not have happened. I hope that the Minister will ensure that it does not happen again.

Mr. Fletcher: I sympathise with the case that the hon. Gentleman has made. I cannot ensure that it will not happen again, but the measures we are taking in the Bill provide an opportunity to pursue more vigorously and to more effect directors who act in the way the hon. Gentleman has described.

Clause 10 would allow the court, in the event of an application by the liquidator, to attach personal liability to directors who trade wrongfully. That, of course, would affect their pockets, because they would lose the protection of limited liability, and that is the purpose of the clause. The hon. Gentleman has chosen the correct clause in which to make the point about his constituent.

A number of hon. Members raised other points about the clause. The hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) said that we had spent some time discussing this clause in Committee, and that is true. The hon. Member for St. Helens, South (Mr. Bermingham) said that we had dismissed in a peremptory manner all the recommendations and advice given to us by various bodies. I am bound to say to him that that does not apply to any of the recommendations made to us.

At least three hon. Members referred to a letter from the CBI and the IOD and the NCC. In relation to that, senior officials had a long discussion with all the parties together, but I am afraid that no agreement was reached.

My hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Norris) said there was unanimity of concern. In relation to those three bodies that is the case, but there was no unanimity about how the problem should be tackled. Indeed, on the amendments before the House, there is not complete agreement between my hon. Friend and Opposition Members on what might replace the clause we are discussing.

Mr. Gould: Is the Minister implying that he will accept amendments to the clause on which we could establish unanimity? If he is saying that, it would take us a long way.

Mr. Fletcher: I can safely say that is the case, because I doubt whether unanimity could be achieved among all the parties protesting rather vigorously about this matter.

The hon. Member for Dagenham said that everyone is agreed on the overall policy. I am sure that is so. Everyone is concerned about the abuse of limited liability and the fact that directors of companies which have, shall we say, traded wrongfully appear to be able to walk away from the resulting mess they have created in relation to other people's money and have no liability attached to them. The difficulty, of course, is how best to achieve the objective of making directors personally liable for wrongful trading.

It is suggested that one of the new clauses should be accepted in order to make the Bill more understandable to the layman, not least the director, so that his mind will be concentrated at an early stage on the financial problems of the company. There is no doubt that that would be helpful, because the more easily the clauses are understood by the layman the better for him. But our principal purpose must be to ensure that, when tested in the courts, there will be certainty of interpretation leading to effective application and the fulfilment of Government policy. The clause, as drafted, will properly fulfil that need and enable the courts to penalise those who abuse the privileges of limited liability.

Mr. Bermingham: Does the Minister agree that the real argument is whether the clause, as drafted, is effective? The Minister has legal opinion which says it is, and everybody else has legal opinion which says it is not. As a compromise, would the Minister accept a third independent legal opinion between now and the next stage in the Lords? If it proves that the Minister's advisers or his parliamentary draftsmen are wrong, will he bow gracefully to the advice of any independent leading counsel he may choose? It is as simple as that.

Mr. Fletcher: It is the duty of the House to decide whether a Bill should be accepted and how it should be passed into legislation. There have been opportunities in the other place to consider this matter. In the other place there are many eminent legal minds, and there the clause was not amended. Nor was it amended in Committee. Therefore, I cannot recommend the amendments now before the House.

9.15 pm

Subsection (1) of both new clauses would exclude creditors with preferential claims from sharing in the proceeds of a successful wrongful trading application. We have already gone a long way to meet demands to reduce Government preferences. But to accept the subsection would mean that there could be no wrongful trading application where only preferential debts were outstanding. The significance of that is that there are rogue directors, to whom many references have been made, and the paying off of non-preferentials to keep suppliers reasonably happy so that they can start up their businesses again next day — what is referred to as the phoenix syndrome — is one of the tricks of rogue directors, and they could apply it on the basis of the suggested subsection (6). In any event, we argued in Committee that the proceeds of wrongful trading should be for the generality of creditors, and the Government still hold to that view.

Paragraphs (a) and (b) of subsection (2) of both clauses are the same and are in fact cumulative provisions. The starting point for the period of wrongful trading — subsection (2)(a)—requires first that default in payment of one or more due debts must occur. It would not therefore apply whilst the company maintained payments on due debts and avoided a cash flow problem by, for instance, taking deposits and prepayments from customers but failed to supply the goods. It would also enable a director to escape liability if he resigned his directorship immediately before the first cheque bounced and in anticipation of the company first encountering cash flow difficulties, even though the conditions of subsection (2)(b) applied at the time he knew that there was no reasonable prospect that the company would be able to satisfy all its debts and other liabilities in full. I acknowledge that the proposals made by my hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, East and by the hon. Member for Dagenham have some element of certainty, but at the cost of an unacceptable curtailment of liability where there has been conduct which has been wrong and damaging. It does not meet our policy needs, and I cannot accept it.

We believe that it is necessary to deal not only with the case when a company has actually found itself unable to meet its debts, but where the director knew that there was no reasonable prospect of the company avoiding insolvent liquidation; the company may or may not be technically insolvent at that time. In addition, our formula provides more flexibility for directors in that they can go on trading while technically insolvent if there is a reasonable prospect in their opinion that they can trade out of their difficulties or that an arrangement with creditors will solve the financial difficulties.

I wish to stress that under our proposals directors are allowed a reasonable opportunity to consider what steps are available to them to remedy their financial problems. They will not, as some people have claimed, risk having a wrongful trading declaration made against them if they fail to put the company into liquidation immediately a cheque bounces.

The proposition in subsection (2)(c) of new clause 23 and subsection (2)(d) of new clause 25 in our view appears to impose an unnecessary obligation on the liquidator to show that the director not only knew that the situation was hopeless but that it was getting worse because the company was continuing to trade.

Subsection (2)(c) of new clause 25 requires the liquidator to show, as an alternative, not only that the director had permitted the company to carry on its business to the further detriment of creditors but had negligently done so. I submit that, in trying to make the clause clearer, my hon. Friend has made it more complex.

The obverse of negligence is diligence. That test is clearly set out in subsection (4). I am surprised that the hon. Member for Dagenham did not refer to subsection (4). He pointed to subsections (2) and (3), and I was waiting for him to bring in the very important subsection (4). Subsection (4) of the new clause is, apart from some additional words, an exact copy of subsection (4) of existing clause 10.

Mr. Gould: The Minister is, of course, right that subsection (4) establishes a test which is indistinguishable from that applied by the common law, but the test has to be applied to a course of conduct. The course of conduct is then defined in subsection (3), and it is that definition which is so difficult.

Mr. Fletcher: But the test is applied. My hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, East was arguing for a negligence test, but I believe that clause 4 meets the point that he was making. The additional words in brackets in the new clause in my view add nothing to the meaning of the subsection.

The new clauses in subsection (3) add to existing subsection (3), after the words "every step" the words "reasonably available to him in the circumstances". In my view, those additional words are unnecessary. A director could not reasonably be expected to take steps which were not reasonably available to him.

Amendment No. 287, tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, East, seeks to substitute the words "such steps" for the words "every step" in subsection (3). When the matter was raised in Committee, I said that subsection (4) of clause 10 explained fully that what was meant by "every step" was the steps which a reasonably diligent person would have taken in the circumstances, and that no useful purpose would be served by replacing "every step" with "such steps." If I remember my hon. Friend's new clause correctly, he may well have accepted that point.

Concern was also expressed in Committee about the danger of the courts applying a negligence test and making unreasonable requirements of directors who had had to make difficult decisions on uncertain questions as a matter of business judgment, and in particular doing so with the benefit of hindsight. I am sure that the hon. Member for Dagenham is aware that the courts are accustomed to putting themselves in the shoes of decision makers at the time, faced with all the difficulties, the need for quick decisions and decisions which have to be made in the heat of the moment, whether the defendant is a company director, a surgeon or a drug company. In particular, all the authorities recognise that the company director has a proper role in the exercise of commercial judgment into which the court will not inquire. I believe that this is an important and helpful point which may need to be given more emphasis.

I cannot recommend the new clauses.

Mr. Norris: Will my hon. Friend tell the House whether in his view, accepting that the new clause makes it easier for us to get at the rogue director, it makes it no less attractive for honest directors, company doctors and valuable people operating with companies whose futures are by no means certain but which have immense potential if they can be established, put right and made to grow? Is he satisfied that those directors will not be more wary in the light of the clause than they ought reasonably to be, given that the purpose of the clause is to strike at the fraudster, not at the honest man?

Mr. Fletcher: I do not believe that the new clause would make it easier to catch the rogue director. I think that the clause as drafted should not hold any fear for company doctors and people whose purpose in the company is quite clearly to try to assist it. That is the usual condition on which the company doctor is employed and the court, if somebody were to suggest to the contrary, is used to recognising that that purpose is indeed a profession.

I hope that clause 10 will make the generality of directors, particularly those who carry a number of directorships, more wary. They will have to consider whether they are capable of applying all care and diligence to every directorship in future. If that results in some individuals reducing the number of directorships that they hold, that will not be a bad thing.

New Clause 24

SET-OFF OF DEBTS DUE TO AND BY THE CROWN

'(1) Where this section applies compensation shall not be available between debts due to or by the Crown under the provisions of any statute and debts due to or by the Crown in respect of contractual obligations.

(2) This section applies:—

(a) where a company is being wound up by the court or voluntarily; or

(b) in the case of a company to which a receiver or manager or administrative receiver has been appointed and is in office; or

(c) where a bankruptcy order has been made against an individual; or

(d) where a composition or scheme has been approved by a meeting summoned under section 95 of this Act and has taken effect.'.—[Mr. Gould.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Gould: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

The new clause is a slight variation on an amendment that we debated in Committee. It is designed, as that earlier amendment was, to reduce the present gross advantage enjoyed by the Crown, in addition to all the other advantages that it enjoys as a creditor, in relation to the set-offs of amounts due to and by an insolvent individual or company.

The Crown enjoys two unfair advantages over other unsecured creditors. First, it may, to its advantage, set off debts due to it for taxes against debts due by it for commercial transactions. Such a set-off is not allowed where the Government might lose out. The arrangement is completely one-sided, and that is where the unfairness lies. Secondly, transactions with the Government are all-pervasive. A right of set-off which may be totally fair in the context of individual creditors becomes an unfair preference when used by each of the many arms of Government to extract their separate and different pounds of flesh. Both of these unfair preferences appear to be contrary to the policy of the Crown Proceedings Act 1947. Both are contrary to the views expressed in the review committee.

The new clause would reduce the effect of these advantages by providing that set-off would be permissible only between obligations of a like nature — between statutory obligations on the one hand and contractual obligations on the other. It is therefore a relatively modest attack on Crown privilege and advantage in this respect, as it leaves many other rights of set-off untouched. It at least makes the distinction between the Crown's role as a revenue raiser and its role as a commercial agent. In that respect, the measure is fair. I hope that it will commend itself to the House that the Crown should be forced to deal with its debtors in separate ways.

Mr. Hanley: The Committee discussed this matter at some length, and this new clause encapsulates most of the arguments of those of us who believe that the Crown has many unfair advantages over ordinary creditors. The Bill aims to protect the ordinary creditor from the ravages of the unscrupulous director and, as we discussed in Committee in relation to preferential creditors, certain unfair powers of the state.

It is ironic that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State who declared his interest as a member of the Institute of Chartered Accountants of Scotland should find himself hoist with his own petard, as this measure was suggested by his institute. The speech of the hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) followed the institute's advice. The hon. Gentleman has taken a close interest in its advice, and I hope that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State will take an equally close interest in the well-chosen words of the institute of which he has been a successful and famous member for many years. I hope that my hon. Friend will remain a member of the institute for many years, although, by moving against the amendments of his institute, he risks almost certain censure.

The right of set-off is an equitable right in English law. Any equitable right is a right that may be exercised by the courts only if it is fair. With respect to the Crown, that right is established in statute in certain areas. It would be completely unfair if the Crown were to be allowed a right that is not allowed to others. If a holding company has two wholly-owned subsidiaries, one of which owes money to a company that subsequently becomes insolvent while the other subsidiary is owed money by the company that has become insolvent, subsidiary A may not offset the debt against subsidiary B. The two subsidiaries are wholly owned by the same holding company, but in law the right of set-off is exerciseable only by one individual legal person.

In the locus of a holding company, however, the state might have two subsidiaries, one being value added tax and the other the Inland Revenue, or another branch that deals with pay-as-you-earn or national insurance contributions. If PAYE is owed money by an insolvent company but the VAT authorities owe money to the insolvent company, an automatic right of set-off is provided for in the Bill. In other words, what is available to the state is not available in exactly the same set of circumstances to companies. That is unfair and, as I said in Committee, this right of set-off should not exist in a Bill that is trying to protect ordinary creditors.

Mr. Millan: I support the arguments in favour of the new clause. The mischief arises from the fact that the Government are treated as a single entity. As a single entity, the Government are far more pervasive than any other single entity, even the grandest holding company. Apart from the mischief that that causes in equity, which the hon. Member for Richmond and Barnes (Mr. Hanley) has graphically explained, there is also the practical question, which many who are experienced in insolvency practice have explained to me, that it is very difficult to get money out of a Government Department that may owe money to a debtor in a liquidation or a bankruptcy. It searches around all the other Government Departments to make sure that nothing is owed on the other side to which they could apply the set-off provisions. Apart, therefore, from equity, it means that in certain circumstances there is difficulty in winding up a particular bankruptcy or liquidation.

For all those reasons, I hope that the Government will be able to accept the new clause. It is a more modest form of the new clause that was moved in Committee. It does not altogether eliminate set-off, but it confines set-off either to statutory obligations on the one hand or to contractual obligations on the other. At the moment the set-off that is available to the Government can apply to all statutory and contractual obligations. A debt in one area can be set off against an obligation in another.

Mr. Andrew Rowe (Mid-Kent): The Government have recently made a welcome change to the VAT regulations. It allows small firms not to be penalised in quite the same way as they were before. This is a welcome move towards recognising the fact that the damage done to a small firm when the Government insist upon taking priority over all other creditors far outweighs the merit of the amount of money that the state receives. The Government should take every opportunity to ensure that innocent sufferers from an insolvency are not put in some cases at a fatal disadvantage when the state insists upon taking its share.

9.45 pm

Mr. Fletcher: With regard to Crown preference, the Government have gone a long way to making sure that there is a better distribution of the assets in a liquidation.

The right hon. Member for Glasgow, Govan (Mr. Millan) said that the Crown is indivisible, and that is indeed the case. With all due respect to this important piece of legislation, I do not think that that is exactly the way that such a truth may be challenged.

The proposed new clause curtails the Crown's right to set-off in a way that the Government consider to be undesirable — indeed, to be absurdly unfair. The new clause would have the effect of placing the Crown in a significantly worse position than that of other creditors. Other creditors would be able to continue to set off contractual debts against statutory debts. To quote an example given in another place by the Lord Advocate, if a local authority as an education authority owes a bankrupt builder £5,000 for work done by him on a school, and the builder owes the local authority as a rating authority £5,000 in rates, the local authority can set off the debt owed by it against the rates owed to it. That, as the House will know, is something that can also be done by commercial businesses. I cannot see why the Crown should be placed in a worse position than other creditors in this respect. Therefore, I cannot commend the clause to the House.

Mr. Gould: I fear that the Minister was no more persuasive on this occasion than when he addressed himself to the same problem in Committee. In particular, it is a little difficult for him to claim credit on behalf of the Government for having reduced the ambit of Crown preference when that was forced upon him by the fact that there was a majority vote against his view. Unfortunately, as I cannot be sure that we have such a majority of votes available to us this evening, I fear that I must beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

New Clause 26

PREPAYMENT CREDITORS

'(1) This section applies where an individual pays to a company a deposit of money or a pre-payment in relation to a contract for the supply of goods or services by the company for use or consumption other than in the course of business.

(2) Where this section applies the beneficial interest in the deposit or pre-payment shall remain with the individual until the later of—

(a) the performance of the contract of supply by the company;

(b) three months after the relevant date, as defined in relation to companies in Part II of Schedule 4 of this Act.'.—[Mr. Norris.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Norris: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take amendment No. 284, in page 61, line 11, clause 81, at beginning insert

'In a winding up any deposit of money or pre-payment made before the relevant date (as defined in Schedule 4) in relation to the purchase, leasing, hire or rental of goods from the company or the provision of services by the company for use or consumption other than in the course of business shall, where the goods or service have not been provided to the person who has paid the deposit or made the pre-payment, be returned to that person as his property and shall not be available for the payment of any other debts of the company.'.

Mr. Norris: Earlier we heard about the problem that the constituents of an hon. Member were having with their house. He spoke of the distinction between creditors and consumers, which seems to epitomise the problem that the new clause is designed to cure. That may no doubt be a lay distinction worthy of being drawn, but in practice it is not a distinction that the Bill has ever drawn.

Creditors are very neatly separated into two types, particularly when dealing with the new clause. There are those who have extended credit for an account which they have submitted for payment for services rendered as a commercial undertaking. Presumably there is an element of profit in the transaction for the creditor, and the creditor has had the usual trade opportunities to decide whether he wants to extend the credit to the company. Indeed, if a person does not like what he sees, he will decide not to extend credit to the company.

In that context I remember the stories of some of the small men in the engineering industry who did not lose money when Rolls-Royce went under. It was largely because, in the years prior to the eventual demise of Rolls-Royce, they had simply found that however hard they tried they did not get paid, and they applied a common sense rule of business. If a firm is not going to get paid, there is no point in its supplying goods or services.

That is a process which a commercial creditor can go through, but I am concerned in the new clause with people who are not in that category. They are people who send money in response to an advertisement which solicits money for goods which they subsequently never receive because, with their money safely lodged in the company's hands, the company goes bankrupt and they are left with absolutely nothing. I have called such people deposit creditors, and it is to them that we should address our minds for a moment, if only because their concern, in terms of the volume of complaint and criticism that we hear of, is probably greater than any of the other concerns that we have been speaking of this evening.

I was reminded of that when, only two days ago, I read that a man behind a shower blind firm which is going into liquidation just three years after another company controlled by him failed is already back in business. The Daily Telegraph reported how a company called Rollaway Shower Blinds had an estimated deficiency to creditors of £426,949, about £63,000 of which was owed to 1,400 people who had answered advertisements in Sunday colour supplements. Some who had paid by credit card had been charged twice, which was no doubt very convenient for the company, but Mr. Alan Ward, managing director, said that the mistakes were caused by overstrained office administration.

We then discover that the crash followed a 1982 failure of a company called Matador Shower Sytems, of which the said Mr. Ward also happened to be a director. On that occasion, creditors lost £252,000 in the liquidation. The creditors meeting was told that Mr. Ward is now trading with a company called Rollway (UK) which, in the light of our previous discussion, is not to be confused with Rollaway, from The Green, Letchmore Heath, Herts, where Rollaway conveniently and coincidentally also happened to have been based.

It is widely recognised that such practice is intolerable. Through clause 7, concerning the disqualification of directors, and clause 10, on the reduction of limited liability, my hon. Friend the Minister has made provision to deal with that practice. I hope that, as a result of the Bill, it will be reduced. It is for the 1,400 people who have paid money for which they have received absolutely nothing that I am anxious. I understand that there is a business principle which, for convenience, is referred to as the Romalpa clause. It says that a company may add a rider to its invoices which says that the company retains title and goods until they have been paid for.

[Mr. Norris]

I have heard what I am trying to do described as a reverse Romalpa clause. We are saying that until a depositor who has sent a cheque to a company gets his goods, he should be treated as though he has retained title in that deposit. He should therefore be able to apply to a liquidator or a receiver and say, "I sent my money. I never had anything in return for it. The company has become insolvent and I should like my deposit back. I retain my claim to it because I have received nothing."

I appreciate that, in those circumstances, trade creditors who would otherwise have ranked pari passu with deposit creditors will be disadvantaged. I regret that, because I am more likely to be a trade creditor than a deposit creditor, but deposit creditors are qualitatively different from those whose invoices have been issued in the nature of trade. Moreover, the vast majority of people believe that they are entitled to be treated differently.

Amendment No. 284 tries to achieve the same end by slightly different means. Without the advantage of detailed advice, I am not able to say which of the two forms of words is to be preferred, but anybody who listens to the consumer programmes that are popular on televison and radio, anybody who reads the newspapers and anybody who has any concern for natural justice, for little people who cannot be expected to have batteries of accountants with a Dun and Bradstreet address facility to establish the status of companies, must want this small protection to be afforded.

I believe that this measure, together with the provisions contained in clauses 7 and 10, will ensure that the Bill achieves its main aim—a greater degree of equity as between those who stand to lose money in a liquidation and those who should be held to blame, if any, in such liquidations.

I commend the new clause to my hon. Friend the Minister. I hope that he will take on board seriously the strength of feeling that there is about this issue.

The other day, the producer of a consumer affairs programme on Channel 4 gave me a large file of correspondence from people who had responded to his invitation and had written on the subject. The diversity of complaints about different industries is frightening. I am aware that the travel and some other industries have indemnity schemes. No doubt such a scheme could be extended. We must have similar protection for all businesses to ensure that what I have described cannot happen in the future.

Mr. Gould: As the hon. Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Norris) explained, new clause 26 is designed to achieve the same objective as amendment No. 284. Like him, I cannot distinguish between the efficacy of either of them. I am happy to endorse all that he said. We share an anxiety which is widely felt for — to use his felicitous description—the deposit creditor.

I am sure that the Minister will accept that there is no doubt about the range and scale of the problem. In Committee, the Minister accepted that it was a problem which should be dealt with. We are again faced with the familiar problem of how best to deal with it and whether it can be dealt with in the Bill.

The trade creditor is different. He offers credit in the normal course of business. He knows the risks. He has a clear understanding of what he is doing. He knows the benefits that he seeks to achieve. He has various means available to protect himself. He can make all the usual professional checks on the creditworthiness of the person to whom he is extending credit. He can, if he wishes, avail himself of the Romalpa clause, which is used increasingly as trading conditions become more difficult.

The deposit creditor has no such protection. He would be amazed to be told that in making the deposit for some goods or service he was contributing to the working capital of the firm which was meant to be supplying him. He has no means of checking creditworthiness. He does not understand that he is extending credit. He has never heard of the Romalpa clause. He needs protection. Various suggestions have been made as to how that can be achieved. The earliest one, which commanded some support, was the notion that the deposit creditor should be made a preferred creditor, and should be granted a statutory preference. I found that principle a little difficult to accept, because one of the Bill's objectives is to reduce the scope and number of preferred creditors.

The second suggestion was that a type of tracing principle, relying on the law of trust, should be applied. There is a hint of that in new clause 26 where it mentions "the beneficial interest in the deposit".

The third suggestion emerged in Committee. It is becoming known as a reverse Romalpa clause. The idea is that the deposit creditor should be given—without having to do anything—the type of protection that a trade creditor might insist upon in similar circumstances by inserting a Romalpa clause in the contracts through which he supplies goods or extends credit. The new clause and my amendment seek to do that. I believe that they provide a neat and elegant solution in principle. I admit that one could question whether that is properly achieved in either the new clause or the amendment, but I hope that the Minister will accept that we must deal with this matter, and that the Bill is the right place to do it. The solution that we offer must be at least acceptable, even if it is not the best solution.

Therefore, despite any drafting deficiencies, which the Minister's expert advisers can remedy, I hope that he will accept the principle of what the hon. Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Norris) and the Opposition suggest.

Mr. Millan: I wish to make only two points in support of what has already been said. First, many of the people in this unfortunate position have been misled, because advertisements in reputable newspapers——

It being Ten o'clock, the debate stood adjourned.

It being Ten o'clock, MR. SPEAKER proceeded to put forthwith the deferred Question necessary to dispose of the proceedings on Estimates 1985-86 (Class IV, Vote 4).

Class IV, Vote 4

Resolved,

That a further sum not exceeding £39,501,000 be granted to Her Majesty out of the Consolidated Fund to defray the charges which will come in course of payment during the year ending on 31st March 1986 for expenditure by the Department of Trade and Industry on export promotion, trade co-operation, regulation of trading practices and consumer protection, and other services including grants in aid and international subscriptions, and other grants.

MR. SPEAKER proceeded to put forthwith the Question which he was directed to put, pursuant to paragraph (7) of Standing Order No. 19 (Consideration of Estimates).

ESTIMATES 1985-86

Resolved,

That a further sum not exceeding £48,588,165,000 be granted to Her Majesty out of the Consolidated Fund to complete or defray the charges for the service of the year ending on 31st March 1986, as set out in House of Commons Papers Nos. 239, 240, 241, 426 and 427.

Bill ordered to be brought in upon the foregoing Resolutions, and upon the Resolutions [11 July] relating to Estimates 1985-86 by the Chairman of Ways and Means, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Peter Rees, Mr. John Moore, Mr. Barney Hayhoe and Mr. Ian Stewart.

CONSOLIDATED FUND (APPROPRIATION) BILL

Mr. John Moore accordingly presented a Bill to apply a sum out of the Consolidated Fund to the service of the year ending on 31 March 1986, to appropriate the supplies granted in this Session of Parliament, and to repeal certain Consolidated Fund and Appropriation Acts: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time tomorrow and to be printed. [Bill 160.]

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Ordered,

That, at this day's sitting, the Insolvency Bill [Lords] may be proceeded with, though opposed, until any hour. — [Mr. Neubert.]

Insolvency Bill [Lords]

As amended, again considered.

Question again proposed, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Millan: Many deposit creditors are caught out because they have responded to advertisements in reputable newspapers or journals, and are under the mistaken impression that anything advertised in a reputable newspaper is bound to be genuine and that there is no risk. Unfortunately, that is not always true. many companies involved in this business which have a record of going bankrupt and starting again advertise in reputable newspapers.

Secondly, if we had such protection, some trade creditors would be much more careful about extending credit to the companies with which we are trying to deal. They would recognise the additional danger that those companies were trading on depositors' money which, in the event of the company going bankrupt, would not be available to them. Another advantage in such a provision is that it would impose an additional disability on some of the companies which operate in that way now. The new clause will benefit everyone, including trade creditors and deposit creditors.

Mr. Fletcher: In Committee, I said that I would give serious thought to the problem of consumer creditors and pre-payments; and this I have done. We found in Committee that the well-intentioned proposals by hon. Members on the creation of preferential and even pre-preferential status for such creditors and the imposition of special regulations on traders were impracticable. My hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Norris) referred to the Channel 4 file, which I saw the other day. It was not any larger than some of the files on this matter that we have seen in the Department. I make it clear that we are aware of the size of the problem. The difficulty, as with many aspects of this subject, is how to deal with it.

My hon. Friend said something about a small measure of protection, but the measures of protection that I have considered are by no means small. They seem to be rather complex and require some kind of trust fund, or a system such as that suggested by the hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) in his new clause. However, it would appear that neither system would be foolproof. The very persons and types of business men and companies that we are most anxious to catch in this respect are the ones most likely to escape from any of the suggestions that I have heard before and that I have heard again today.

I say that with regret because I should very much like to find a system that would be effective in curtailing this problem. Obviously, as my hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, East said, the measures already in the Bill will be helpful. Hon. Members will know that the Insolvency Law Review Committee considered the problems, and in particular the proposal that statutory arrangements should be made to require companies that hold consumers' pre-payments and trust accounts. The review committee concluded that such creditors should not receive preferential treatment and that the trust account proposal is impracticable. That is the view that the Government still hold.

The House may know that pre-payment was the subject of a discussion paper published by the Director General of Fair Trading in October 1984. Although he disagreed with both the Cork Committee and the Government about the giving of some preferential status to pre-payment creditors, he concluded that the best prospects for the protection of consumers without involving a complicated and far from foolproof system, lies with voluntary schemes designed to cover particular problem areas. I and, I am sure, other hon. Members will be interested in the outcome of the Office of Fair Trading's discussions on this subject. However, I am afraid that I cannot accept the new clauses, partly because I do not believe that they would have the effect for which they hope.

Mr. Hanley: In paragraph 1075 of the report on Insolvency Law and Practice, the review committee says:

"Accordingly, we do not propose any amendment in principle of the existing law in this field, but we consider that the new Insolvency Act should contain general provisions, applicable to companies and individuals alike".

Mr. Fletcher: That comment does not differ from my view. The Bill will allow opportunities for consumer creditors to be better placed in a liquidation than at present as well as providing for trade creditors. I have not seen any proposals for preferential or pre-preferential treatment that I consider workable.

Mr. Norris: Earlier, the hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) rejected the idea of a preference arrangement for deposit creditors because that muddied the waters more than it cleared them, which is a fair thing to say. In Committee, I was encouraged by the undertaking given by my hon. Friend the Minister to look again at this matter. I am sure that he appreciates that this is of great concern to a great many people. We should try to address ourselves to these issues. I readily admit that the wording suggested to me by those who have been kind enough to advise me may be less than perfect, and that the amendment standing in the name of the hon. Member for Dagenham may be equally imperfect. However, I am saddened that my hon. Friend should reject the notion that anything can be done by a detailed critique of my amendment.

Mr. Gould: Does the hon. Gentleman share my disappointment that the Minister appears to recognise that there is a problem which needs a solution, does not find that our suggestions meet the bill, but produces no suggestions of his own?

Mr. Norris: It is possibly more appropriate that that comment comes from the hon. Gentleman than from me. I shall have to live beyond this night with the consequences of telling my hon. Friend the Minister how disappointed I am with his efforts. He told me that the large fat file which I shall shortly send him will accompany many large fat files which he already has. My hon. Friend will continue to receive such files and to have to respond on television, the radio and elsewhere to the outrage expressed by ordinary people who recognise this genuine problem, and who ask why, if he accepts that a problem exists and something can be done about it, he does not do something about it.

Even at this late stage, I hope that my hon. Friend will bear in mind the significance of this small provision in the 200-clause Bill to many people. However, I recognise the potential imperfection in my new clause, and I beg to seek leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 1

UNQUALIFIED PERSONS NOT TO ACT AS INSOLVENCY PRACTITIONERS

Mr. Fletcher: I beg to move amendment No. 1, in page 1, line 17 at end insert

'or as supervisor of a composition or scheme approved by it under Chapter II or Part II of this Act'.

Mr. Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take Government amendments Nos. 2 to 4.

Mr. Fletcher: These are technical amendments aimed at providing both consistency with existing provisions and clarity of wording generally.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendments made:

No. 2, in page 2, line 4 leave out 'in Scotland'.

No. 3, in page 2, line 6 after 'under', insert 'a deed which is'.

No. 4, in page 2, line 15 leave out from beginning to 'to' in line 17 and insert 'References in this section to an individual include, except in so far as the context otherwise requires, references to a partnership and'.—[Mr. Fletcher.]

Clause 2

QUALIFICATION OF INSOLVENCY PRACTITIONERS

Amendments made:

No. 5, in page 2, line 32 leave out from beginning to end of line 5 on page 3 and insert—

'(2) A person is not qualified to act as an insolvency practitioner at any time unless, at that time—

(a) he is authorised to act as an insolvency practitioner by virtue of section [Authorisation of members of recognised professional bodies] below; or

(b) he holds an authorisation granted under section [Grant, refusal and withdrawal of authorisation] below.

(3) A person is not qualified to act as an insolvency practitioner in relation to another person at any time unless—

(a) there is in force at that time security or, in Scotland, caution for the proper performance of his functions; and

(b) that security or caution meets the prescribed requirements with respect to his so acting in relation to that other person.

(4) A person is not qualified to act as an insolvency practitioner at any time if, at that time—

(a) he has been adjudged bankrupt or sequestration of his estate has been awarded and (in either case) he has not been discharged;'.

No. 6, in page 3, line 8 at end insert

'or

(c) he is a patient within the meaning of Part VII of the Mental Health Act 1983 or section 125(1) of the Mental Health (Scotland) Act 1984.'.

No. 7, in page 3, line 9, leave out Clause 3.

No. 8, in page 3, line 19, leave out Clause 4.

No. 9, in page 4, line 17, leave out Clause 5.—[Mr. Fletcher.]

Clause 6

RULES AND REGULATIONS

Amendment made:

No. 10, in page 4, line 25, leave out from 'for' to 'shall' in line 29 and insert

'the purpose of giving effect to this Part.

(1A) Without prejudice to the generality of subsection (1) above or to any provision of this Part by virtue of which regulations may be made with respect to any matter, regulations under this section may contain—

(a) provision as to the matters to be taken into account in determining whether a person is a fit and proper person to act as an insolvency practitioner;

(b) provision prohibiting a person from acting as an insolvency practitioner in prescribed cases, being cases in which a conflict of interest will or may arise;

(c) provision imposing requirements with respect to—

(i) the preparation and keeping by a person who acts as an insolvency practitioner of prescribed books, accounts and other records; and

(ii) the production of those books, accounts and records to prescribed persons;

(d) provision conferring power on prescribed persons—

(i) to require any person who acts or has acted as an insolvency practitioner to answer any inquiry in relation to a case in which he is so acting or has so acted; and

(ii) to apply to a court to examine such a person or any other person on oath concerning such a case;

(e) provision making non-compliance with any of the regulations a criminal offence; and

(f) such incidental, supplemental and transitional provisions as may appear to the Secretary of State necessary or expedient.

(2) Any power conferred by this Part to make regulations, rules or orders'.—[Mr. Fletcher.]

Clause 7

DUTY OF COURT TO DISQUALIFY UNFIT DIRECTORS OF INSOLVENT COMPANIES

Mr. Fletcher: I beg to move amendment No. 11, in page 5, line 20, leave out subsection (3).

Mr. Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take Government amendment No. 12, amendment No. 259, in page 5, leave out from line 33 to line 12 on page 6 and insert—

'(5) It shall be the duty—

(a) of the liquidator in the case of a company which is being wound up voluntarily; or

(b) of the official receiver in the case of a company which is being wound up in the court in England and Wales, to provide a written report to the Secretary of State to indicate whether or not it appears that the conduct of each person who was a director of that company at any time during the two years before liquidation has made him unfit to be concerned in management of a company.', and Government amendments Nos. 13, 14, 183, 184, 261, 262 and 199.

Mr. Fletcher: These amendments fulfil undertakings that I gave in Committee. Amendment No. 12 answers the concern expressed on behalf of directors, that they should not have the threat of being made subject to a disqualification order hanging over their heads indefinitely by preventing an application for a disqualification order being made more than two years after the company has become insoolvent — as defined by subsection (7) — unless the court gives leave for an application to be made out of time.

Amendment No. 199 to schedule 5 will enable rules to be prescribed regarding the reports required to be made about directors' conduct to the Secretary of State by the official receiver, the voluntary liquidator, the administrator or the administrative receiver. The rules will prescribe when he has to report, on which directors he has to report, and the form in which the report must be made. I hope that having explained the purpose of amendment No. 199 the hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) will not need to move amendment No. 259, which duplicates in part what amendment No. 199 will achieve.

I know the particular point that the hon. Gentleman will have in mind. It is that there should be an obligation on the liquidator and others to make the report. We are doing that in the rules because of the other considerations that are attached.

10.15 pm

In Committee concern was expressed by practitioners, and those speaking on behalf of creditors, particularly prepayment creditors, that the court should be required to have regard to the extent of a person's involvement in other insolvencies and also whether he was in any way responsible for the company's failure to meet its obligations to customers who had paid in advance for goods or services. That point was stressed by my hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Norris). We have therefore added two items to the schedule of matters that the court must take into consideration when determining whether a person's conduct makes him unfit to be a director of a company.

Amendment No. 185, which introduces paragraph 5A to schedule 2, will require the court to take into consideration the extent of a person's responsibility for the cause of any company of which he was a director becoming insolvent. Paragraph 5B of schedule 2 will require the court to take into consideration the extent of the director's responsibility for any failure on the part of the company to supply any goods or services which had been paid for in advance.

Finally, amendments Nos. 184, 261 and 262 are necessary to allow the schedule of matters that the court has to take into consideration when determining the unfitness of directors to be divided into those matters which are applicable in all cases where an application is made under clause 7 or clause 8 of the Bill and, in part II, those matters which, because of their nature, are applicable only when the company has become insolvent. An opportunity has been taken at the same time to divide further paragraph (b) of part II of the schedule to highlight a director's responsibility to ensure that not only he but his fellow directors comply with the requirements of clause 77 in respect of meetings of creditors in a voluntary winding up.

Mr. Gould: The Minister will recall that in the Committee discussion, which was substantial, great importance was attached by many hon. Members to the obligation being placed on the liquidator or the official receiver to make a report in each case on the conduct of the directors. The Minister will recall also that he was persuaded by that argument. I listened carefully to what he said. For the sake of my peace of mind and that of my hon. Friend the Member for St. Helens, South (Mr. Bermingham), who perhaps did not hear him, I ask him to give an assurance and make it perfectly clear that by virtue of amendment No. 199 and therefore the addition of that provision to the schedule, rules will be made to provide for the obligation resting on the liquidator and the official receiver.

Mr. Fletcher: I cannot give that assurance, but I shall explain the matter a little more. It was my desire to make the amendment on the face of the Bill rather than in the rules. As recently as yesterday afternoon, I spent a considerable amount of time on the matter.

Clause 7(5) requires the liquidator to report forthwith. When the liquidator has a positive report to make, we do not wish him to delay. We are not saying when he should do so, but we want it to be forthwith. When we consider two other aspects of timing and the fact that the liquidator has a duty to report in every case, it is better with regard to the form of the report and the timing to put that into the rules.

Let me explain briefly. There is a two-year limit on the amount of time that the liquidator has to make his report to the Secretary of State, so that the director of a company that has become insolvent will know that after two years, except by leave of the court, there is no likelihood of a disqualification order being made against him. At the same time, to minimise the number of times when the Secretary of State would be required to seek leave of the court, in the rules we are asking liquidators to give us their report in each case within 12 months. Those two timings, the laying down of the form in which we wish the reports to be made to the Secretary of State, and the provisions on the face of the Bill, with the need to report forthwith where there is a case for disqualification, require the amendment to make it clear that the provisions will be in the rules and not on the face of the Bill.

Mr. Norris: I am sure the Minister will be able to satisfy my concern in relation to this new apparent undertaking, just as he was able to satisfy the concern of the hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould). I took the matter of automatic reporting seriously. Without restating all the arguments made on Report, it is clear that automatic reporting does a lot more than merely fill up a lot of files at a Department of Trade and Industry. If that were its only purpose I would be the last to support it, but there is a significant purpose. Even a collection of mill reports in relation to one person might individually be of no substance, but collectively would be valuable information in relation to the other sections of the Bill. I regard automatic reporting as one of the key undertakings given by my right hon. Friend at Committee stage, and in going through these amendments I looked for it in vain. I am told by my hon. Friend that the form in which it appears in Government amendment No. 199 is as an addition to schedule 5. Schedule 5(21A) would then say, "(including, in particular, requirements with respect to the making of periodic returns).".

I understand that the expression "including in particular" by definition implies that other returns may be made. But this is an important return and is certainly not a periodic return, but one made specifically in the circumstances outlined in the amendment proposed not only by Opposition Members but by my hon. Friend the Member for Richmond and Barnes (Mr. Hanley) and by me. We want to make it quite clear in the Bill that a liquidator or an official receiver has and so on. That is a specific and important requirement and I am less than happy that it is deemed to be implicit in a section of an amendment to schedule 5 dealing with the making of periodic returns. If my hon. Friend can assure me that the point has been accepted in its entirety, I am sure that hon. Members on both sides will not wish to detain the House longer. I would be grateful if my hon. Friend would make that entirely clear, that this has nothing to do or cannot be confused with any other periodic returns that an liquidator or official receiver may be required to make.

Mr. Gould: As the author of the original amendment and of the subsequent laying down of this amendment, the point which worries me is that when I looked at Government amendment No. 199 I had not realised it referred back to section 7(5). What worries me is the use of the word periodic in Government amendment No. 199. Under the rules the cut back is from two years to one year. Is the Minister saying that within one year there must be a report from the liquidator? He shakes his head; therefore it must be that within two years that there must be a report from the liquidator. That does not solve the problem about which we sought and received an absolute undertaking in Committee. It now becomes a matter of honour. We had an undertaking and the system works on undertakings. The Minister spoke to me privately and I accepted what he said.

Mr. Fletcher: I am aware of the commitment made in Committee, and I agree entirely with what my hon. Friend said about the importance of this return. I have already confessed to the House that I am rather disappointed we are dealing with the matter in the rules, and I took some satisfying that we had to deal with it in that way and not on the face of the Bill. Government amendment No. 199 enables the Secretary of State to make detailed provisions about how insolvency practitioners should carry out their functions when reporting under clause 7(5). In particular we propose to set up a system for returns. At determined intervals practitioners will be required to submit a report on what they have done and what evidence of unfitness has been discovered about the directors of the company concerned during the period reported on. The Secretary of State will thus receive reports on all directors who have been involved in insolvency proceedings. The reports will form part of the data base which will gradually be built on all directors who have been involved in insolvency proceedings. That was one of the key matters that we considered in committee.

Mr. Bermingham: I am grateful for the Minister's intervention. As he said, in Committee it became a matter that was fundamental to the Committee, in the collective view of the Committee. It was the general consensus that a rogue or bad director needed to be located and identified as soon as possible so that the various other sanctions against rogue directors could be brought speedily to bear.

At the same time, it is equally right that directors who have no faults—who through adverse trading conditions, the collapse of the market or the collapse of a supplier — can find themselves directors of an insolvent company and should know as soon as possible that their explanation of why the company crashed has been accepted and that their names are clear. In humanitarian terms that is equally important—hence the insistence of hon. Members that brought the matter home in the amendment and in the undertaking.

If I understand the Minister correctly, amendment No. 199 now means that there will be periodic returns throughout the course of the liquidation, and in the questionnaires which the insolvency practitioners have to complete, whether they have been liquidators or receivers, there will be this definitive question about the directors and in each of the returns submitted during the course of the liquidation within the two-year period the same question will be repeated. It must be remembered that it is sometimes not at the beginning of the liquidation that the fault on the part of a director is found. It may come towards the termination of the liquidation, and the evidence suddenly begins to emerge. If the Minister will reassure the House that these questions which will form the data base of the information available to the Department will be repeated in each return throughout the course of the liquidation, I am sure that many——

Mr. Norris: I share the hon. Gentleman's concern. But was it ever in his mind when he moved amendment No. 22 in Committee that we should be talking about periodic returns? Where does this business of periodic returns come in? We are saying that in the course of a liquidation a liquidator sends a report to the Department of Trade and Industry saying, "I have looked at this chap and he is OK," or "he is not." It was said in Committee—and column 68 of the Official Report confirms this—that we were thinking in the vast majority of cases of no more than a nil return. That was the expression used. There is no mention there of a necessity for periodic returns. That is the cause of the concern which the hon. Member for St. Helens, South (Mr. Bermingham) is expressing and which is shared by a number of Government supporters.

Mr. Bermingham: I am grateful for that intervention. The use of the word "periodic" has prompted a certain question in my mind. If these returns are coming in at various times, what happens if in the first return it is said, "Clear," in the second it is said, "Clear," and in the third it is said, "There is less than clarity in the behaviour of the directors"? Where does that put the directors?

10.30 pm

Mr. Fletcher: The use of the word "periodic" has not helped the debate. We are talking about any period up to two years, but I mentioned earlier the time factors in our minds. The word "forthwith" provides immediacy in the Bill and when liquidators are filling in general returns and not making a charge of unfitness, they will be advised by the rules to let us have a report "as soon as possible".

The reason why I mentioned a period of 12 months is that if any action is to be taken on a report there will be a two-year limit on when the Secretary of State can make an application without leave of the court. Therefore, the 12-month and two-year periods should both be prescribed in the rules. However, there should be only one report on the directors in each liquidation, and not a series of reports.

Mr. Bermingham: I suggest that the removal of the word "periodic" might clarify the situation. The rules could show that at a specific date the liquidator has to return a form covering this matter. All of us will then know that what we sought in Committee has been achieved. The word "periodic" is confusing, and if it stays in the Bill all sorts of things will happen and we shall not get the clarity that we seek in ensuring that there will be a return about the conduct of a director in every case.

Mr. Gould: The debate has added to my anxieties. Amendment No. 199 specifies rules that could be made in respect of two types of return—a return under clause 7(5), which is clearly not the sort of return that we are talking about, because it relates to specific circumstances, and a periodic return, which is open to all the objections that hon. Members have spelt out. It is not clear to me what a periodic return is and why we should not simply talk about a return specific to each insolvency.

In any case, I am far from convinced that the Minister was right to be satisfied that there was no better way of handling the issue. I cannot see why it was not possible to provide that, having specified in clause 7(5) certain circumstances in which the liquidator must make a report forthwith, words such as "and in each other case shall make a report within two years on whether the directors involved conducted themselves properly" could not have been added. That would have included in the Bill the principle that we all regard as important and that should be given as much prominence as possible.

Mr. Hanley: Does the hon. Gentleman remember the contribution in Committee of my hon. Friend the Member for Tynemouth (Mr. Trotter) whose experience in insolvency matters was unrivalled? At our second sitting, my hon. Friend said that this issue was one of the most important practical matters to have been brought before the Committee up to that stage. My hon. Friend said that, although 95 to 98 per cent. of reports might have nothing to add, that was the basis of information that, after a repetition of "nothing to add" forms, might provide evidence of a suspicion of wrong behaviour. I am sure that if my hon. Friend the Member for Tynemouth were present today he would make as passionate a speech as he made in Committee. Unfortunately, he is absent on parliamentary business.

Mr. Gould: The hon. Gentleman is right. We all saw the importance of a mechanism by which a pattern of conduct could be identified and isolated.

The Minister would help the House if he expressed his understanding of our anxieties. I hope that the Minister will consider whether it is possible to put the provision in the Bill. I am confident that it is possible.

Mr. Fletcher: We agree that the liquidator shall report "forthwith". A report by the liquidator will be made in respect of every liquidation about the fitness of the directors. Part of our scheme is to keep on the database a record of those liquidators who make no returns. That is just a little help, but it might enable the Department over a period to say to a professional body that it is odd that Mr. X has been involved in 29 liquidations in the past 10 years but that no returns have been made. I know that the matter is not as simple as that, but since we plan a database that seems worthwhile.

I explain so that the House may understand that our intentions are more than honourable; they are practical. I spent some time considering whether it was possible to put this in the Bill, but for various reasons we decided to deal with the matter through the rules.

Mr. Norris: I am reassured by the spirited way in which my hon. Friend said that he intended to do what he said he would do, but I am concerned about the way in which he professes to have achieved that. I located amendment No. 259 in a long list, but I did not appreciate the true significance of amendment No. 199.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Ernest Armstrong): Order. The hon. Gentleman must not make another speech.

Mr. Norris: I stand corrected, but I want to ask the Minister a specific question. Clause 7(5) states that if the conditions are satisfied, the liquidator shall make a report. The point about clause 7 is that the liquidator shall have to take a qualitative decision. The Committee took exception to that and surely it must be corrected. Amendment No. 199 does not do that.

Mr. Fletcher: I am not sure that I understand my hon. Friend. Clause 7(5) makes it clear that the liquidator shall forthwith report when he believes that a disqualification application shall be made. That is clear. The amendment requires the liquidator to make a report in all cases.

Mr. Gould: If a liquidator refuses to make a report, how will the Minister persuade him that he has a statutory obligation to make a report? Perhaps that is what the word "periodic" means. If so, it is an ill-chosen word.

None of us has any objection to making additional provision in the rules about keeping a data record of liquidators' actions. That does not preclude the Minister from putting the basic principle in clause 7.

Mr. Millan: The use of the expression "periodic returns" is causing difficulty, especially as clause 7 refers to individual reports and not "periodic" returns. There is a limit to what we can do at this late stage of the legislation. It might help us if the Under-Secretary of State said that it would be possible to amend amendment No. 199 in the other place to take care of some of these matters. It would be helpful if he said "I shall look again at amendment No. 199. Perhaps we have not got it right. It is misleading or confusing". As I did not have the benefit of hearing the Committee's discussions, I think that that would help to clear matters up, to some extent at least.

Mr. Bermingham: Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. As I understand it, the right hon. Member for Glasgow, Govan (Mr. Millan) was intervening during the speech of the Under-Secretary of State. An hon. Member cannot intervene on an intervention. I thought that the Under-Secretary of State had not finished speaking.

Mr. Millan: The Under-Secretary of State has been up and down several times. I had not been on my feet until 30 seconds ago. I am not intervening.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. As I understand it, the Under-Secretary of State was making his speech and had not finished, and the right hon. Member for Govan was intervening.

Mr. Millan: That was not my understanding, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and I do not think that it was the understanding of the Under-Secretary of State either. If my hon. Friend the Member for St. Helens, South (Mr. Bermingham) will simply put his case to me, I shall resume my seat in a few seconds.

Mr. Bermingham: Does my right hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Govan (Mr. Millan) agree that the simplest solution would be to take out the words "periodic return" and insert the word "report"?

Mr. Millan: It would be. I suggested that the Under-Secretary of State might consider whether amendment No. 199 could be amended in the other place so that the wording is made clearer. If the hon. Gentleman does so, that might resolve some of our difficulties.

Mr. Fletcher: I do not think that there is anything wrong with amendment No. 199, but I shall certainly look at it again. If it needs to be amended, we shall do so in the other place, having described what we want to achieve.

On the more substantial point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Norris) via the hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould), concern has been expressed about the power of the Secretary of State to ensure that the liquidator carries out this duty. That is provided for in clause 7(6).

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment made: No. 12, in page 5, line 32, at end insert—

'(4A) Except with the leave of the court, an application for the making under this section of a disqualification order against any person shall not be made after the end of the period of two years beginning with the day on which the company of which that person is or has been a director became insolvent.'.—[Mr. Fletcher.]

Amendment 281, in page 28, line 10, after 'creditors', insert 'or employees'.

Amendment 282, in page 28, line 36, after 'creditors', insert 'or employees'.

Mr. Gould: We considered this group of amendments in Committee, and the Under-Secretary of State expressed some warmth about them. He undertook to consider them in a general sense. Predictably, he has not been able to accept the amendments, which were designed to impose upon the adminstrator the duty to pay some attention to the employment prospects of the work force in the company for which he was acting as liquidator. It imposed on him the duty to consult the work force at a number of stages during the carrying out of his functions as administrator.

The fact that the Under-Secretary of State has not been able to accept the thrust of the amendments that we are left in the familiar position where the potential failure of a company is seen almost exclusively — in my view, wrongly — as a balance to be struck between the interests of the directors and the creditors. The employees, whose livelihood are most likely to be directly at stake, are regarded as a side issue and not a central matter to be taken into account by those responsible for the company's future. Their jobs are regarded as of very little value compared with the debts owed to creditors and the future of the company. The paradox is that the administration procedure is designed to maximise the chances of survival of the company. In that undertaking there can be no more important body of people than the work force. Its co-operation is essential. It needs to be taken into the confidence of the administrator at the earliest possible moment and to be kept in his confidence throughout.

The Opposition regret that, although he expressed general sympathy, the Under-Secretary of State found it impossible to express it directly in the Bill. I do not intend to press this amendment to a Division, but many people outside the House will take this failure to recognise the importance of the work force as another indication that in the end the Government do not concern themselves to much with the jobs of ordinary people and that they are quite content to leave this area of the law as a battleground between the directors of companies and those who in many cases are trade creditors, sight being lost of the interests of the work force.

10.45 pm

Mr. Fletcher: I sympathise with the spirit of the amendments. I made that clear in Committee,. I can envisage obvious political attractions in flagging up the requirement that the administrator should consult the work force. However, having considered this matter in the cold light of the Department as distinct from the warmth of the Committee it does not appear to be very helpful. Amendment No. 271 could be harmful. It could introduce a potential conflict between the purposes for which adminstrators are to be appointed.

There are two fundamental issues. First, the new administration procedure is intended to promote the survival of companies as going concerns. Secondly, it is intended to secure the preservation of jobs. The purpose of amendment No. 271 is therefore implicit in all of the existing purposes for which administrators may be appointed. As for the remaining 11 amendments, the hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) knows that my view is that no administration will be successful unless the administrator enjoys the support of the employees. To achieve this support he must consult them and keep them informed. There may be cases where the employees of a company will be creditors; they will then have the rights of creditors in terms of formal consultations with the administrator.

The central point that I wish to underline is that the success of the procedure is the best safeguard for employees' jobs and that, attractive though the amendments of the hon. Member for Dagenham are, they would not improve that safeguard. I cannot therefore agree to the inclusion of something which, although it might appear to be attractive politically, would not serve a real purpose or have any real effect.

Mr. Bermingham: Once again the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State has proved that we were right. He warned us in Committee that we should not be too nice to him because it would harm his political career. Every time that we did our best to educate him he went back to his Department, of which we were highly critical. It poured cold water on this education and destroyed everything. The only thing to do is to move the Under-Secretary of State and to ignore the Department.

We are saying in the amendment that if there is any chance of saving a business the people we need to help us most are the employees; so why not put it on the face of the Bill? In Committee the Under-Secretary of State said that in theory it was a good and attractive idea and that he liked it. But what do we find when he returns to the Floor of the House? We find that the gremlins in the Department have got at him again. There seems to be an overwhelming objection on its part to anything sensible, humane and decent being put on the face of the Bill.

I said earlier that it is over 100 years since we had a Bill on insolvency. Joseph Chamberlain introduced the last one. It will be another 100 years before we have the next one. I fear that the gremlins in the Department in 100 years' time will again wreck the face of the Bill. We should be showing that it is the purpose of the insolvency law to save employment where we can, and that we think that the work force is important. That is not too much to ask.

The Minister says that it would be cosmetic and pretty. I say that it would be positive and attractive to the work force. It would show that this House believes that the people who work in industry are important, that their rights matter, that they will be protected, and that they will be given the courtesy of consultation. To achieve that, the Minister has only to bow gracefully to us—because he is at present some distance from the gremlins—in the warmth of this Chamber and accept the amendment. Then we can all go home thinking that he has done a fine job and finally overcome his own gremlins.

Mr. Gould: In the conviction that the arguments, if not the votes or the gremlins, are on our side, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 22

APPLICATION FOR ORDER

Mr. Fletcher: I beg to move amendment No. 20, in page 17, line 28, leave out 'charge or'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take Government amendments Nos. 23, 24, 26, 30, 32, 33, 35, 263, 37, 39 to 41, 50 to 56, 78, 102, 109, 115 to 117, 162, 163 and 167.

Mr. Fletcher: The 29 amendments in the group are drafting amendments which are designed to establish a single definition of what is meant by the term "security" in the Bill.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. Fletcher: I beg to move amendment No. 21, in page 17, line 31, leave out 'or'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take Government amendments Nos. 22, 27, 28, 31, 34, 38, 42 to 44, 46, 47, 111 and 112.

Mr. Fletcher: The purpose of this group of 14 amendments is to adapt the provisions of the Bill relating to the administrative procedure so that wherever possible they are capable of operating in relation to Scotland without separate and distinct provisions having to be made.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment made: No. 22, in page 17, line 32, after 'below', insert—

'or would be challengeable under section 615A or 615B of the 1985 Act or under any rule of law in Scotland.'.—[Mr. Fletcher.]

Clause 113

CREDITOR'S PETITION

Amendment proposed: No. 118, in page 91, line 15, leave out 'them' and insert 'the debts'. — [Mr. Fletcher.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this we shall consider Government amendments Nos. 119 to 121.

Mr. Bermingham: Amendment No. 121 would appear to make it impossible to present a bankruptcy petition as long as there is an outstanding application to set aside the statutory demand.

Should there not simply be a power to restrain the presentation of a petition when such an application is considered by the court to be genuine?

Mr. Fletcher: These amendments provide an extra condition before a creditor may present his petition against the debtor so that as well as having to exceed the bankruptcy level the petition may be presented only when the debt or debts are a liquidated sum, the debtor has no reasonable prospect of being able to pay the debt or debts and the court is not dealing with an application to set aside the demand. The last condition will ensure that when a debtor has applied to have a demand set aside—perhaps because the amount of the debt outstanding is being disputed—the creditor may not present a bankruptcy petition.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendments made: No. 119, in page 91, line 18, leave out second 'and '.

No. 120, in page 91, line 19, leave out 'them' and insert 'the debts'.

Clause 123

DEFINITION OF BANKRUPT'S ESTATE

11 pm

Mr. Gould: I beg to move amendment No. 283, in page 100, line 3, at end insert—

"(c) The bankrupt's only or main residence which is:

(i) a protected tenancy or restricted contract as defined in the Rent Act 1977;

(ii) a protected occupancy as defined in the Rent (Agriculture) Act 1976; or

(iii) a secure tenancy as defined in the Housing Act 1980 unless it is a tenancy to which Part II of the Landlord and Tenant Act 1954 applies."

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss Government amendments Nos. 140 to 147.

Mr. Gould: In Committee I mentioned the problem of the family home when the bankrupt—to take the most obvious example — was a council tenant. Under the existing law, the tenancy would vest in the trustee, but for no purpose. The only consequence of that would be that in many cases the bankrupt's family would lose its family home without a corresponding gain to the creditors.

The Minister kindly said that he understood my anxiety and undertook to try to do something about it, and he has tabled amendments Nos. 140 to 147, which are welcome so far as they go. I believe that the Minister has fulfilled his undertaking to try to find a solution to the problem. However, I wonder whether he could be prevailed upon to go a little further. The problem is that in each case the tenancies will still vest in the trustee, although in most cases the tenancy will be of no value.

The trustee or the official receiver may then disclaim the tenancy under clause 154. That will improve the tenant's position, but many tenants will not understand what is going on unless they receive clear notice of the disclaimer. In many cases they will not have proper advice. They may not be able or ready to act within the 14 days that they are given. There is a grave danger that, merely because many of the people about whom we are worried will not have access to proper advice and will be completely confused by being caught up in the proceedings, they will lose their homes for no good reason.

I ask the Minister whether he considered, and, if so, what was the outcome of his consideration, if it were possible to prevent the vesting of the tenancy in some defined circumstances. That would be a neater and more foolproof solution to the problem. That is what amendment No. 283 is designed to achieve.

I am advised that there may be a serious technical problem with the amendment, but if the Minister does not take that seriously I wonder whether he would accept in principle that it may be a better approach and may meet the point that we both want to achieve.

Mr. Fletcher: The difficulty is that if a blanket exemption were provided for all tenancies there would have to be a reserve power to enable trustees to claim tenancies which were of value to the estate.

As a third party—the landlord—would be involved, the claiming would have to be done through the court. That could involve considerable trouble for the trustee and expense to the estate. We do not have evidence that a substantial number of people suffer hardship under the present system sufficient to justify a radical change such as the hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) suggests. We must also remember that he said that people involved in this matter may not always have the benefit of proper advice. Bearing that in mind, we cannot avoid the fact that the tenancy may be of value to the estate and that there is a third party involved.

Mr. Gould: I am a little worried about the Minister's point that not many people are involved. We do not know how many people may be involved, but if a technically satisfactory solution could be arrived at, surely it would be worth helping a handful of people. I am not convinced that the numbers are material. The Minister should consider whether it is possible to find a satisfactory solution which would avoid hardship for the families of some bankrupts.

Mr. Fletcher: I agree that there may be some hardship, but there is no evidence available and I do not believe that the fact that there were many such cases was brought out elsewhere. I do not think that there is sufficient evidence to justify the blanket exemption that the hon. Member suggests.

Mr. Gould: The Housing Aid Trust which has advised me on this matter believes that it is serious. I imagine that it would be happy to provide the Minister with the evidence. I wonder whether the Minister would reconsider the matter in the light of any evidence that that organisation provided. On that understanding, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendments made: No. 128, in page 100, line 20 leave out 'is so exercisable'.

Clause 157

MUTUAL CREDIT AND SET OFF

Mr. Fletcher: I beg to move amendment No. 148, in page 126, line 26 at end insert—

'(2A) Sums due from the bankrupt to another party shall not be included in the account taken under subsection (2) above if that other party had notice at the time they became due that a bankruptcy petition relating to the bankrupt was pending.'.

This amendment creates an exception to clause 157(2) of the Bill and re-enacts, in terms appropriately modified to take account of the abolition of acts of bankruptcy by the Bill, the exception currently contained in section 31 of the Bankruptcy Act 1914. It has been represented to us that abuse against the concept of equality of treatment of creditors could occur if the relevant part of section 31 of the 1914 Act is not re-enacted. We agree with this.

Mr. Bermingham: Although I welcome this amendment as a step in the right direction it seems that the gremlins have begun on the right road. Unfortunately, they did not follow the tram tracks to the end of the tunnel. This is exactly the same case with regard to preference. If one knows that someone is going bankrupt, there are ways to gain preference. This good amendment seeks to guard against that happening, but the same thing can happen in company liquidations, deeds of assessment, voluntary arrangements and receiverships. I merely ask the Minister to take on board what I, and practitioners who have advised me, say: having got onto the right tracks, perhaps he would push the train a little further down so as to remove the preference in all other liquidations and receiverships.

Amendment agreed to.

TRANSACTIONS AT AN UNDERVALUE AND PREFERENCES

Amendments made: No. 150, in page 133, line 25, leave out subsection (7) and insert—

'(7) Subject to subsections (7A) and (9) below, the time at which an individual enters into a transaction at an undervalue or gives a preference is a relevant time for the purposes of this section if the transaction is entered into or the preference is given—

(a) in the case of a transaction at an undervalue, at a time in the period of five years ending with the day of the presentation of the bankruptcy petition on which that individual is adjudged bankrupt;

(b) in the case of a preference which is not a transaction at an undervalue and is given to a person who is an associate of that individual, at a time in the period of two years ending with that day; and

(c) in any other case of a preference which is not a transaction at an undervalue, at a time in the period of six months ending with that day.

(7A) Where an individual enters into a transaction at an undervalue or gives a preference at a time mentioned in paragraph (a) or (b) of subsection (7) above, not being, in the case of a transaction at an undervalue, a time less than two years before the end of the period mentioned in the said paragraph (a), that time shall not be a relevant time for the purposes of this section unless the individual—

(a) is insolvent at that time; or

(b) becomes insolvent in consequence of the transaction or preference;

but the requirements of this subsection shall be presumed to be satisfied, unless the contrary is shown, in relation to any transaction at an undervalue which is entered into by an individual with a person who is an associate of his.'.

Mr. Fletcher: I beg to move amendment No. 164, in page 162, line 4 leave out 'that is being wound up'

and insert

'which is being wound up or in relation to which an administration order is in force'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss Government amendments Nos. 165 and 166.

Mr. Fletcher: In moving these amendments, I am indebted to the hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) and my hon. Friend the Member for Tynemouth (Mr. Trotter), who moved similar amendments in respect of voluntary arrangements in Committee. This action confirmed the views that had been expressed to us by representatives of the main accounting bodies that a supervisor of a voluntary arrangement, whether individual or corporate, and an administrator should enjoy similar powers to those enjoyed by a trustee or liquidator in attacking transactions which have reduced the value of assets available for creditors and others. The amendments will achieve that aim, and I commend them to the House.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendments made: No. 165, in page 162, line 6, after 'liquidator', insert 'or administrator'.

No. 166, in page 162, line 8, leave out from 'transaction' to end of line 13 and insert—

'(b) in a case where a person who is, or is capable of being, prejudiced by the transaction is bound by a composition or scheme approved under Chapter II of Part II or Chapter I of Part III of this Act, by the supervisor of the composition or scheme or by any person who (whether or not so bound) is, or is capable of being, so prejudiced; or

(c) in any other case, by a person who is, or in capable of being, so prejudiced; and an application made under any of the preceding paragraphs in relation to a transaction shall be treated as made on behalf of every person who is, or is capable of being, prejudiced by the transaction.'.

No. 260, in page 163, line 9, leave out 'individual in question' and insert 'relevant person'.

Schedule 4

PREFERENTIAL DEBTS

Mr. Gould: I beg to move, amendment No. 268, in page 181, line 1, leave out 'twelve' and insert 'six'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take amendment No. 269, in page 181, line 17, leave out 'twelve' and insert 'six'.

No. 285, in page 181, line 27, leave out 'twelve' and insert 'six'.

No. 270, in page 181, line 32, leave out 'twelve' and insert 'six'.

Government amendment No. 190, in page 183, line 17, leave out 'twelve' and insert 'six'.

Mr. Gould: Only an hour ago, although it seems much longer, the Minister was claiming credit for reducing the ambit of Government preference. These amendments give him the opportunity to claim yet more credit, and I hope that he will seize it with alacrity.

More importantly, the amendments seek to achieve what is universally accepted as being a sensible uniformity of provision in this type of taxation. Having reduced the period of VAT preference to six months, a Minister in the other place went on record as saying that the rule should be the same for VAT as for PAYE and national insurance contributions. The Minister will be familiar with the arguments, which we rehearsed at some length in Committee. These amendments offer him another opportunity to carry out that simple principle. Once we have a six-month period for VAT, it is nonsense to have a different period for the other collector taxes.

Mr. Hanley: I remind the hon. Gentleman that this gives my hon. Friend the Minister another chance to agree with the Institue of Chartered Accountants in Scotland.

Mr. Gould: I am not sure that that point has all the force that the hon. Gentleman feels that it should have, given the experience that we all suffered on an earlier amendment, when he used a similar argument, which was brusquely rejected by the Minister. The arguments are familiar, and the Minister's reply may be familiar, but we at least live in hope.

Mr. Millan: I strongly support this series of amendments. It is nonsense that the Government, having conceded the six-month period on VAT, are unwilling to concede it on PAYE. The Minister, as my hon. Friend the Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) has reminded us, has said that the Government have been generous to make all these concessions, but every concession has been squeezed out of them. They were reluctant to make any concessions on Government preference, but because of the pressure when the Bill was in the other place and in Committee, certain concessions have been made. Similar arguments have been made about the Bankruptcy (Scotland) Bill, which has been going through simultaneously. We welcome the Government concessions on VAT in Committee.

However, the Government's intention was to have VAT and PAYE treated on the same basis—that was how the Bill was drafted, and there is logic in that. There is now no reason why, having conceded the six-month period for VAT, the Government should not make a similar concession on PAYE.

It is not appropriate at this time of night to go over the arguments in detail, or even in principle. There must be a genuine concern among all those who are concerned in these matters, whether professionally or as Members of Parliament, about the position of small creditors in particular. There is a desire to reduce the preference of Crown creditors, in the interests of ordinary creditors who, in many a typical case, will be small firms for which the bankruptcy or liquidation of a debtor can be extremely serious. Even with the six-month period, the Crown will have a considerable preference that is not available to ordinary creditors. It would be logical and in the interests of small creditors if the Government would concede the six-month period for PAYE in the way that they have accepted it for VAT.

Mr. Fletcher: The right hon. Member for Glasgow, Govan (Mr. Millan) and the hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) think that the Government have been reluctant in these matters. I confess that we did not table such amendments ourselves. Indeed, that is not likely ever to happen from these Benches on such matters. Nevertheless, I listened to the arguments objectively and constructively, and it was decided that the Government could give way. We have given way to a large extent on Crown preference. The following amendment confirms the extent to which the Government have given way on VAT.

Throughout our proceedings there has been a misunderstanding on pay-as-you-earn. It appeared in the Cork report, in the debates in the other place, and even in Committee and again this evening. The misunderstanding relates to the idea that PAYE is of a term similar to VAT. There is no question that PAYE has a 12-month accounting cycle, and that payments made during the year are paid to account, but the balancing of the book is done at the end of the year.

The hon. Member for Dagenham said that his arguments were familiar and that he expected to hear familiar ones from me. At least in that respect he has not been disappointed.

Mr. Gould: I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. As all the remaining amendments that are selected are Government amendments, unless any hon. Member wishes to raise any matters, with the leave of the House I shall put them together.

Order for Third Reading read.—[Queen's Consent, on behalf of the Crown, and Prince of Wales's Consent, signified.]

11.15 pm

Mr. Fletcher: I beg to move, That the Bill be now read the Third time.

We have made a contribution to the many problems raised during the debates in this House and the other place. I am satisfied that the Committee in particular contributed substantially to the quality of the legislation. As I do not wish to embarrass Labour Members, may I say quietly that I am grateful for their constructive approach. I hope that that augurs well for the legislation on financial services, which the Government hope to introduce next Session. I am also extremely grateful to my hon. Friends who were equally objective and constructive in proceeding with the legislation.

The Government set out with many objectives, which have been debated. However, I am happy to say that we still have licensed insolvency practitioners. We have fresh powers to disqualify unfit directors, powers to reduce limited liability through wrongful trading, and a new, helpful and constructive administration procedure. I hope that insolvency practitioners and the commercial world generally will find the Bill greatly advantageous to them. I hope that the poor bankrupts who find themselves in trouble over a relatively small sum will find the new simplified procedures helpful.

Mr. Gould: The Minister's generous remarks are typical of the good humour with which both the Committee and the House have dealt with the Bill. Just as he thanked his hon. Friends, I should like to thank mine, particularly my hon. Friend the Member for St. Helens, South (Mr. Bermingham) for the great support and work that he has done in Committee and throughout the Bill's passage.

None of those agreeable aspects of the Bill's proceedings will deter me from making one final point that I am sure the Minister would expect me to make. We have had to deal with the Bill in the most difficult of circumstances. Some of his hon. Friends totalled up the number of amendments made throughout the proceedings, and came to the grand total of 1,000. I confess that I did not do that sum, but it is true that we had over 400 Government amendments in Committee and another 200 on Report. That is virtually unprecedented, and even more remarkable when one considers that we are dealing with a Bill on a subject that has been under consideration since 1977. One cannot help but think that something went wrong somewhere and that the consultation procedures were inadequate for presenting a Bill of this complexity. The consequence was that the parliamentary procedures for scrutinising this important and complex measure were stretched virtually to breaking point. At times some of us felt almost overwhelmed by the volume of amendments and new clauses. I am sure that even the Minister found it difficult at times to keep pace with what was happening.

The consequence of that is that, while the Minister is right in saying that the Committee can take credit for having improved the Bill, the Bill is still not — and I am sure that my hon. Friends agree with me in this respect — in as good shape as it should have been. We have done what we can in the time available and with the resources available to us, but in the end the Bill still needs considerable amendment. It is unfortunate that we may yet again have to rely on another place to achieve that further refinement of the Bill. If that is so, I fear that the Government have no one but themselves to blame. On the other hand, the Minister is both generous and correct when he says that the Committee has done a good job. I hope that in that respect at any rate we have made it a better Bill than it was when it came to us.

Mr. Hanley: I must crave the indulgence of the House while I make a few remarks on Third Reading.

I do not apologise for doing so, because I believe that there should be on the record certain matters that have not been discussed tonight. My hon. Friend the Minister has listened hard, often and widely. I know that we are all grateful for that. We are grateful for the careful consideration that he has given to our pleas and the careful consultation that he has gone into, particularly with his officials. If only that consultation had happened before report or even Third Reading, perhaps 1,000 Government amendments would not have been necessary. Maybe there would have been 1,000 paragraphs in a working party report. On this Bill, the case for a draft Bill on a technical matter has been proved.

I am grateful to my hon. Friend for the progress that we have made on preferential creditors. He is right in saying that the Government should be congratulated on trying to help small unsecured creditors. It was the Government's initiative that helped in removing corporation tax, and particularly the pernicious charge of local authority rates. Indeed, tonight the Government could have reversed the progress that we had all made on VAT being brought down from 12 to six months. The Government deserve some credit for accepting the Committee's view. In doing so, the Government will greatly help small firms that are creditors of those who go into liquidation.

Therefore, we should be grateful for many small mercies in the Bill. However, on the record should be certain matters on which my hon. Friend the Minister and the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, my hon. Friend the Member for Rossendale and Darwen (Mr. Trippier), agreed to come back to the Committee, having considered them. If the Bill is going to another place, we should put those matters to it.

First, on clause 7 the Minister undertook to consider whether provision with regard to the frequency of misconduct should be incorporated in a practice direction or in the rules. If the Government have dealt with any of those matters, I am sure that they will understand that it is difficult to find them in the vast volume of amendments.

Secondly, my hon. Friend the Minister said that he would consider provisions to enable a disqualified director who had been rehabilitated to apply to have the disqualification terminated. That is in clause 13. In clause 34 the Minister said he would consider making it a requirement for information to be given to the workforce. That has been mentioned tonight, but there was no progress. In clause 68, the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, my hon. Friend the Member for Rossendale and Darwen (Mr. Trippier), agreed to reconsider whether early dissolution should occur where an administrative procedure is in place. In clause 70 the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State — my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, Central (Mr. Fletcher) — said that he would investigate the concern of the hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) about there being no provision to deal with the possible lack of a quorum at the final meeting.

In clause 81, the hon. Member said that he would consider the suggestion by the hon. Member for St. Helens, South (Mr. Bermingham) that deposit payments should have preferential status. That was discussed tonight, but it is still a matter of major concern. In clause 97, my hon. Friend the Minister agreed to consider from my hon. Friend the Member for Tynemouth (Mr. Trotter) that the appointment of an administrative receiver should be recognised with regard to floating charges. In clause 105, he agreed to consider the suggestion by the hon. Member for St. Helens, South that the court should have power to give a direction about dealings with assets during the period of an interim order.

You will be pleased to hear, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that there are not many more, but I want them on the record. In clause 108 the Minister agreed to think about the suggestion by the hon. Member for Tynemouth that courts should have power to make a bankruptcy order immediately if attempts to have a voluntary agreement fail with regard to the decision of creditors meetings.

Mr. Fletcher: Where we were able to table an amendment in accordance with commitments, we did so. Where we could not, we wrote. I certainly wrote to hon. Members explaining why we could not follow up commitments that I had given in Committee.

Mr. Hanley: Many of these matters raised in Committee were of interest to more than the hon. Member who raised them. Having heard that assurance from the Minister, I should be very grateful if I could have sight of some of the letters, and I will undertake to the Minister to write to the hon. Gentleman concerned and ask for such information. I am merely trying to put these on the record so that the other place may consider them. I am about two thirds of the way through my list, and if their lordships are sitting on the edges of their red lined benches dying to know the other items, I will in turn write to them and give them the other seven items about which I have had no response.

Mr. Bermingham: For the last time in this Bill, I will come to the aid of the Minister and reassure the House that

I received a letter in respect of each and every one of the matters I raised, and the letters were both helpful and explanatory. I am sure that my hon. Friend the Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) will join with me when I say how grateful I am to the Minister for the way he replied in these matters.

We leave this Bill as we began it. It has taken 100-plus years to get this far in improving insolvency law, but perhaps we have laid a few markers on the road. I hope it will not be another 100 years before we begin to develop the ideas in the Bill, many of which were canvassed in Committee. Parliamentary draftsmen often say, "It cannot be done," but where there is a will there is a way. The markers are on the road and many of us who took part in the debate on the Committee stage of this Bill know well where we want those markers to take us.

We say gently to this Government and to successive Governments that once this Bill goes into operation and flaws are found, those of us who are interested in the subject will bring those flaws back for correction. We all want to have a civilised insolvency law to remove the cruelty of the Riley case. We want to be able to catch and stop the war referred to tonight, or stone the gnome as I kept referring to it in Committee. If we are going to do that, we have to accept that insolvency law must develop with changing times, with the changing concepts in industry, and with changing methods in the service industry. It cannot be allowed to stay the same from 1880 until 1980 or from 1914 until 1985. We have to update the law, and we have to take on board the new ideas, commercial and otherwise, that exist.

For all those who served on the Standing Committee, the Bill has been an interesting exercise. I hope that for those who have had to listen to us it has not been too boring an exercise. To those who helped members of the Committee from without this place and in the various professional bodies we all owe a deep debt of thanks. Much of what we portrayed in the Committee came from their advice and guidance, and it is right that we should place on the record our gratitude for the great help that we get, which is voluntarily and freely given to us.

Perhaps the House of Lords can push the Bill just a little further down the tram tracks, and perhaps the gremlins will not get in the way too much.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill read the Third time and passed, with amendments.

STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS, &C.

Motion made, and Question put forthwith pursuant to Standing Order No. 79(5) (Standing Committees on Statutory Instruments, &c.).

Question agreed to.

DISCHARGES OF DANGEROUS SUBSTANCES

Motion made, and Question put forthwith pursuant to Standing Order No. 80(5) (Standing Committees on European Community documents).

That this House takes note of European Community Document No. 4519/85, a proposal for a Council directive on the discharge of certain dangerous substances into water, and affirms the need for a Directive to deal with pollution by substances meeting the List I criteria set out in Council Directive 76/464/EEC, and which requires monitoring for the levels of those substances in the aquatic environment, irrespective of source.—[Mr. Boscawen.]

Question agreed to.

Mr. Michael Starrs (Mobility Allowance)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn. — [Mr. Boscawen.]

11.32 pm

Mr. Tom Clarke (Monklands, West): I am particularly grateful for this opportunity to debate the case of Michael Starrs, and I welcome the interest which the Minister's Department has shown and look forward to the hon. Gentleman's response.

Michael Starrs is a father, aged 47. Clearly he is very severely disabled and an extremely ill man. Until his first serious illness struck in 1965, the year when a fateful operation for a duodenal ulcer was performed, Michael was extremely fit and far from work shy. As a national service man, he served in the 15/19 King's Royal Hussars in Northern Ireland in the late 1950's. Apart from that period, and until his illness, he worked as an apprentice and then as a welder in Tolleross foundry.

Prior to his illness, Michael's average weight was 10 stone 7 pound. Now it is just 8 stone. He has twice applied for mobility allowance and had been refused on both occasions.

Tonight I have to ask the Minister why and, grateful though I am that the hon. Gentleman is present to reply to the date, I have to tell him that I shall listen very carefully, as will my constituents, to his reply, because it is a case which has baffled many people and continues to baffle me.

I have to ask the Minister why there should be a refusal in the case of a man who is qualified for and has been given a wheelchair by the National Health Service, presented by Belvedere hospital. Why should there be a refusal in the case of a man who was informed by letter on 8 March 1983 by the Ministry of Transport that the restricted condition of his legs meant that his driving licence would cover hand controls only? Why should a man who is fed intravenously or who is otherwise dependent on baby food or a liquid diet be judged so harshly? Why, when a man suffers from such obvious fatigue that his walking is considerably impaired and when it would be cruel in the extreme to make demands beyond his present limited capacity, is this not taken into account?

Those questions are also being asked by my constituents, 3,500 of whom have petitioned me to insist on a full inquiry into the whole of Michael Starrs' case, including his medical history, and some of those people themselves receive mobility allowance. Some of them are the same constituents who got together in a local social club and presented Michael with a hand-controlled car, which gives him the little comfort that he has when he can afford to run it.

Last year the local newspaper in my constituency, the Airdrie and Coatbridge Advertiser, published a prominent article headed

"Michael's 19 years of hell."

It reflected, quite properly, the views of those in my community and strong views generally that those involved in social security have not yet found a satisfactory conclusion.

In March 1965, at the age of 26 years, Michael was admitted to Hairmyres hospital, East Kilbride. He underwent an operation for a duodenal ulcer. From that date until now he has never had a normal meal because his digestive system cannot cope with one. As it was not in his nature to be voluntarily without work, he applied for and was given a light job in the Gartcosh strip mill from 1965 to 1970. However, even that became too much for him and his consultant wrote to British Steel and told them so. After a lengthy period as an out patient and sometimes as a in-patient, yet another operation, the third in all, took place in 1970 to deal with the complications which had arisen from the earlier operation in 1965. It is a matter of medical history that a piece of silk, which lingered from Michael's first encounter with surgery, had to be removed. Michael tried to resume work but found that his condition had deteriorated so badly that he experienced a burning sensation every time that he attempted to swallow, a condition which persists to this day.

Michael finally accepted early redundancy and left his employment with £800 for his 20 years' service. With that he was left to face the future. Michael has existed on invalidity benefit since then. It is not surprising that his faith in social services has been somewhat shattered. Astonishing though it may seem, in 1976 he was called before a medical tribunal and his invalidity benefit was discontinued. He appealed to the health commissioner, who restored it. That establishes that tribunals are not always right, and certainly have not been so in Michael's case.

The first tribunal that heard Michael's application for mobility allowance sat on 13 October 1980. It concluded:

"We have considered the evidence and observed the claimant walking out of doors. He walks slowly with a hesitant gait and with the aid of a stick but without apparent pain or severe discomfort."

The best person to make a judgment on his ability to walk and his discomfort is Michael. On that evidence, which is supported by all who know him, there is and has been considerable discomfort. I find it incredible that the tribunal could have reached such a conclusion.

I gave evidence at the second tribunal hearing in January. It had before it a great deal of information, including the opinion of Dr. Ian Bone, a consultant neurologist, who said:

"He walks in an extraordinary manner, bent forward as though walking on a treadmill. The walking is symmetrically abnormal but becomes more bizarre when the stick is held in the left hand. On general examination, he is a small emaciated man."

Having heard the evidence and made my contribution to the tribunal, I believe that my constituent suffered in the conclusions reached because of aconflict of medical evidence about his condition. There were several diagnoses from various doctors. Doctor No. 1 said that Michael suffered from multiple sclerosis, doctor No. 2 said that it was

"post-gastric surgery debility ataxia" and a third doctor concluded that Michael's condition was caused by a psychosomatic illness.

The doctor who knows most about the case is Mr. Starrs' own medical practitioner, Dr. Edward McCabe, a man who does not use words lightly and thinks carefully before he reaches a conclusion and offers it for consideration. He said:

"Mr. Starrs suffers from a difficulty in locomotion which I feel qualifies him for a mobility allowance."

That is the unreserved view of a doctor who knows Michael and has seen the condition develop and Michael's health deteriorate.

Unfortunately, the tribunal did not share that opinion. It concluded:

"We have observed the claimant walking a distance in excess of 100 yards outside. The claimant can walk such a distance, as was confirmed by Mr. Clarke, slowly and gingerly with frequent short pauses for no apparent reason and without any evidence of distress."

I found that conclusion astonishing and I regret to have to say that it was a distortion of the evidence that I gave. I made it clear that on a very cold winter's morning I walked 100 yards with Michael Starrs and I had to stop with him on five or six occasions. He was unable to continue and was caused considerable distress. I was cold and Michael, in his condition, must have felt much colder. How the tribunal could have reached that conclusion is a mystery which still invites an explanation.

I have discussed all the papers in the case and the facts known to me with my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Wythenshawe (Mr. Morris), who introduced the legislation that provided the mobility allowance. He would have spoken in the debate, but unfortunately he has to be out of the country on parliamentary business. However, he has encouraged me to say that he finds it astonishing that Michael Starrs has not been given a mobility allowance. He would have supported my case, and I find that support a great comfort.

On the basis of the evidence in this case, there must be a suspicion that applicants for the allowance, at least in Scotland, if not elsewhere, are being subjected to more stringent tests than many people would feel are desirable. I know of the independence of adjudication authorities, yet there is a clear injustice in the case of Michael Starrs and it worries me that similar injustices might be occurring in other cases.

If the Minister tells the House that he cannot intervene in the case, there will be considerable disquiet amounting, yes, to disgust in Coatbridge and throughout my constituency.

I invite the Minister to share my contempt for the procedures which have condemned Michael Starrs to immobility and dependence whereas with the allowance which the thousands of people who know him think he should have he could be mobile and independent.

I cannot believe that a man and his family who are experiencing such stress and pressure will not be compelled later to make even greater demands upon the National Health Service. No saving is made by not granting the allowance.

I say to the Minister and to the adjudicating authorities that I cannot accept their view. I cannot accept that Michael Starrs should be treated in this way. The fight will continue beyond this debate.

I sought the opportunity to ensure that we had an Adjournment debate on the issue because I profoundly believe that the case speaks for itself and invites correction. I should be delighted if the Minister responded positively, not just in the interest of Michael Starrs and his family, important though that is, but in the interests of humanity.

11.45 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health and Social Security (Mr. Ray Whitney): I am grateful to the hon. Member for Monklands, West (Mr. Clarke) for raising the case tonight. I congratulate him on the eloquence and sincerity with which he put the case. He has pursued Mr. Starrs' claim for mobility allowance with great assiduity for some time.

It will be no surprise to the hon. Gentleman to learn that great as my sympathy is for Mr. Starrs and his difficulties, I cannot make any decision on his claim. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will understand.

The reason is that mobility allowance claims, in common with claims for other social security benefits, are decided by independent adjudicating authorities. An adjudication officer examines a case in the light of a medical report prepared by a doctor, in the first instance. If the claimant appeals, a medical board reconsiders the case. There is a further right of appeal to a medical appeal tribunal whose decision is final on the medical questions.

I accept that mistakes can be made at any stage in that process and changes in decisions can be made. However, over many years under all Governments the independent nature of the adjudicating authorities has been preserved. Ministers cannot intervene. I recognise the hon. Gentleman's argument about the view of a particular doctor, but I hope that he will accept that the views which we collect through the medical appeal tribunal system offer a wide range of experience and knowledge which must be accepted as being valid.

A decision by a medical appeal tribunal can be challenged only by way of an appeal on a question of law to the Social Security Commissioner. Neither Ministers nor officials of the Department can decide claims, nor can they alter or try to affect decisions given by those authorities.

Before I deal with the specific case of Mr. Starrs it might be helpful if I explain briefly the medical qualifying conditions for the allowance.

Mr. Clarke: At the second tribunal the chairman was Queen's Counsel. If Michael Starrs appeals, can he be represented by a Queen's Counsel and have legal aid?

Mr. Whitney: I would need to write to the hon. Gentleman on that precise point. Mr. Starrs has the right of appeal, but I would not want to mislead the House on the detail.

The medical qualifying conditions were set out in 1976. The hon. Member for Monklands, West referred to his colleague the right hon. Member for Manchester, Wythenshawe (Mr. Morris), who was intimately connected with the introduction of the benefit in 1976. Careful consideration was given to the conditions in the light of the resources available and the need to provide a cash allowance which would be a worthwhile contribution towards the additional expenses which disabled people incur in getting about. It was decided that the allowance should be available to those severely disabled people who are unable, or virtually unable, to walk due to physical disablement.

Virtual inability to walk is not defined in the legislation, but regulations lay down the kind of factors that are to be taken into account in assessing a claimant's walking ability. These include the distance a claimant can walk and the speed, length of time and manner in which he can make progress without severe discomfort.

I must emphasise that the adjudicating authorities are responsible for the interpretation of these conditions and for their application in individual cases. They can, for instance, decide that a mental handicap has a physical cause or that its effect is to produce a physical disablement but the test for the allowance remains one of walking ability.

[Mr. Whitney]

The first claim by Mr. Starrs was received on 13 October 1980. The decisions, in turn, of the insurance officer, medical board and the medical appeal tribunal were that he was not unable or virtually unable to walk and thus not entitled to the allowance. He was refused leave to appeal against the decision of the medical appeal tribunal on a question of law by both the medical appeal tribunal and the social security commissioner.

Mr. Starrs subsequently made a fresh claim for the allowance which was received on 1 June 1983. Again, an insurance officer, medical board and medical appeal tribunal, in turn, decided that he was not unable or virtually unable to walk. He has now sought leave to appeal to the social security commissioner on a question of law and we currently await the decision of the medical appeal tribunal chairman on this application. If such leave is refused, Mr. Starrs will still have the opportunity of seeking leave direct from the commissioner.

The hon. Gentleman will thus see that a final decision has not, as yet, been given on the claim made by Mr. Starrs and I cannot, of course, anticipate the likely outcome.

The question whether the qualifying conditions are satisfied are considered as at the date on which the claim is received by the Department. If Mr. Starrs considers that his walking ability has become worse since he made his last claim, it is open to him to make a fresh claim which will be considered in the light of his walking ability at the time that it is received.

I recognise that Mr. Starrs' case had taken a long time to resolve. It is inevitable that such cases should be protracted because of the importance both for the claimant and the Department of gathering all the facts, of obtaining medical reports and of considering all the evidence carefully. However, we have been concerned about the length of time cases like Mr. Starrs' take and we have been considering what we can do to speed up the process of adjudicating on claims. I am glad that we have made some progress, although there is more to do.

Mr. Starrs' claim has not beeen finally decided. He has applied for leave to appeal to the social security commissioner against refusal of mobility allowance. In any case, if the decision goes against him and Mr. Starrs believes that he now satisfies the criteria, he can apply again.

I have carefully noted the points made by the hon. Member for Monklands, West and shall write to him on the specific point he raised. He has argued Mr. Starrs' claim cogently and effectively. I shall note his continuing interest and keep closely in touch with him about this case. The lessons that may be learnt about the handling of this case will be taken to heart by the Department.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at six minutes to Twelve o'clock.

PRAYERS

[MR. SPEAKER in the Chair]

Top Salaries Review Body

9.34 am

Mr. Roy Hattersley (Birmingham, Sparkbrook): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I wish to ask for your advice, and for your protection of the House. You will recall that yesterday afternoon, after Prime Minister's Question Time, the Government announced their attitude towards top pay in the Civil Service, the armed forces and the judiciary, and did so suddenly and three days earlier than the press had been allowed to believe.

The Opposition have pressed the Government to make a statement on this matter, not least because it has implications that go far wider than the 2,000 men and women involved. Questions on this subject need to be answered, in the national interest. I give one example. We need to know what the Government believe will be the effect of a 30 per cent. increase in the salary of the permanent secretary at the Department of Education and Science on the prospect of the teachers accepting a pay increase of 6 per cent. or a little more. Such questions are vital for the nation.

The Government have refused point blank to make such a statement and I ask you, Mr. Speaker, what recourse Opposition parties, and Parliament in general, have, and how we can ask the Government to do what is clearly necessary.

Mr. Eric Forth (Mid-Worcestershire): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. It was an answer to my question that gave the Government's reaction. I need time to reflect on the wealth of detail in the answer given by the Prime Minister yesterday. I hope that the Government will not rush into an early statement and force me and the rest of the House to give an ill-considered reaction to this most important point. I urge the Government to give me time to think about it.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. Do you recall that a fortnight and a day ago, at business questions, I asked about a statement on top salaries? We have just had a statement about teachers' pay from the Secretary of State for Education and Science. I suggested that it would be a good idea if, on the next occasion that we had a statement about the paltry offer being made to the teachers, it could be followed by a statement on the Government's attitude towards top pay, including the £24,000 that is being given to Sir Robert Armstrong, the Secretary to the Cabinet. He is one of the advisers to the Government on how to tell people to keep their wages down.

When I put that question to the Leader of the House, I got the clear impression that the Government would take the point on board. Yesterday the Government deliberately got a question planted to prevent the matter from being debated openly in the House. While Tory Members of Parliament were upstairs in Committee Room 14 trying to cheer the Prime Minister on all her so-called wonderful efforts in the past 12 months, she should have been down here in the House, at the Dispatch Box, explaining why pensioners are stuck with a 7 per cent. increase, nurses will get only 7 per cent. with some clawback, teachers are offered only 5·8 per cent., and local authority manual workers are given only 4 per cent., whereas the top brass can get up to nearly 50 per cent. increases in pay.

It is a scandal, and the Government do not have the guts to come to the House and face the music, and explain how they have managed to pay such extortionate increases to people who are doing very nicely, thank you.

Mr. Patrick Thompson (Norwich, North): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. I hope that it is recognised that there is concern about this matter on both sides of the House and that therefore an early statement and debate would be welcomed by many people, both inside and outside the House.

Mr. Dave Nellist (Coventry, South-East): Further to the point of order, Mr. Speaker. On Wednesday, the Secretary of State for Employment made a statement about the abolition of wages councils which have protected the wage rates of workers under the age of 21. That statement was the same length as the written answer by the Prime Minister on top salaries. The statement on Wednesday allowed Tory Members to argue that the wages of young people such as hairdressers earning £34 or £35 a week should be reduced to create employment. Yesterday Opposition Members were denied the opportunity to argue that 2,000 people — judges, top civil servants and leaders of the Armed Forces — already earning £40,000 or £50,000 a year should not be given another £10,000 or £20,000. The Government are two-faced and operating double standards.

Mr. Roger Gale (Thanet, North): Further to the point of order, Mr. Speaker. Hon. Members on both sides of the House would like to make observations about yesterday's announcement. In spite of the purple prose of the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner), the paucity of attendance on the Opposition Benches suggests that next week might be a better time to discuss the matter. I urge you, Mr. Speaker, to use your good offices to ensure that the House has such an opportunity next week.

Mr. Clement Freud (Cambridgeshire, North-East): Further to the point of order, Mr. Speaker. Before the House becomes any hotter on this matter, will the Leader of the House say whether a statement is to be made today?

Mr. Speaker: The House knows that notification of a statement does not have to be given to me before 10 o'clock, but I can tell the House that I have had notification that a business statement is to be made at 11 o'clock. Of course, I have no idea what it contains.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Ordered,

That, at this day's sitting,—

(1) the provisions of paragraph (1)(b) of Standing Order No. 3 (Exempted business) shall not apply to the two Motions in the name of Mr. Secretary Hurd relating to Northern Ireland; and

[Mr. Speaker]

(2) Mr. Speaker shall put the Question on the first Motion not later than half-past Eleven o'clock and on the second Motion not later than half-past Two o'clock. —[Mr. Biffen.]

Betting and Gaming (Northern Ireland)

9.42 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary for Northern Ireland (Mr. Christopher Patten): I beg to move,

That the draft Betting, Gaming, Lotteries and Amusements (Northern Ireland) Order 1985, which was laid before this House on 26th June, be approved.

The purpose of the order is to bring up to date the social law in Northern Ireland on all forms of betting, gaming, lotteries and amusements with prizes. The present law is outdated, is proving increasingly difficult to enforce and has fallen into disrepute in many respects. The order seeks to remedy that highly unsatisfactory situation by replacing all existing enactments with legislation which will reflect current attitudes to gambling and demands for gambling facilities and which can be expected, therefore, to command general public respect and to be capable of proper enforcement.

The legislation is lengthy and complex, and I shall not go into it in impenetrable detail. Instead I shall concentrate on the main provisions. Hon. Members may raise issues of detail with which I shall attempt to deal later if I have the opportunity.

Part II of the order largely re-enacts the existing betting law, but makes several changes aimed at making it more efficient in its operation. The major change of substance is to allow greyhound tracks to operate a tote. Because of a quirk in the existing law, only horse racecourses can be licensed to operate the totalisator in Northern Ireland, even though the law for the rest of the United Kingdom permits the tote at greyhound tracks. The Government see no reason why greyhound racing in Northern Ireland should not have the same facility, thus giving punters at the four greyhound tracks the choice of betting with bookmakers or the tote.

The order contains new rules for the conduct of bookmaking offices. Restricted sound broadcasts of race commentaries — the Extel service — will be allowed. Also in line with recent changes in the corresponding law in Great Britain, it will be possible to relax, by subordinate order, the restrictions on the facilites which may be provided in bookmaking offices. These will include television broadcasts. The Government have no immediate plans to exercise that power in Northern Ireland, but the law both here and elsewhere needs to allow for a little judicious flexibility to cope with changing social habits.

Part III of the order deals with gaming. It has five chapters. The first applies to gaming of a private kind, for example, in a family or between friends. Its aim is to force all gaming with the potential for abuse into the control system to be established by chapters II and III, as well as prohibiting all gaming in public places. Bankers' games and games which by their nature are not of equal chance, are prohibited except on domestic occasions, for example in one's own home or in places such as hostels.

Chapter II provides a comprehensive code for the control of bingo promoted commercially in private bingo clubs licensed by the courts for that purpose. The Government considered carefully whether to provide, as in Great Britain, for the licensing of gaming clubs in which other forms of commercial gaming may take place, such as casinos. We concluded that there is no evidence of any significant demand in Northern Ireland for that type of gaming club. We have tried throughout the order not to stimulate demand for betting or gaming that does not clearly exist.

Chapter III deals with gaming by means of gaming machines. Anyone who wishes to supply or maintain a gaming machine will have to obtain from a court a certificate or permit authorising him to do so. The purpose of this and the other provisions of the chapter is to prevent racketeering and the spread of machines to places where there is no real public demand for them.

Gaming machines which may pay big prizes, usually known as jackpot machines, are prohibited except in registered private members' clubs or when used for fund raising at bazaars, sales of work, fetes or similar entertainments promoted for non-commercial purposes.

To have gaming machines, a club must register with the court, either under the order or the Registration of Clubs (Northern Ireland) Act 1967. As in Great Britain, a registered club will be limited to operating a maximum of two gaming machines. A few clubs in Northern Ireland already have more than that because the existing law has been interpreted by the courts as permitting the use of machines as a means of running private lotteries.

We see no good reason why clubs in Northern Ireland should have a greater entitlement to machines than clubs in the rest of the United Kingdom where the limit of two applies. Apart from the objections on social grounds to a greater number of machines—I do have such objections—the Government are concerned on the basis of Royal Ulster Constabulary advice that in certain areas of Northern Ireland the proceeds from the machines in certain clubs are helping to finance the operations of paramilitary organisations. Indeed, there is a strong case for a complete ban on the use of machines in clubs.

However, the Government recognise that such a ban would be regarded as unreasonable since it would unfairly penalise the majority of highly respectable clubs that have no links with the paramilitaries. Taking all that into account, the Government conclude that the limit of two is reasonable. The choice was between none at all and two, not between two and more than that.

Mr. William Ross (Londonderry, East): Instead of limiting the number of machines to two, have the Government considered limiting the stake to 2p so that more machines could be operated for the same amount of money?

Mr. Patten: We considered all sorts of options. The real problem is controlling the number of machines to ensure that paramilitary organisations do not find it easier to put a hand into the back of the machine. It is easier to meter a smaller number of machines. We considered a number of options in close consultation with the RUC. I believe that we have come to a right and sensible decision.

Mr. Roy Beggs (Antrim, East): How many clubs does the RUC suspect are being used to raise funds for paramilitary organisations? What percentage do they represent of the total number of clubs in Northern Ireland?

Mr. Patten: I cannot give an exact figure, but it is relative small as a proportion of the total number of clubs in Northern Ireland. However, the number is sufficiently large for us to take a severe view. It is sufficiently large for us to take a similar view when preparing legislation for the registration of clubs which we hope to bring before the House in the next Session. I am absolutely determined that we should ensure that a number of the abuses that exist at present are dealt with in that legislation.

I appreciate and sympathise with the drift of the hon. Gentleman's question. However, it seems difficult, if not impossible, to have one law for one sort of club and another law for another—to have one law, as it were, for Bangor or Holywood and another for other parts of Northern Ireland. I appreciate the strength of feeling on the subject, but we could not conceivably have made that sort of distinction.
